

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

This note is supplemental to that appended to the case of State ex rel. Reed v. Jones, 23 L.R.A. 340, where the earlier cases are collated.

I. Introduction.

The question covered by this note is how far a law, hereinafter designated as "an enrolled bill," which has been duly certified by the officers of the legislature, approved by the governor and deposited with the secretary of state, is conclusive as to the regularity of its passage in accordance with all constitutional requirements.

Cases passing upon the regular enactment of joint resolutions, or proposed amendments to the Constitution, which are not ordinarily enrolled in the same manner as other laws, are expressly excluded from this note.

Courts have taken various views of the conclusiveness of an enrolled bill. On fact discussed in determining the question is the purpose of a legislative journal. By some it is viewed as a record kept merely for the convenience of the legislature, and is considered with the adjournment thereof, leaving the enrolled bill as the final word of the legislature, and, this being a co-ordinate branch of government with the judiciary, any investigation other than of the enrolled bill is precluded; and other courts,—and this is more especially true in those jurisdictions in which the legislature is by Constitution required to keep a journal,—have regarded the journal as a public record which is the final authority as to the proceedings of the legislature, and held that it is to be looked to, to determine whether or not the legislature has complied with constitutional requirements in the enactment of the law.

Again, the enrolled bill is by some courts treated in the nature of a judgment, and, the legislature being a co-ordinate branch of government, the judiciary cannot question the validity of such judgment. Other courts treat the failure to comply with the constitutional requirements in the nature of jurisdictional defects, which render the enrolled bill void.

It is apparent that when a court does look to the journal for any purpose, it does not treat the enrolled bill as conclusive, at least, not for all purposes. This has often led to a division of the cases into two groups, one in which the enrolled bill is treated as conclusive, and the other in which it is not. Investigation reveals, however, that such a classification does not fairly represent the cases, for it will be seen that even the courts that look to the journal do in some instances give a certain degree of conclusiveness to the enrolled bill; and on the other hand, some of the courts that have used expressions to the effect that the journal is conclusive have been speaking with reference to a particular set of facts. For instance, the case of Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, infra, uses such expressions, and is frequently cited as a case holding an enrolled bill conclusive. Yet the court in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark expressly reserved deciding as to the conclusiveness of an enrolled bill where the point of attack is as to a matter required to be shown on the journal. Manifestly, therefore, where the point of attack on an enrolled bill is as to a matter required to be shown on the journal, the case of Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark is not direct authority against the contention that the enrolled bill is not conclusive, although it is to be conceded that it is not an affirmative in support of that contention.

As will be seen by reference to subdivision IV., the journals are in some jurisdictions held to be the only competent evidence to impeach the enrolled bill; while in others, other evidence has been admitted. A reference in subdivision II. hereof to an "affirmative showing" includes an affirmative showing on the journal or whatever other records are held competent in the particular jurisdiction, and a reference to the "silence of the journal" not only includes the silence of the journal, but also the silence of whatever other sources of evidence are held competent to impeach the enrolled bill in the particular jurisdiction.

The Federal courts, in passing upon the validity of a statute of a state, will apply the rule of absolute conclusiveness, unless

Hayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For convenience, plaintiff in error will be referred to as the railway company and defendant in error as the state.

This cause arose in the district court of Logan county upon a submitted controversy in lieu of an action. The railway company the contrary rule has been established by the courts of such state. Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 64 Fed. 165, affirmed on other points in 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. In subdivision II., of the note, the general rules which have been applied by the courts in passing upon the conclusiveness of the enrolled bill have been formulated, so that the reader may obtain a general survey of the conflicting rules which have been adopted by the various courts. In subdivision III. the particular points of attack are taken up in detail, and the state of the authorities shown. It is important, however, in considering the cases dealing with a particular ground of attack, to allow for the general doctrines that may obtain in the respective jurisdictions.

II. Conflicting rules.

a. Doctrine of absolute conclusiveness.

In certain jurisdictions the enrolled bill is held conclusive as to all matters, so as to preclude any investigation as to the method of its enactment. Yolo County v. Colgan, 132 Cal. 265, 84 Am. St. Rep. 41, 64 Pac. 403; People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 16, 65 Pac. 9; Parkinson v. Johnson, 160 Cal. 756, 117 Pac. 1057; Sacramento Paving Co. v. Anderson, 1 Cal. Ky. 16, 43 S. W. 177; Stone v. Dispatch Pub. Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1473, 55 S. W. 725; Duncan v. Combs, 131 Ky. 330, 115 S. W. 222; Waller v. Murray, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 783, 53 S. W. 25; Bloomfield v. Middlesex County, 74 N. J. L. 261, 65 Atl. 890. See Power v. Kitching, 10 N. D. 254, 88 Am. St. Rep. 691, 86 N. W. 737, infra; Narregang v. Brown County, 14 S. The court in Power v. Kitching, 10 N. D. 254, 88 Am. St. Rep. 691, 86 N. W. 737, follows the decision of the South Dakota court in Narregang v. Brown County, 14 S. D. 357, 85 N. W. 602, and apparently treats the bill as conclusive, although the journals of the two houses are looked to and found to be conflicting; and in Woolfolk v. Albrecht, — N. D. —, 133 N. W. 310, the court expressly reserves passing upon the conclusiveness of the enrolled bill, and states that the presumption that the enrolled bill was constitutionally passed is very strong, and, "applying this rule to the case at bar, necessitates a holding that such presumption, even if rebuttable, is not overcome by the journal entries; and this is the effect of the decision of this court on this precise question, in Power v. Kitching, supra," thus apparently limiting the decision in Power v. Kitching.

Where the Constitution makes the signing of the enrolled bill by the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the assembly conclusive evidence of its passage by the legislature, the bill is conclusive. State ex rel. Sutherland v. Nye, 23 Nev. 99, 42 Pac. 866; State ex rel. Osburn v. Beck, 25 Nev. 68, 56 Pac. 1008.

No constitutional provisions are referred to in Helm v. Day, 134 N. Y. Supp. 770, but it is there held that the enrolled bill is conclusive, under a statute making the certificate of the presiding officer of each house conclusive evidence that the bill was properly passed.

As will be seen by a reference to the earlier note, the courts of California have seeks to prevent the state from collecting a tax levied against its property for common school purposes under a provision of an act of the legislature approved March 10, 1909, Sess. Laws 1909, p. 600. Section 2, art. 7, of that act, provides in part as follows: "There is hereby levied annually an ad-valorem tax upon all property in this state which may be subject to taxation upon such basis, a tax sufficient, in addition to the income from all other sources, to pay the expenses of the state government for each fiscal year ending on the 30th day of June, . . . including $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 mill, for common school purposes, to be levied, collected, and distributed as other school money. . . ." (Italics are ours.)

The judgment of the trial court was in not been consistent in their holdings on this question, but the later cases have clearly adhered to the doctrine of the absolute conclusiveness of the enrolled bill.

In Hale v. McGettigan, 114 Cal. 112, 45 Pac. 1049, the court refrained from holding the bill absolutely conclusive, because the facts presented did not require such a decision, and held that where the journals are silent as to compliance with a constitutional requirement, it will be presumed that the requirement was complied with, and the bill held conclusive.

The Texas cases are also confused on this question. In the Texas cases cited above, it clearly appears that the court regarded the enrolled bill as conclusive for all purposes. In the Texas cases cited below, the court was passing on facts that were not required by the Constitution to be shown on the journal, and in view of the very clear statement of the court in the recent Texas case of Parshall v. State, infra, it is doubtful if they can be regarded as authority for more than the proposition that the bill is conclusive as to compliance with constitutional requirements that are not required to be shown on the journal.

In New Jersey, a jurisdiction that is committed to the doctrine of the absolute conclusiveness of the bill, the rule has been suspended in a matter concerning notice of the passage of special acts. Thus, in State, Ewing Twp., Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 57 N. J. L. 318, 31 Atl. 223, and Atty. Gen. v. Tuckerton, 67 N. J. L. 120, 50 Atl. 602, it was held that the court might inquire as to whether a notice of intention to apply for the passage of a private, local, or special act had been given. These cases follow the earlier case of Passaic County v. Stevenson, 46 N. J. L. 173, cited in the earlier note.

In De Loach v. Newton, 134 Ga. 739, 68 S. E. 708, 20 Ann. Cas. 342, where the journal failed to show that a senate amendment had been concurred in by a constitutional majority in the house, the bill was held conclusive, notwithstanding a constitutional provision that "no bill shall become a law unless it shall receive a ma-majority of the votes of all the members elected to each house of the general assembly, and it shall in every instance so appear on the journal." The court in this case takes the view that the constitutional provision is not that the bill shall not become a law unless the journal shall show that it has received the requisite majority, but that it becomes a law in any event, and that the provision that this matter shall appear on the journal is independent and directory. The same holding appears in Whitley v. State, 134 Ga. 758, 68 S. E. 716.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 20, 60 S. E. 725, it affirmatively appeared from the journal that the constitutional requirement had not been complied with, but the enrolled bill was held conclusive.

For specific application of the general doctrine of absolute conclusiveness to particular grounds of attack, see various subdivisions of III.

—as to matters not required by the Constitution to be shown on the journal.

Some courts, in passing on this question, have limited the decision as to the conclusiveness of the enrolled bill to matters not required to be shown on the journal, or at least have declined to extend it beyond that point; but within this limit have held the enrolled bill conclusive. Miller v. Oelwein, — Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 1045; State ex rel. Gregg v. Erickson, 39 Mont. 280, 102 Pac. 336; ATCHISON, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. STATE; Coyle v. Smith, 28 Okla. 121, 113 Pac. 944; *McNeal v. thorizing the levy for common school purposes; that that provision never received the sanction of the members of the legislature; and that such facts are disclosed by the journals of the house and senate. Whether a court can look to the journals of either branch of the legislature, or of both, to impeach the enrolled bill, in determining whether or not it was passed in conformity with constitutional provisions, and in determining whether all the provisions contained in the enrolled bill signed by the presiding officers of the two branches of the legislature and approved by the governor were contained in the bill as adopted by the legislature, is a question upon which the decided cases from the various states of the Union are in hopeless conflict, and there are many cases supporting respectively the affirmative and negative of the proposition. Among those cases holding that the journal may be looked to for the purpose of impeaching the enrolled bill are the following: Jones v. Hutchinson, 43 Ala. 721; Moody v. State, 48 Ala. 115, 17 Am. Rep. 28; Burr v. Ross, 19 Ark. 250; Vinsant v. Knox, 27 Ark. 266; Webster v. Little Rock, 44 Ark. 536; State ex rel. Markens v. Brown, 20 Fla. 407; *State ex rel. And this rule of conclusiveness has been adhered to notwithstanding it affirmatively appears on the journal that some constitutional requirements as to which the legislative journals were not required to make a showing, were not complied with in the enactment thereof. *Carr v. Ct. Rep. 495; Harwood v. Wentworth, 162 U. S. 547, 40 L. ed. 1069, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 890.

In Chavez v. Luna, 5 N. M. 183, 21 Pac. 344, the facts of which are similar to those in Lyons v. Woods, 5 N. M. 327, 21 Pac. 346, and on the authority of which the latter case was decided, the court, while approving of the doctrine that an enrolled bill is not conclusive, but that courts have power to inquire into the facts attending the passage of the bill, where the Constitution of the state prescribes the mode to be observed by the legislature in passing bills, holds that the court cannot go behind an enrolled bill of the territorial legislature, and hold it void on the ground that certain members of the quorum of the legislative assembly were seated without having a certificate of election, since the determination of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members is a judicial function of the legislature; and whether it was intended to give the territorial legislature full power in this regard, it was not necessary to decide, since the organic act required legislative bills to be submitted to Congress and approved; and since there was nothing in this case to show that Congress had disapproved of the act, it was assumed that it had been approved. The decision in the latter case was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in 153 U. S. 649, 38 L. ed. 854, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 959. 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

But in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. McGlamory, 92 Tex. 150, 41 S. W. 466, the court, without discussion, went back of an enrolled bill which declared that it was an emergency measure and that it should take effect from and after its passage, and decided that it had not received such a majority as is requisite to the passage of such bill.

In Day Land & Cattle Co. v. State; 68 Tex. 526, 4 S. W. 865, the court had under consideration the validity of an emergency measure, but the question there being considered was as to the sufficiency of the facts on which the emergency measure was passed.

The decision in the McGlamory Case is in conflict with the decision in Parshall v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 138 S. W. 759, and in view of the very clear statement of the law contained in Parshall v. State, it is doubtful whether the conclusiveness of the enrolled bill was directly considered in the McGlamory Case.

b. Doctrine of prima facie conclusiveness.

1. Where the journals are silent as to compliance with constitutional requirements.

As to specific applications of the doctrine to particular grounds of attack, see infra, III.

The discussion under this subdivision is limited to matters not required by the Constitution to be shown on the journals. As to matters required to be shown, see subdivision c, below.

Other courts make the enrolled bill only prima facie conclusive of compliance with statutory requirements, and hold as to matters not required by the Constitution to be entered on the journal, that, in the absence of an affirmative showing to the contrary, the bill is conclusive that all such constitutional requirements have been complied with. *Walker v. No distinction is made in the conclusiveness of the enrolled bill by the courts of Kansas, between matters not required to be entered on the journal and those so required to be entered. See Kansas cases below.

In Louisiana State Lottery Co. v. Richoux, 23 La. Ann. 743, 8 Am. Rep. 602, it was held that the enrolled bill is conclusive, if the law had been regularly promulgated; and in Whited v. Lewis, 25 La. Ann. 568, it was held that the court might inquire as to the due and regular promulgation of the law.

In Stockton v. Powell, 29 Fla. 1, 15 L.R.A. 42, 10 So. 688, Rushton v. State, 58 Fla. 94, 50 So. 486, the enrolled bill was

And the same rule is adopted in the following state cases: Graves v. Alsap, 1 Ariz. 274, 25 Pac. 836; Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am. Dec. 93; People v. Burt, 43 Cal. 560; Eld v. held conclusive as to notice being given and proof of the same made, as required in passing local laws.

In State v. Murray, 47 La. Ann. 1424, 17 So. 832, the enrolled bill was held conclusive as to the sufficiency of a notice required for the passage of a local law.

But in Webster v. Hastings, 56 Neb. 669, 77 N. W. 127, a Code provision was referred to, that the proceedings of the legislature shall be proved by the journal; and under this provision it was held that the enrolled bill was not conclusive.

It does not appear how the showing was made, in State ex rel. Medical College v. Sowell, 143 Ala. 494, 39 So. 246, that the act had not been passed as required by the Constitution, but the court inquired into the method of passage, thereby treating the enrolled bill as not conclusive.

In Stein v. Leeper, 78 Ala. 517; Mathis v. State, 31 Fla. 291, 12 So. 681; and State ex rel. Eastland v. Gould, 31 Minn. 189, 17 N. W. 276, the court went behind the enrolled bill to the journals, but decided that the act had been validly passed; and in King Lumber Co. v. Crow, 155 Ala. 504, 130 Am. St. Rep. 65, 46 So. 646, the court looked to the journals, but no question seems to have been raised as to the power to do so.

Exception.

In certain of the states a constitutional provision that before the bill shall become a law certain requirements shall be complied with has been construed to be mandatory, and in the absence of an affirmative showing that such requirements have been complied with, the enrolled bill is not even prima facie conclusive, and may be impeached. These cases, by construction, require that compliance with such mandatory requirements of the Constitution shall appear on the journal. Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, 58 Am. Dec. 571; Prescott v. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Illinois & M. Canal, 19 Ill. 324; Ryan v. Lynch, 68 Ill. 160; People ex rel. Oliver v. Knopf, 198 Ill. 340, 64 N. E. 842, 1127; Union Bank v. Oxford, 119 N. C. 214, 34 L.R.A. 487, 25 S. E. 966; Charlotte v. Shepard, 122 N. C. 602, 29 S. E. 842; Buncombe County v. Payne, 123 N. C. 432, 31 S. E. 711; Wilkes County v. Call, 123 N. C. 308, 44 L.R.A. 252, 31 S. E. 481; Smathers v. Madison County, 125 N. C. 480, 34 S. E. 554; Post v. Kendal County, 105 U. S. 667, 26 L. ed. 1204.

These cases are not altogether clear on this point. In the Illinois cases, matters that are not required to be entered on the journal are so mingled with matters that are required to be entered that it is not clear in all cases that the court would have held the bill inconclusive where the journals were silent. However, in People ex rel. Oliver v. Knopf, 198 Ill. 340, 64 N. E. 843, the argument that the bill is conclusive as to compliance with matters not required to be entered on the journal, in the absence of an affirmative showing that such requirements were not met, was disapproved, and the court states that the presumption is as to such matters, in the absence of an affirmative showing on the journal, that the requirements were not met.

The North Carolina cases are also unsatisfactory on this point. It appears from these cases that there was either an affirmative showing or an admission that some constitutional requirements had not been met, and thus the decision might have been arrived at under the general rule as laid down in subdivision 2, infra. The court, however, regards the constitutional requirement as mandatory, and in Union Bank v. Oxford, 119 N. C. 214, 34 L.R.A. 487, 25 S. E. 966, speaks of one such requirement, that is not expressly required by the Constitution to be shown on the journal, as a matter that must appear on the journal.

The North Carolina cases that adhere to this doctrine are those in which the bill is one concerning the raising of revenue, in which case a special constitutional requirement applies. As to the general doctrine in North Carolina, see Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C.

We have not cited above all the cases that support either of the rules, but have attempted to give only a sufficient number to indicate the extent to which both rules are supported by respectable authority. It has been asserted by some of the text writers, as well as by some courts in the decided cases, that the weight of authority, numerically speaking, supports the rule that, where the journal contains matters affirmatively impeaching the enrolled bill, it must prevail. Black, Interpretation of Laws, p. 225. A similar declaration is found in the first edition of Sutherland on Statutory Construction. However correct these statements may have been at the time they were written, it must now be doubted whether they speak correctly the conclusion of the authorities upon this question at this time; and in the last edition of Sutherland on Statutory Construction, at page 72, it is said: "It is no longer true that 'in a large majority of the states' the courts have held that the en-

In Idaho a requirement in the Constitution that each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings is construed to mean that the journal shall show all the proceedings of the house; hence when the journal does not affirmatively show that all constitutional requirements were complied with, the bill may be impeached. Cohn v. Kingsley, 5 Idaho, 416, 38 L.R.A. 74, 49 Pac. 985. On the rehearing of this case, Sullivan, Chief Justice, renders a vigorous dissenting opinion on the point that compliance with all constitutional requirements must affirmatively appear on the journal, and takes the position that, in the absence of an affirmative showing that the constitutional requirements were not complied with, the bill may not be impeached.

It will be noted by reference to subdivision c, infra, that in Illinois the same rule is applied as to matters required to be entered on the journal.

The early Illinois case of Schuyler County v. People, 25 Ill. 181, takes the position that, in the absence of an affirmative showing that the constitutional requirements were not complied with, the bill is unimpeachable.

In State v. Wendler, 94 Wis. 369, 68 N. W. 759, where there was apparently a mistake in the numbering of the bills, it was held that the silence of the legislative journal as to the passage of a particular bill would defeat it.

In Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Carver, 118 N. C. 328, 24 S. E. 352; Glenn v. Wray, 126 N. C. 730, 36 S. E. 167; Wilson v. Markley, 133 N. C. 616, 45 S. E. 1023; Brown v. Stewart, 134 N. C. 357, 46 S. E. 741; New Hanover County v. Armour Packing Co. 135 N. C. 62, 47 S. E. 411; Bray v. Williams, 137 N. C. 387, 49 S. E. 887, and Raleigh Sav. Bank v. Lacy, 151 N. C. 3, 65 S. E. 441, the court looked to the journals, but decided that there had been a sufficient compliance with constitutional requirements in the enactment of the bill in question.

Washington, 122 N. C. 39, 30 S. E. 118, and Rodman-Heath Cotton Mills v. Waxhaw, 130 N. C. 293, 41 S. E. 488, as to the conclusiveness of the bill; but the court looked to the journals and held a bill invalid for failure to comply with constitutional requirements.

On the contrary, in New Hanover County v. De Rosset, 129 N. C. 275, 40 S. E. 43, the enrolled bill was held conclusive as to the first reading, although the journals were silent; and in Black v. Duncombe County, 129 N. C. 121, 39 S. E. 818, the bill was held conclusive as to a reading on three several days. See Cox v. Pitt County, II. a, supra.

So, in Lumberton Improv. Co. v. Robeson County, 146 N. C. 353, 59 S. E. 1014, where the discrepancy was a mere clerical error, the bill was held conclusive.

The legislature may correct its journal to speak the truth. Richmond County v. Farmers' Bank, 152 N. C. 387, 67 S. E. 964, 21 Ann. Cas. 812.

2. Where it affirmatively appears that a constitutional requirement was not complied with.

As to specific applications to particular grounds of attack, see infra, III.

Where there is an affirmative showing that some constitutional requirement has not been complied with in the enactment of the law, this prima facie conclusiveness is rebutted, and the bill may be impeached. Jones v. Hutchinson, 43 Ala. 721; Moody v. State, 48 Ala. 115, 17 Am. Rep. 28; Perry County v. Selma M. & M. R. Co. 58 Ala. 546; Robertson v. State, 130 Ala. 164, 30 So. 494; *Yancy v. rolled act may be impeached by a resort to the journals. A comparison will show that the courts are now about equally divided on the question. The current of judicial decision in the last ten years has been strongly against the right of the courts to go back of the enrolled act. Undoubtedly, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495, has had much to do in creating and augmenting this current, but it may also be due to the greater simplicity, certainty, and reasonableness of the doctrine which holds the enrolled act to be conclusive. Many courts and judges, while feeling compelled to follow former decisions holding that the enrolled act may be impeached by the journals, have done so reluctantly, and have expressed doubts as to the validity of the doctrine, and in many cases, as will appear in the following sections, have qualified and restricted it in important particulars."

As stated in the foregoing excerpt, the courts of some of the states that have felt the rule too long established to be overturned have, nevertheless, been constrained to question its wisdom. After the rule had been established in Burr v. Ross, 19 Ark. 250, and followed in several subsequent cases, the justices, in delivering the opinion in Webster v. Little Rock, said: "The legislative department of the government is equal in dignity with the judicial,—co-ordinate and not subordinate. Its officers take the same oath to support the Constitution.

Rep. 418 (construing Nebraska statute), the courts looked to the journals, but decided that there had been a sufficient compliance with constitutional requirements.

In Walker v. Montgomery, 139 Ala. 468, 36 So. 23; Kelley v. Secretary of State, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

149 Mich. 343, 112 N. W. 978; Weis v. Ashley, 59 Neb. 494, 80 Am. St. Rep. 704, 81 N. W. 318; and Capito v. Topping, 65 W. Va. 587, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1089, 64 S. E. 845, the court treated the enrolled bill as not conclusive; but there is no discussion, and no question seems to have been raised on this point.

In Haney v. State, 34 Ark. 263, the court not only held the enrolled bill not conclusive, but, the error being apparent on the face of the bill, corrected it.

See North Carolina and Illinois cases in next subdivision.

c. Doctrine as to matters required by the Constitution to be shown on the journal.

As to specific application to particular grounds of attack, see infra, III.

By reference to the first proposition in subdivision a, above, it will be seen that in some jurisdictions the bill is held conclusive as to all matters. Courts which adhere strictly to this doctrine, of course, make no distinction between matters required by the Constitution to be shown on the journal, and those that are not, and none such cases are included in this subdivision, even though it appears that the objection was as to a matter required to be entered on the journal, as did appear in the Georgia cases cited therein.

It will also be noted that some of the courts which do not make the enrolled bill absolutely conclusive make no distinction between matters required to be entered on the journal and those that are not, notably the courts of Kansas and Illinois. The decisions of all courts which stop short of making the enrolled bill absolutely conclusive as to matters required to be entered on the journal are shown in this subdivision.

Here, also, there is a difference of opinion as to the conclusiveness to which the enrolled bill is entitled. In some jurisdictions the direction that certain matters shall be entered on the journal is treated as mandatory, and where the journals are silent in regard thereto, it is presumed that

The constitutional provisions regarding the manner in which bills are to be passed are addressed directly to them, and they are responsible to the people for an abuse of powers. No human government can be devised in which powers must not be somewhere reposed which may be abused. It is not irrational to hold that, when a legislative body has put forth a bill meaning to do so, and that bill has been duly authenticated in the prescribed manner, then the common safety of law-abiding citizens requires that the court should respect it as law, without inquiring into the modes of its passage. It is this consideration which lies at the foundation of the rule everywhere recognized, that no law can be impeached for fraudulent motives actuating the legislators, nor on account of corrupt influences brought to bear upon them. . . . In other words, the power is a dangerous one, and should never be exercised in the face of a reasonable doubt. Conforming to the practice of the court, I desire at the same time to express my preference for the English doctrine, with which I do not consider our case of Burr v. Ross in conflict. That is to say, that an act, actually and bona fide assented to in both houses, authenticated and deposited with the secretary of state, should be conclusive of the law, in the breasts of the judges." Other cases in which courts have made similar criticism of this rule, which they felt bound by precedent to follow, are: People ex rel. Barnes v. Starne, 35 Ill. 121, 85 Am. Dec. 348; State ex rel. Godard v.

the act thus required to be evidenced did not take place. It is apparent where the journals are silent as to the performance of an act the doing of which is required to be entered on the journal, that in a sense the journal may be said affirmatively to show that the performance of such act was not entered thereon. Such a statement, however, means nothing more than that nothing appears on the journal. The courts which take this view hold that where the journals are silent as to compliance with a constitutional requirement which is required to be evidenced by an entry on the journal, or where it thus appears that no entry was made, the bill is inconclusive and may be impeached. Lambert v. Smith, 98 Va. 263, 38 S. E. 938; Stanly County v. Coler, 37 C. C. A. 484, 96 Fed. 284, reversed on rehearing on other grounds in 51 C. C. A. 379, 113 Fed. 705, which latter decision is affirmed in 190 U. S. 437, 47 L. ed. 1126, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 811; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599; *Montgomery Beer Bottling Works v. Merely introducing excerpts from the journal does not make a sufficient showing as to the silence of the journal, to impeach the bill. Denver v. Rubidge, 51 Colo. 224, 116 Pac. 1130.

If the journal is defective, mutilated, or incomplete, its silence will not impeach the bill. State ex rel. Douglas County v. Frank, 60 Neb. 327, 83 N. W. 74, s. c. on rehearing, 61 Neb. 679, 85 N. W. 956.

And under a constitutional provision requiring notice of the introduction of bills for local laws to be given to the section affected, and proof of such notice to be made to the legislature, and the proof spread upon the journal, and requiring the courts to pronounce such a law void unless the journal affirmatively shows that the law had been passed in accordance with the constitutional provision, the court in Wallace v. Board of Revenue, 140 Ala. 491, 37 So. 321, inquired into the sufficiency of notice appearing on the journal.

Where a notice of protest is required to be entered on the journal, in the absence of such an entry, it will be presumed that there was none. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Mead, 71 Mo. 266.

But where the journal shows a protest made by a member of the legislature, and entered on the journal in accordance with a constitutional provision, the court will inquire into the validity of such protest. State ex rel. McCaffery v. Mason, 155 Mo. 486, 55 S. W. 636, affirmed in 179 U. S. 328, 45 L. ed. 214, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 125.

The failure to enter the "nays" on the journal was at first treated as a silence of the journal sufficient to impeach the bill. Smithee v. Garth, 33 Ark. 17; Smathers v. Madison County, 125 N. C. 480, 34 S. E. 554; New Hanover County v. De Rosset, 129

Andrews, 64 Kan. 474, 67 Pac. 870, and State ex rel. Casper v. Moore, 37 Neb. 13, 55 N. W. 299. In State ex rel. Hoover v. Chester, 39 S. C. 307, 17 S. E. 752, the court reversed the rule, notwithstanding it had been twice declared and followed in that jurisdiction in the cases of State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Platt, 2 S. C. 150, 16 Am. Rep. 647, and State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Hagood, 13 S. C. 46; and in doing so the court used the following language: "Therefore, however unpleasant it may be to reverse previous decisions of this court, still, after full and mature consideration, we feel it to be a duty we owe the state that the case of State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Platt, supra, should be and is hereby overruled, and, as the case of State ex rel. Atty. Gen.

v. Hagood, supra, was really decided upon the authority of Platt's Case, it follows necessarily that the case of Hagood must fall when the foundation upon which it rests is taken away. We announce that the true rule is that, when an act has been duly signed by the presiding officers of the general assembly, in open session in the senate house, approved by the governor of the state, and duly deposited in the office of the secretary of state, it is sufficient evidence, nothing to the contrary appearing upon its face, that it passed the general assembly, and that it is not competent either by the journals of the two houses, or either of them, or by any other evidence, to impeach such an act."

The provisions of the Constitution of this

N. C. 275, 40 S. E. 43; Debnam v. Chitty, 131 N. C. 657, 43 S. E. 3. The North Carolina cases, at least, were overruled on this question in Salem v. Wachovia Loan & T. Co. 143 N. C. 110, 118 Am. St. Rep. 791, 55 S. E. 442, and this latter decision agrees with the decision in Onslow County v. Tollman, 76 C. C. A. 317, 145 Fed. 753, and also that in People ex rel. Wies v. Bowman, 247 Ill. 276, 93 N. E. 244. The reasoning of the courts which take the latter view is well set forth in the Illinois case, where it is stated that the silence of the journal as to the "nay" vote is evidence that there was no "nay" vote, and the bill cannot be impeached.

Other courts treat the act which is to be evidenced by the journal entry as the important fact, and a direction that the doing thereof shall be entered on the journal as directory merely; and where there is a failure to comply with this direction, in the absence of a clear affirmative showing that the act did not take place, the enrolled bill is held conclusive that the constitutional requirements were complied with. Homrighausen v. Knoche, 58 Kan. 646, 50 Pac. 879; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simons, 75 Kan. 130, 88 Pac. 551; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Mead, 71 Mo. 266; State ex rel. Bray v. Long, 21 Mont. 27, 52 Pac. 645. See Johnson v. Great Falls, infra; State ex rel. Gregg v. Erickson, 39 Mont. 280, 102 Pac. 336; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 34 Mont. 268, 85 Pac. 1032, 9 Ann. Cas. 579; Home Tele. Co. v. Nashville, 118 Tenn. 1, 101 S. W. 770, 11 Ann. Cas. 824.

The court also looked to the journals in Norvell v. State, 143 Ala. 561, 39 So. 357, and State ex rel. Frederick v. Brodie, 148 Ala. 381, 41 So. 180. And also in Ex parte Kelly, 153 Ala. 668, 45 So. 290; Robertson v. People, 20 Colo. 279, 38 Pac. 326, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 284; Mathis v. State, 31 Fla. 291, 12 So. 681; Miesen v. Hynds v. Cahill, 12 Wyo. 225, 75 Pac. 433; and Younger v. Hehn, 12 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Wyo. 289, 109 Am. St. Rep. 986, 75 Pac. 443, the court looked to the journals, but decided that there had been a sufficient compliance with the constitutional requirements.

III. Particular grounds of attack.

a. Necessity of considering in light of general principles.

In the following subdivision of the note, particular grounds of attack upon the enrolled bill are noticed. It is necessary, however, to keep constantly in mind the general principles above discussed in order to understand the decisions as to these various grounds of attack, for it is apparent that the decision on any one of them will be determined largely by the general view of the court in the particular jurisdiction, as to the conclusiveness of the enrolled bill. If the court adheres strictly to the doctrine of the absolute conclusiveness of the enrolled bill, it is apparent that no ground of attack would serve to render it void, while in jurisdictions which do not adhere to the rule of absolute conclusiveness, the same ground of attack may serve to render the bill void according to the view taken of the particular ground of attack. It is therefore necessary, as stated above, to keep constantly in mind the general principles.

b. Legality of legislative session.

In Butler v. State, 89 Ga. 821, 15 S. E. 763, an enrolled bill was upheld where the journals did not affirmatively sustain the objection that the legislature was not in legal session when the bill was passed.

c. Introduction of bill after time limited by Constitution.

Under the doctrine that an enrolled bill imparts absolute verity, it has been held that it cannot be shown that it was not introduced into the legislature within the time limited therefor (Hale v. McGettigan, 114 Cal. 112, 45 Pac. 1049); or within ten days of final adjournment, in defiance of a state relative to the journals of each house of the legislature are as follows: By § 30, art. 5, it is provided that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same. The yeas and nays of the members of either house on any question, at the desire of one fifteenth of those present, shall be entered upon its journal." Section 31 of the same article requires that in all elections made by the legislature, except for officers and employees thereof, the members thereof shall vote yea or nay, and each vote shall be entered upon the journal. And § 34 provides that "every bill shall be read on three different days in each house, and no bill shall become a law unless, on its final passage, it be read at length, and no law shall be passed unless upon a vote of a majority of all the members elected to each house in favor of such law, and the question, upon final passage, shall be taken upon its last reading, and the yeas and nays shall be entered upon the journal."

It will be observed from the foregoing provisions that the only specific requirements as to what shall be entered upon the journal are that each vote shall be entered in elections other than for officers and employees of either house, and the yeas and nays shall be taken upon the final passage of all measures and shall be entered upon the journal. This latter requirement is made essential to the passage of the act; and likewise the yea and nay vote must be entered upon the journal, if it be voted to dispense with the read-

As to the competency of parol evidence to show that a bill was introduced into the legislature after the expiration of the session by operation of law, see White v. Hinton, infra, IV. b.

d. Improper origin of revenue bills.

An enrolled bill for raising revenue will be void if the journals disclose that it originated in the senate, in violation of a constitutional requirement that such bills should originate in the house. Perry County v. Selma M. & M. R. Co. 58 Ala. 546; Thierman Co. v. Com. 123 Ky. 740, 97 S. W. 366.

And the same doctrine has been applied where it was conceded that such a bill improperly originated in the senate. Sala's Succession, 50 La. Ann. 1009, 24 So. 674; Givanovich's Succession, 50 La. Ann. 625, 24 So. 679.

But it was held in United States v. Billings, 190 Fed. 356, that the court could not determine whether a Senate amendment to an enrolled revenue bill was within the scope of the original bill as originated in the House of Representatives.

As to determining the validity of a revenue bill upon stipulations of litigants to the effect that it originated in the wrong branch of the legislature, see infra, IV. c.

e. Change of original purpose of bill.

1. In general.

The journals may be examined to ascertain whether the original purpose of an enrolled bill was changed during its passage, in violation of a constitutional prohibition. Stein v. Leeper, 78 Ala. 517; Harrison v. Gordy, 57 Ala. 49; Southern R. Co. v. Mitchell, 139 Ala. 629, 37 So. 85; Loftin v. Watson, 32 Ark. 414; Re Amendments of Legislative Bills, 19 Colo. 356, 35 Pac. 917; Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Colorado Loan & T. Co. 20 Colo. 1, 36 Pac. 793; Airy v. People, 21 Colo. 144, 40 Pac. 362, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And if they show that the original purpose of the bill was changed during its passage, the enrolled bill will be void. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 612; Re House Bill No. 231, 9 Colo. 624, 21 Pac. 472.

But in Texas it has been held that an enrolled bill cannot be impeached by a showing from the journals that, in violation of the Constitution, its original purpose was changed during passage, since that instrument did not require the journals to show that such mandate was observed. Parshall v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 138 S. W. 759; Knox v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 138 S. W. 787; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Stuart, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 48 S. W. 709.

An enrolled bill after it has been signed by the presiding officers of the legislature without a protest being made and entered on the journals, to the effect that its original purpose has been changed, cannot be impeached on that ground, where the Constitution declares that a bill shall be signed by the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature after all business has been suspended for that purpose, and the bill has been read, unless there is an objection thereto, which shall be entered on the journals. State ex rel. McCaffery v. Mason, 155 Mo. 486, 55 S. W. 636.

As to the competency of the original bill as it was introduced into the legislature to show that its purpose was changed during passage, in defiance of the Constitution, see infra, IV. a, 2.

2. After time limited for introduction of bills.

In Michigan it is held that the legislative journals and records may be examined to determine whether the original purpose of a bill was changed after the time limited by Constitution for the introduction of bills, so as to make it in effect a new bill. Pack v. Barton, 47 Mich. 520, 11 N. W. 367; Powell v. Jackson, 51 Mich. 129, 16 N. W. 369; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Crane v. Ames, 60 Mich. 372, 27 N. W. 571; People ex rel. Hart v. McElroy, 72 Mich. 453, ing at length of any act before the signing of same by the presiding officer of either house, in the presence of the house, as required by § 35. It is the duty of each house to keep a record of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same; but, except as just mentioned, what proceedings shall be recorded in the journal, the manner of recording same, and the extent of their fullness, is left by the Constitution to the discretion of the legislative bodies, to be controlled by rule respectively of those bodies, or by statute. It is not required by any provision of the Constitution, that the contents of any bill, proposed, rejected, or adopted, shall be set out in the journal, or that the contents of any amendment of any bill shall be stated in full or in substance in the journal; and a record of any such bill or amendment thereto may be kept by reference in the journal to the title of such bill or amendment or to its number.

The question now under consideration was first directly presented to the Supreme Court of the United States for determination in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 204, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495. In that case the validity of an act of Congress was questioned, upon the ground that there had been omitted from the engrossed act, as attested by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, as approved by the President and as deposited with the Secretary of State, a section that was contained in the act when it passed the two Houses of Congress, and it was sought

2 L.R.A. 609, 40 N. W. 750; Sackrider v. Saginaw County, 79 Mich. 59, 44 N. W. 165; Atty. Gen. v. Detroit & S. Pl. Road Co. 97 Mich. 589, 56 N. W. 943; Toll v. Jerome, 101 Mich. 468, 59 N. W. 816; Davock v. Moore, 105 Mich. 120, 28 L.R.A. 783, 63 N. W. 424; Detroit v. Schmid, 128 Mich. 379, 92 Am. St. Rep. 468, 87 N. W. 383; *People ex rel. Kent County v. And when a violation of such constitutional prohibition appears, it will vitiate an enrolled bill. Sackrider v. Saginaw County, 79 Mich. 59, 44 N. W. 165; Atty. Gen. v. Detroit & S. Pl. Road Co. 97 Mich. 589, 56 N. W. 943; People ex rel. Kent County v. Loomis, 135 Mich. 556, 98 N. W. 262, 3 Ann. Cas. 751.

As to the competency of parol evidence to impeach a recital of the journals that a bill was introduced within the time limited for that purpose, see Atty. Gen. v. Rice, infra, IV. b.

f. Failure to refer bill to committee.

Where the Constitution requires the legislative journals to show that all bills were referred to and reported upon by a standing committee of the legislature, an enrolled bill will be void if the journals disclose a reference thereof to one committee and a report back to the legislature by a different one, without showing the action taken by the former. Tyler v. State, 169 Ala. 126, 48 So. 672; State v. Smith, 162 Ala. 1, 50 So. 364; Pope v. State, 165 Ala. 68, 51 So. 521; Crain v. State, 166 Ala. 1, 52 So. 31; Graves v. State, 166 Ala. 671, 52 So. 34. See also Walker v. Montgomery, 139 Ala. 468, 36 So. 23.

But in Kentucky and Texas the rule of conclusiveness of an enrolled bill has been applied where it was sought to impeach such a bill because it was not referred to and reported upon by a committee of the legislature before its passage, as the Constitution required. Stone v. Dispatch Pub. Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1473, 55 S. W. 725; Day 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Land & Cattle Co. v. State, 68 Tex. 526, 4 S. W. 865; Williams v. Taylor, 83 Tex. 667, 19 S. W. 156.

And the silence of the journals as to the reference of a bill to and a report thereon from a committee, as the Constitution requires, will not invalidate an enrolled bill, where the fundamental law does not require the journals to show that such mandate was complied with. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599.

g. Failure to print bill before passage.

An enrolled bill will be void if it affirmatively appears from the journals that it was not printed before its passage, as the Constitution requires. Andrews v. People, 33 Colo. 193, 108 Am. St. Rep. 76, 79 Pac. 1031; State ex rel. Aull v. Field, 119 Mo. 593, 24 S. W. 752.

And it was held in Neiberger v. McCullough, 253 Ill. 312, 97 N. E. 660, that an enrolled bill was void where the journals were silent as to whether the bill and its amendment were printed, as the Constitution required, before it was placed on its final passage, notwithstanding such instrument did not require compliance with such mandate to be shown by the journals.

In Swain v. Fritchman, 21 Idaho, 783, 125 Pac. 319, the legislative journals were examined in order to determine whether a bill was printed before passage as the Constitution required.

But it was held in Stone v. Dispatch Pub. Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1473, 55 S. W. 725, that an enrolled bill could not be invalidated on the ground that it was not printed before passage, since the rule adopted by that court was that of absolute conclusiveness of an enrolled bill.

h. Nonobservance of constitutional requirement as to reading bill.

1. In general.

There is a conflict of authority as to whether an enrolled bill may be impeached by evidence from the journals showing that to establish this fact by reference to the journals of the two Houses of Congress; but it was held that the act could not be impeached in this way. Section 5, art. 1, of the Federal Constitution provides that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, except such parts as may in their judgments require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the journal." The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan of the relative weight that shall be given to the journal thus required to be kept by the Houses, and to the engrossed act, said: "The signing by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and by the President of the Senate, in open session, of an enrolled bill, is an official attestation by the two Houses of such bill as one that has passed Congress. It is a declaration by the two Houses, through their presiding officers, to the President, that a bill thus attested has received in due form the sanction of the legislative branch of the government, and that it is delivered to him in obedience to the constitutional requirement that all bills which pass Congress shall be presented to him. And when a bill thus attested receives his approval, and is deposited in the public archives, its authentication as a bill that has passed Congress should be deemed complete and unimpeachable. As the President has no authority to approve a bill not passed by Congress, an enrolled act in the

it was not read before passage in the manner required by the Constitution.

Thus, some courts hold, on the ground of absolute conclusiveness of an enrolled bill, that it cannot be impeached by a showing that it was not read in the manner required by the Constitution. Lewis v. State, 148 Ind. 346, 47 N. E. 675; State ex rel. Sutherland v. Nye, 23 Nev. 99, 42 Pac. 866; State ex rel. Osburn v. Beck, 25 Nev. 68, 56 Pac. 1008; Narregang v. Brown County, 14 S. D. 357, 85 N. W. 602; State ex rel. Lavin v. Bacon, 14 S. D. 394, 85 N. W. 605; Usener v. State, 8 Tex. App. 177; El Paso & S. W. R. Co. v. Foth, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 275, 100 S. W. 171, reversed on other points in 101 Tex. 133, 105 S. W. 322.

While others hold that the failure of the journals to show that a bill was read in the manner prescribed by Constitution will not render an enrolled bill void, unless the fundamental law requires the journals to show that a bill was properly read. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599; Walker v. Griffith, 60 Ala. 361; Glidewell v. Martin, 51 Ark. 559, 11 S. W. 882; State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, 18 So. 767; Butler v. State, 89 Ga. 821, 15 S. E. 763; Schuyler County v. People, 25 Ill. 182; Weyand v. Stover, 35 Kan. 545, 11 Pac. 355; Re Ellis, 55 Minn. 401, 23 L.R.A. 287, 43 Am. St. Rep. 514, 56 N. W. 1056; Miesen v. Canfield, 64 Minn. 513, 67 N. W. 632; Coyle v. Smith, 28 Okla. 121, 113 Pac. 944; Jackson v. Weis & L. Mfg. Co. 124 Tenn. 421, 137 S. W. 757; Parshall v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 138 S. W. 759; Knox v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 138 S. W. 787.

But, on the other hand, it is held in some cases that the journals may be resorted to in order to ascertain whether an enrolled bill was read in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. State v. Crawford, 35 Ark. 237; Andrews v. People, 33 Colo. 193, 108 Am. St. Rep. 76, 79 Pac. 1031; Potter v. Lainhart, 44 Fla. 647, 33 So. 251; State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, 18 So. 767; Butler v. State, 89 Ga. 821, 15 S. E. 763; Tarr v. Western Loan & Sav. Co. 15 Idaho, 751, 21 L.R.A. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(N.S.) 707, 99 Pac. 1049; Swain v. Fritchman, 21 Idaho, 783, 125 Pac. 319; State ex rel. Applegate v. Taylor, 224 Mo. 393, 123 S. W. 892; Southern R. Co. v. Memphis, — Tenn. —, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 148 S. W. 662; Price v. Moundsville, 43 W. Va. 523, 64 Am. St. Rep. 878, 27 S. E. 218; Smith v. Mitchell, 69 W. Va. 481, 72 S. E. 755.

And an enrolled bill will be declared void if the legislative journals affirmatively show that it was not read in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, although it does not expressly require that such records show compliance therewith. State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, 18 So. 767; Butler v. State, 89 Ga. 821, 15 S. E. 763; Schuyler County v. People, 25 Ill. 182; Ryan v. Lynch, 68 Ill. 160; Weyand v. Stover, 35 Kan. 545, 11 Pac. 355; Re Ellis, 55 Minn. 401, 23 L.R.A. 287, 43 Am. St. Rep. 514, 56 N. W. 1056; Miesen v. Canfield, 64 Minn. 513, 67 N. W. 632.

And such a bill will be void where the journals show that it was not read section by section as the Constitution requires. Brown v. Collister, 5 Idaho, 589, 51 Pac. 417.

So, an enrolled bill will be declared void where the journals of the house do not show that it was read on three several days, notwithstanding the speaker of the house certified that the bill was read three times, since a sufficient compliance with such constitutional requirement was not thus shown. Union Bank v. Oxford, 119 N. C. 214, 34 L.R.A. 487, 25 S. E. 966; Smathers v. Madison County, 125 N. C. 480, 34 S. E. 554; Rodman-Heath Cotton Mills v. Waxhaw, 130 N. C. 293, 41 S. E. 488.

An enrolled bill has been held void where the journals showed that neither house properly passed an amendment to the title of the bill, which in effect created a new bill, by reading it three times as the Constitution directed. Erwin v. State, 116 Tenn. 71, 93 S. W. 73.

But where the Constitution does not require the journals to show that a bill was read three times, an enrolled bill cannot be impeached by evidence from such records custody of the Secretary of State, and having the official attestations of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of the President of the Senate, and of the President of the United States, carries on its face a solemn assurance by the legislative and executive departments of the government, charged, respectively, with the duty of enacting and executing the laws, that it was passed by Congress. The respect due to co-equal and independent departments requires the judicial department to act upon that assurance, and to accept as having passed Congress all bills authenticated in the manner stated, leaving the courts to determine, when the question properly arises, whether the act so authenticated is in conformity with the Constitution." The doctrine of the foregoing cases has been either approved or followed in the following cases from the Supreme Court: United States v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 3, 36 L. ed. 321, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 507; Lyons v. Woods, 153 U. S. 662, 38 L. ed. 858, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 959; Harwood v. Wentworth, 162 U. S. 558, 40 L. ed. 1069, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 890.

Referring to the dangers which may attend the application of this rule, and the abuses to which it might be subjected, the court, in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, said: "It is admitted that an enrolled act, thus authenticated, is sufficient evidence of itself—nothing to the contrary appearing upon its face—that it passed Congress. But the contention is that it cannot be regarded as a law of the United States if the showing that it was not read a first or second time, where the third reading was affirmatively shown by the journals, since under such circumstances the other readings will be presumed. Worthen v. Badgett, 32 Ark. 496; English v. Oliver, 28 Ark. 317; Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Colorado Loan & T. Co. 20 Colo. 1, 36 Pac. 793; Potter v. Lainhart, 44 Fla. 647, 33 So. 257; Weyand v. Stover, 35 Kan. 545, 11 Pac. 355; State v. McConnell, 3 Lea, 332; Price v. Moundsville, 43 W. Va. 523, 64 Am. St. Rep. 878, 27 S. E. 218; Henderson County v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 63 C. C. A. 467, 128 Fed. 817.

And a bill will be sustained where the journals show that it was read a second and third time, the first reading being presumed. Henderson County v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 63 C. C. A. 467, 128 Fed. 817; New Hanover County v. De Rosset, 129 N. C. 275, 40 S. E. 43; Black v. Buncombe County, 129 N. C. 121, 39 S. E. 818.

So, where the legislative journals show that a bill was passed, their silence as to whether it was read a second and third time, as the Constitution requires, will not invalidate the enrolled bill, where the fundamental law does not require the journals to show whether a bill is read. Glidewell v. Martin, 51 Ark. 559, 11 S. W. 883.

And, in the absence of such constitutional requirement, an enrolled bill will be sustained where the senate journal, as well as indorsements on the engrossed bill, show that it was read three times, notwithstanding the journal of the house is silent as to the readings of the bill therein. State ex rel. Applegate v. Taylor, 224 Mo. 393, 123 S. W. 893.

So, an enrolled bill will be sustained, in the absence of such constitutional requirement, where the legislative journals show that it was read by title only, without showing a proper suspension of the constitutional requirement that a bill should be read three times. Burks v. Jefferson County, 40 Ark. 200.

As to the competency of the calendar of the house to show whether a bill was read as the Constitution directed, see Black v. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Buncombe County, 129 N. C. 121, 39 S. E. 818, infra, IV. a, 7.

As to the competency of a bill as originally introduced into the legislature, together with indorsements thereon, to show that it was read as the Constitution directed, see New Hanover County v. De Rosset, infra, IV. a, 2.

As to showing by parol that a bill was not read as the Constitution required, see Carr v. Coke, infra, IV. b.

2. Suspension of such requirement.

The journals may be examined to ascertain whether three readings of a bill at length were dispensed with in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111; Tarr v. Western Loan & Sav. Co. 15 Idaho, 751, 99 Pac. 1049; Frellsen v. Mahan, 21 La. Ann. 79.

And, an enrolled bill will be void where the journals do not show that three readings thereof at length were dispensed with by an aye and nay vote of two thirds of the members present, as the Constitution requires. Weill v. Kenfield, supra.

But it was held in Burks v. Jefferson County, supra, that the silence of the journals as to the suspension of the constitutional requirement of reading a bill at length would not be sufficient to defeat an enrolled bill, where such record showed that it was read by title only, since the suspension of the rules would be presumed.

And where the journals showed that a motion to dispense with the reading at length of a bill before it was signed by the legislative officers was carried by 21 ayes, "nays, 0," and gave the names of those voting in the affirmative, it will be presumed, in the absence of an affirmative contrary showing on the journals, that only twenty-one members were present when the bill was signed. Uniontown v. State, 145 Ala. 471, 39 So. 814, 8 Ann. Cas. 320.

3. Reading bill before signing by legislative officers.

Compliance with a constitutional requirement that a bill shall be read in open ses-journal of either House fails to show that it passed in the precise form in which it was signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses, and approved by the President. It is said that, under any other view, it becomes possible for the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate to impose upon the people as a law a bill that was never passed by Congress. But this possibility is too remote to be seriously considered in the present inquiry. It suggests a deliberate conspiracy, to which the presiding officers, the committees on enrolled bills, and the clerks of the two Houses, must necessarily be parties; all acting with a common purpose to defeat an expression of the popular will in the mode prescribed by the Constitution. Judicial action based upon such a suggestion is forbidden by the respect due to a co-ordinate branch of the government. The evils that may result from the recognition of the principle that an enrolled act, in the custody of the Secretary of State, attested by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses of Congress, and the approval of the President, is conclusive evidence that it was passed by Congress according to the forms of the Constitution, would be far less than those that would certainly result from a rule making the validity of congressional enactments depend upon the manner in which the journals of the respective Houses are kept by the subordinate officers charged with the duty of keeping them." And to the same sion of the legislature before being signed by the presiding officers thereof will be presumed where the journals do not show it, the Constitution requiring the fact only of signing to be noted on such record. Adams v. Clark, 36 Colo. 65, 86 Pac. 642, 10 Ann. Cas. 774; Re Roberts, 5 Colo. 525; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Mead, 71 Mo. 272; and State ex rel. McCaffery v. Mason, 155 Mo. 486, 55 S. W. 636.

And an enrolled bill will be sustained as against the objection that the journals did not show that its title was read, as the Constitution requires, before the bill was signed by the presiding officer of the house, where the signing was shown, but the reading did not clearly appear, as the bill will be sustained on the theory that such officer did his duty. Arbuckle v. Pflaeging, — Wyo. —, 123 Pac. 918.

As to the effect of the failure of the journals to show the carrying of a motion to dispense with the reading of a bill before it is signed by the presiding officers of the legislature, see Uniontown v. State, supra, III. h. 2.

4. Indefinite suspension of action on bill.

The doctrine of conclusiveness of an enrolled bill has been applied where the journal, which was not required to show such fact, was silent as to the disposition of a pending motion to indefinitely postpone action on the bill. McNeal v. Ritterbusch, 29 Okla. 223, 116 Pac. 778; Miesen v. Canfield, 64 Minn. 513, 67 N. W. 632.

And enrolled bill cannot be impeached by the minutes of the stenographer of the house, which show that action thereon was indefinitely postponed, and never resumed. McNeal v. Ritterbusch, supra.

5. Adoption of substitute for enrolled bill.

In Clendaniel v. Conrad, — Del. —, 83 Atl. 1036, the journals were consulted in order to determine whether a substitute for an enrolled bill was adopted.

But the silence of the journals as to the adoption of a substitute for an enrolled bill 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

will not affect its validity where the Constitution does not require the journals to show the disposition of such matter. Chesney v. McClintock, 61 Kan. 94, 58 Pac. 993.

k. Sufficiency of vote by which bill was passed.

1. Passage with aid of votes of members illegally elected or seated.

An enrolled bill cannot be impeached by showing that it was passed by the aid of votes of members of the legislature who were illegally elected or seated, since the legislature is the sole judge of the qualifications of its members; Hughes v. Felton, 11 Colo. 489, 19 Pac. 444 (members elected from a county omitted from an act apportioning the state); People ex rel. Drake v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481; Auditor General v. Menominee County, 89 Mich. 552, 51 N. W. 483 (members illegally seated); State ex rel. Herron v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 348, 7 N. E. 447, 12 N. E. 829 (members seated by less than a quorum in an election contest); Lyons v. Woods, 153 U. S. 649, 38 L. ed. 854, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 959, affirming 5 N. M. 327, 21 Pac. 346; Chavez v. Luna, 5 N. M. 183, 21 Pac. 344 (members of the quorum that passed bill seated without certificate of election).

But it was held in State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Francis, 26 Kan. 737, that an enrolled bill was void where the journals disclosed that it was passed by the aid of votes of members of the legislature in excess of the number provided for by the Constitution.

As to the competency of parol evidence to show that a bill was passed by the aid of members of the legislature who were illegally seated, see State ex rel. Herron v. Smith, infra, IV. b.

2. Lack of constitutional majority.

(a) In general.

The legislative journals will be consulted in order to determine whether an enrolled point Mr. Justice Sawyer, in Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am. Dec. 93, said: "Better, far better, that a provision should occasionally find its way into the statute through mistake, or even fraud, than that every act, state and national, should at any and all times be liable to be put in issue and impeached by the journals, loose papers of the legislature, and parol evidence. Such a state of uncertainty in the statute laws of the land would lead to mischiefs absolutely intolerable."

We do not attempt to set out all the reasoning of the courts that has been given in support of the rule in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, nor of those courts that adhere to the opposite rule; for no useful purpose could be subserved thereby, and we can add nothing to the force of the argument that has been adduced to support either of the rules, or to show their respective weaknesses. The entire field on both sides has been thoroughly covered by the authorities cited above. To our minds the reasoning offered in support of the rule in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, is satisfactory, and the rule adopted in that case appears to us to be the sounder and better rule. In that case, however, the court specifically reserved from consideration and decision what the effect of matters expressly required by the Constitution to be entered on the journal, where the same are in conflict with the enrolled act, would have upon the validity of the act. The conflict between the journal and the authenticated act here complained bill was passed by a constitutional majority. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simons, 75 Kan. 130, 88 Pac. 551; Re Stickney, 185 N. Y. 107, 77 N. E. 993, affirming 110 App. Div. 204, 97 N. Y. Supp. 336, 209 U. S. 419, 52 L. ed. 863, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508; Re Weeks, 109 App. Div. 859, 96 N. Y. Supp. 876, affirmed without opinion in 185 N. Y. 541, 77 N. E. 1187; New York & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 540, 42 N. E. 1088; People v. Coney Island Jockey Club, 68 Misc. 302, 123 N. Y. Supp. 669. But see contra, Com. v. Hardin County Ct. 99 Ky. 188, 35 S. W. 275.

And an enrolled bill will be declared void if the journals affirmatively show that it did not, upon its final passage, receive a constitutional majority. State ex rel. Medical College v. Sowell, 143 Ala. 494, 39 So. 246; Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, 58 Am. Dec. 571; Kelley v. Secretary of State, 149 Mich. 343, 112 N. W. 978; Allen v. State Auditors, 122 Mich. 324, 47 L.R.A. 117, 80 Am. St. Rep. 573, 81 N. W. 113; Green v. Graves, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 357; Hurlbut v. Britain, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 191; Southworth v. Palmyra & J. R. Co. 2 Mich. 287; Palmer v. Bank of Zumbrota, 72 Minn. 266, 75 N. W. 380; State ex rel. Eastland v. Gould, 31 Minn. 189, 17 N. W. 276; McCormick v. State, 66 Neb. 337, 92 N. W. 606; State ex rel. Blessing v. Davis, 66 Neb. 333, 92 N. W. 740; People ex rel. Adsit v. Allen, 42 N. Y. 378; Purdy v. People, 4 Hill, 384, reversing 2 Hill, 31; Commercial Bank v. Sparrow, 2 Denio, 97; Fordyce v. Godman, 20 Ohio St. 1; McKinnon v. Cotner, 30 Or. 588, 49 Pac. 955; Currie v. Southern P. Co. 21 Or. 566, 28 Pac. 884; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. McGlamory, 92 Tex. 150, 41 S. W. 466; Ritchie v. Richards, 14 Utah, 345, 47 Pac. 670; Brown v. Nash, 1 Wyo. 85; Union P. R. Co. v. Carr, 1 Wyo. 96; Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 64 Fed. 165, affirmed on other points in 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418.

So, it was held in Ritchie v. Richards, 14 Utah, 345, 47 Pac. 670, that the court might resort to the legislative journals in order to determine whether an enrolled bill received a necessary majority, notwithstanding the Constitution did not require that the aye and nay vote should be entered thereon, except upon the request of any five members of the legislature.

But an enrolled bill by which the boundaries of a county were changed will not be declared void because the journal of the house does not show concurrence in an amendment thereto by a two-thirds majority, which the Constitution requires for enacting a bill for such purpose, since it will be presumed that such amendment modified the bill in some respect not affecting such boundaries. Jackson v. State, 131 Ala. 21, 31 So. 380.

Where the journal entries as to whether a bill was passed by a constitutional majority are so conflicting as to leave the question in doubt, the bill will be sustained on the presumption of regular enactment, where the contrary does not appear clearly, conclusively, and beyond all doubt. Homrighausen v. Knoche, 58 Kan. 646, 50 Pac. 879.

And in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simons, 75 Kan. 130, 88 Pac. 551, a bill was sustained, notwithstanding the journals showed that a constitutional majority did not vote for it, where a later entry, which would control, declared that it received a necessary majority, the presumption of regular enactment being applied.

So, it was held in Lincoln v. Haugan, 45 Minn. 451, 48 N. W. 196, that an enrolled bill would be sustained, notwithstanding the written copy of the senate journal, although it stated that there were twenty-seven affirmative votes on the bill, failed to give the names of the members who cast them, while it gave the names of seven members who voted in the negative, and the printed journal, which the court held must control, gave the names of those voting for and against the bill, and showed that it received a constitutional majority.

As to the impeachment of an enrolled bill on a stipulation to the effect that it was not passed by a constitutional majority, see Palmer v. Bank of Zumbrota, 72 Minn. 266, 75 N. W. 380, infra, IV. c.

of is not as to matters which, by the Constitution of this state, are expressly required to be entered on the journal. It is not contended upon the final passage of House Bill No. 168 the yeas and nays were not taken or not entered upon the journal. The journal shows that such was done. It is contended only that the journal shows that the enrolled act contains a provision that was not contained in the act when it was voted upon by both Houses. As before stated, there is no constitutional provision specifically requiring that the journal shall show the contents of an act when it is passed; and it is not contended in the instant case that the journal shows the entire contents of House Bill No. 168, but that sufficient is shown to establish that it does not contain the provision involved. What is the effect of failure to enter the names of those voting upon the final passage of a bill, where such record is required by constitutional provision to be made, was considered in State ex rel. Gregg v. Erickson, 39 Mont. 280, 102 Pac. 336, where the doctrine of Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark was approved; but, by reason of the specific requirement of the Constitution of Montana, directing that the yeas and nays upon the final passage of a bill shall be taken and entered upon the journal, it was held that failure to enter the vote as directed by the Constitution invalidated the act. This question is not involved in the instant case, and we now make no decision upon it. Section 35, art. 5, of the Constitution, supra, not

And as to sustaining bills by aid of the journals, in order to show that they were adopted by a constitutional majority, see infra, V. b.

(b) To pass bill over governor's veto.

An enrolled bill is void where the journals do not show that it was passed over the governor's veto by a necessary two-thirds majority. Brown v. Nash, 1 Wyo. 85; Union P. R. Co. v. Carr, 1 Wyo. 96.

(c) To give bill immediate effect.

The journals may be consulted to ascertain whether a bill was given immediate effect by a necessary majority. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. McGlamory, 92 Tex. 150, 41 S. W. 466; Ewing v. Duncan, 81 Tex. 230, 16 S. W. 1000.

I. Failure to record vote as Constitution directs.

1. In general.

In California, Georgia, and Kentucky, the doctrine of the absolute conclusiveness of an enrolled bill is held to apply, notwithstanding the journals do not show that, on the final passage of a bill, an aye and nay vote was taken, which, together with the names of those voting for and against it, was entered on the journals as the Constitution requires. Yolo County v. Colgan, 132 Cal. 265, 84 Am. St. Rep. 41, 64 Pac. 403; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 20, 69 S. E. 725; Lafferty v. Huffman, 99 Ky. 80, 32 L.R.A. 203, 35 S. W. 123; Owensboro & N. R. Co. v. Barclay, 102 Ky. 16, 43 S. W. 177.

But the weight of authority sustains the rule that an enrolled bill will be declared void where the journals fail to show that, upon the final passage thereof, an aye and nay vote was taken, which, together with the names of those voting for and against the measure, was spread on the journals as the Constitution requires. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599; State 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) ex rel. McKinley v. Martin, 160 Ala. 181, 48 So. 846; Glidewell v. Martin, 51 Ark. 559, 11 S. W. 882; State v. Corbett, 61 Ark. 226, 32 S. W. 686; Rogers v. State, 72 Ark. 565, 82 S. W. 169; State v. Bowman, 90 Ark. 174, 118 S. W. 711; Butler v. Fourche Drainage Dist. — Ark. —, 146 S. W. 120; Pueblo County v. Strait, 36 Colo. 137, 85 Pac. 178; Rio Grande Sampling Co. v. Catlin, 40 Colo. 450, 94 Pac. 323; Denver v. Rubidge, 51 Colo. 224, 116 Pac. 1130; Mathis v. State, 31 Fla. 291, 12 So. 681; Cohn v. Kingsley, 5 Idaho, 416, 38 L.R.A. 74, 49 Pac. 985; Rash v. Swan, 7 Wyo. 166, 40 L.R.A. 195, 75 Am. St. Rep. 889, 51 Pac. 209; Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 90 C. C. A. 166, 164 Fed. 180, a. c. on second appeal, 113 C. C. A. 316, 191 Fed. 692; Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 64 Fed. 165, affirmed on other grounds in 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; Stanly County v. Coler, 37 C. C. A. 484, 96 Fed. 284, reversing 89 Fed. 257, affirmed on rehearing in 51 C. C. A. 379, 113 Fed. 705, affirmed in 190 U. S. 437, 47 L. ed. 1126, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 811.

And in State ex rel. Brown v. Porter, 145 Ala. 541, 40 So. 144; Brandon v. Askew, — Ala. —, 54 So. 605; Swain v. Fritchman, 21 Idaho, 783, 125 Pac. 319, and O'Hara v. State, 121 Ala. 28, 25 So. 622, the legislative journals were examined in order to ascertain whether there had been a compliance with such constitutional mandate.

An enrolled bill may be impeached where the journals do not show that an amendment was adopted by an aye and nay vote which, together with the names of those voting for and against it, was entered on the journals as the Constitution requires. Montgomery Beer Bottling Works v. Gaston, 126 Ala. 425, 51 L.R.A. 396, 85 Am. St. Rep. 42, only requires that the presiding officer of each House shall sign all bills passed by the legislature, but that he shall perform such act in the presence of the House, and only after the act shall have been read publicly at length, and the fact of reading and signing shall be entered upon the journal, unless dispensed with by two-thirds vote of the quorum present. The journals of both houses disclose that House Bill No. 168 was read by the presiding officers of the respective houses, and signed in the presence of those respective bodies. The correctness of that enrolled bill, therefore, is not alone attested by the signatures of the presiding officers, but by the acquiescence of the entire membership of the legislative bodies in the signing and attesting thereof by the presiding officers. This is the last official record upon the journals of the proceeding in the passage of this bill. That record, unless the integrity of the entire legislative bodies is to be impeached, is one that attests that the bill signed by the presiding officers is the one that was duly and regularly enacted by the respective houses. This provision of the Constitution requiring the signatures of the presiding officers to be made to the bill in the presence of the legislative bodies, after the act has been publicly read at length, makes the authenticated bill as much a record of constitutional requirement as any part of the journal, and is an additional reason why the rule announced in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, should be adopted in this state; and we therefore hold that 28 So. 497; Board of Revenue v. Crow, 141 Ala. 126, 37 So. 469; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599; Rogers v. State, 72 Ark. 565, 82 S. W. 169; Cohn v. Kingsley, 5 Idaho, 416, 38 L.R.A. 74, 49 Pac. 985.

Where the journals are silent as to whether an aye and nay vote was taken upon an amendment to a bill, it will be presumed that the bill was properly passed, unless the Constitution requires that the vote upon amendments should be noted upon such records. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599.

The failure to record on the journal the names of the members who voted in the negative will invalidate an enrolled bill, where the Constitution requires the names of those voting for and against a measure to be recorded on the journals. State ex rel. McKinley v. Martin, 160 Ala. 181, 48 So. 846.

But in People ex rel. Wies v. Bowman, 247 Ill. 276, 93 N. E. 244, it was held that the failure to enter the negative vote on the journals would not defeat an enrolled bill, since it would be presumed that there were no such votes cast.

As the legislative journals import absolute verity, their failure to disclose compliance with a constitutional mandate that the aye and nay votes upon the final passage of a bill shall be entered thereon cannot be supplied by intentment or other evidence. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, supra.

Where the journals do not show compliance with a constitutional mandate as to an aye and nay vote, and the entry of the names thereon of those voting for and against a bill, such defect cannot be remedied by a marginal notation on the journal, made some months after the vote was taken, showing compliance with such mandate. Montgomery Beer Bottling Works v. Gaston, 126 Ala. 425, 51 L.R.A. 306, 85 Am. St. Rep. 42, 28 So. 497.

But it was held in State ex rel. Douglas County v. Frank, 60 Neb. 327, 83 N. W. 76, same case on rehearing in 61 Neb. 679, 85 N. W. 956, that where the pages relating to the passage of a bill were missing from the journals, and such records were so badly mutilated and incomplete that they did not disclose observance of a constitutional mandate that the ayes and nays, together with the names of those voting for and against a bill, should be recorded on the journals, the silence of such records would not be sufficient to defeat an enrolled bill, where it was shown by other evidence that it was regularly passed and the vote properly recorded.

And an enrolled bill will be sustained where, from all the journal entries, it sufficiently appears that an aye and nay vote was actually taken and, was together with the names of those voting for and against the bill entered on the journals, as the Constitution requires. Arbuckle v. Pflaeving, — Wyo. —, 123 Pac. 918.

It was held in Butler v. Fourche Drainage Dist. — Ark. —, 146 S. W. 120, that where, in recording the vote on a bill, the journal, as the result of an error, referred to the bill by a wrong number, the bill would be sustained, where the various journal entries, together with the bill as introduced into the legislature, and the various indorsements thereon, which were made by the officers of the legislature, identified the enrolled bill as the one actually passed. But the court expressly stated that it did not intend to hold that the journals could be contradicted by such evidence, but that it was resorted to, with other records, for the purpose of identification only.

In Uniontown v. State, 145 Ala. 471, 39 So. 814, 8 Ann. Cas. 320, it was held that an enrolled bill could not be impeached on the ground that a motion to dispense with the reading thereof at length was not properly adopted, because the journals stated that there were twenty-one ayes, nays 0, and gave the names of those voting in the affirmative, since it would be presumed, in the absence of a contrary affirmative showing from the journals, that those voting in the affirmative constituted a necessary two thirds of the quorum present.

See Rio Grande Sampling Co. v. Catlin, infra, IV. a. 9, as to the competency of a when an enrolled bill has been signed by the speaker of the house and by the president of the senate in the presence of those respective bodies, immediately after the bill has been read publicly in full, and the same has been approved by the governor and deposited in the office of the secretary of state, it is not competent to show from the journals of the house that the act so authenticated, approved, and deposited did not pass in the form in which it was signed by the presiding officers and approved by the governor.

Section 20, art. 10, of the Constitution provides that "the legislature shall not impose taxes for the purpose of any county, city, town, or other municipal corporation, but may, by general laws, confer on the proper authorities thereof, respectively, the power to assess and collect such taxes." It is urged by able counsel for the railway company that the levy of $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 mill tax for common school purposes, authorized by House Bill No. 168, is a tax for the purpose of a municipal corporation; and that the foregoing section of the Constitution prohibits the levy of such tax by the legislature. Whether this contention can be sustained depends upon whether a levy of a tax for the purpose of supporting the public schools of the state is a levy for a municipal purpose. Although this question has not been directly presented to this court heretofore in a tax case, it was, in effect, presented in the case of Board of Education v. State, 26 Okla. 366, 109 Pac. 563.

report of a legislative committee to show that a bill was passed by a necessary aye and nay vote, where the legislative journals did not disclose it.

2. As required by statute in North Carolina on bills raising revenue or pledging credit of state or municipality.

In North Carolina an enrolled bill to raise money on the credit of the state, to impose a tax, or to allow counties, cities, or towns to do likewise, may be impeached by the failure of the journals to show that an aye and nay vote was taken upon the second and third reading of the bill, and entered together with the names of those voting for and against it, on the journals, as the Constitution commands. Union Bank v. Oxford, 119 N. C. 214, 34 L.R.A. 487, 25 S. E. 966; Stanly County v. Snuggs, 121 N. C. 394, 39 L.R.A. 439, 28 S. E. 539; Rodman v. Washington, 122 N. C. 39, 30 S. E. 118; Charlotte v. Shepard, 122 N. C. 602, 29 S. E. 842; Wilkes County v. Call, 123 N. C. 308, 44 L.R.A. 252, 31 S. E. 481; Smathers v. Madison County, 125 N. C. 480, 34 S. E. 554; Slocumb v. Fayetteville, 125 N. C. 362, 34 S. E. 436; Glenn v. Wray, 126 N. C. 730, 36 S. E. 167; New Hanover County v. De Rosset, 129 N. C. 275, 40 S. E. 43; Rodman-Heath Cotton Mills v. Waxhaw, 130 N. Armour Packing Co.* 135 N. C. 62, 47 S. E. 411; Salem v. Wachovia Loan & T. Co. 143 N. C. 110, 118 Am. St. Rep. 791, 55 S. E. 442; Lumberton Improv. Co. v. Robeson County, 146 N. C. 353, 59 S. E. 1014; Wittkowsky v. Jackson County, 150 N. C. 90, 63 S. E. 275; Raleigh Sav. Bank v. Lacy, 151 N. C. 3, 65 S. E. 444; Richmond County v. Farmers' Bank, 152 N. C. 387, 67 S. E. 969, 21 Ann. Cas. 812; Stanly County v. Coler, 37 C. C. A. 484, 96 Fed. 284, reversing 89 Fed. 257, affirmed on re-40 L.R.A. (N.S.) hearing in 51 C. C. A. 379, 113 Fed. 705, and affirmed in 190 U. S. 437, 47 L. ed. 1126, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 811; Henderson County v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 63 C. C. A. 467, 128 Fed. 817.

If either house makes a material amendment to such a bill, it will be void unless the other house concurs therein by an aye and nay vote, which shall be entered on the journals in the same manner as upon the passage of the original bill. Glenn v. Wray, 126 N. C. 730, 36 S. E. 167.

But if such amendment does not increase the tax imposed by the bill, it may be adopted by concurrence of both houses in the ordinary manner. Chatham County v. Stafford, 138 N. C. 453, 50 S. E. 862.

Where a legislative clerk fails to enter the aye and nay vote and the names of those voting for and against a bill of such character, a subsequent correction of the journal in this respect, at a special session of the same legislature, will cure the defect. Richmond County v. Farmers' Bank, 162 N. C. 387, 67 S. E. 969, 21 Ann. Cas. 812.

But an enrolled bill of such character will not be declared void because the journals do not show the names of those voting in the negative, where they recite the number of affirmative votes only, as it will be presumed that a unanimous vote was cast and recorded. Onslow County v. Tollman, 76 C. C. A. 317, 145 Fed. 753, affirming 140 Fed. 89; Salem v. Wachovia Loan & T. Co. 143 N. C. 110, 118 Am. St. Rep. 791, 55 S. E. 442, overruling Debnam v. Chitty, 131 N. C. 657, 43 S. E. 3. See also Smathers v. Madison County, 125 N. C. 480, 34 S. E. 554, in effect overruled by the last case.

But see also New Hanover County v. De Rosset, 129 N. C. 275, 40 S. E. 43, holding such a bill void where the journal did not show the names of those voting in the negative, but gave the number of affirmative and negative votes.

Where the journals show a compliance with such constitutional requirement, no evidence, such as entries on original bill, will be received to contradict it. New Hanover County v. Armour Packing Co. 135 N. C. 62, 47 S. E. 411.

In the first paragraph of the syllabus to that case, it is said: "The free public system, which the legislature is directed to establish by article 13 of the Constitution, is a matter of general state concern, and not a municipal affair."

In support of this conclusion, Mr. Justice Kane, who delivered the opinion of the court, offered, among others, the following reasons: "That it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution to intrust this important function of government to a minor political subdivision of the state is quite apparent from the casual examination of the provisions of that instrument pertaining to this subject. Section 1 of article 13, entitled 'Education,' provides that 'the legislature shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools,' etc. Section 3 provides that 'separate schools for white and colored children, with like accommodation, shall be provided by the legislature, and impartially maintained,' etc. Section 4 provides that 'the legislature shall provide for the compulsory attendance at some public school, unless other means of education,' etc. Section 6 provides that 'the legislature shall provide for a uniform system of text-books for the common schools of the state.' And section 7 provides that 'the legislature shall provide for the teaching of the elements of agriculture, horticulture, stock feeding, and domestic science in the common schools of the state.' All of these commands are directed to the legislature. The word 'sys-

m. Passage of bill after time limited by Constitution.

On the theory of the absolute conclusiveness of an enrolled bill, it has been held that it cannot be impeached by showing that it was passed, in violation of the Constitution, within two days of adjournment of the legislature. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taggart, 141 Ind. 281, 60 L.R.A. 671, 40 N. E. 1051.

n. Bill not signed by presiding officers of legislature in manner directed by Constitution.

There is much conflict as to whether an enrolled bill may be impeached because not signed by the legislative officers in the manner directed by the Constitution.

Thus, in the absence of a constitutional requirement that the signing of a bill by the presiding officers of the legislature in the presence of the respective houses shall be shown by the journals, unless the contrary appears, it will be presumed that an enrolled bill which the journals show was passed was enacted in compliance with all the requirements of law. Pelt v. Payne, 60 Ark. 637, 30 S. W. 426; Narregang v. Brown Country, 14 S. D. 357, 85 N. W. 602; Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Carver, 118 N. C. 328, 24 S. E. 352.

So, in State ex rel. Bray v. Long, 21 Mont. 26, 52 Pac. 645, the failure of the journals to show the signing of the bill was held not to defeat the enrolled bill, although the constitutional provision in this respect was mandatory, at least in form, as it required that "the fact of signing shall be at once entered upon the journals." But the value of the case as a precedent is impaired, if not absolutely destroyed, by Palatine Ins. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 34 Mont. 268, 85 Pac. 1032, 9 Ann. Cas. 579.

And it was held in Home Teleg. Co. v. Nashville, 118 Tenn. 1, 101 S. W. 770, 11 Ann. Cas. 824, that the failure of the journals to show the signing of the bill, as required by a constitutional provision that no bill shall become a law until it has been 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) signed by the respective speakers in open session, "the fact of such signing to be noted on the journals," does not defeat an enrolled bill, as the provision as to the showing on the journals is directory.

So an enrolled bill cannot be impeached on the ground that the journals do not show that it was signed by the presiding officers of the legislature, as required by a rule thereof. Miller v. Oelwein, — Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 1045; Gray v. Taylor, 15 N. M. 742, 113 Pac. 588.

An enrolled bill that the journals show was regularly passed cannot be impeached on the ground that the entry showing the signing thereof by the legislative officers preceded that showing the passage of the bill. Goff v. Rickerson, 61 Fla. 29, 54 So. 264.

But an enrolled bill may be impeached by the silence of the journals as to the signing of a bill by the presiding officers of the legislature in open session, where the Constitution declares that such fact shall be noted on the journals. Lynch v. Hutchinson, 219 Ill. 193, 76 N. E. 370, 4 Ann. Cas. 904; State ex rel. McClay v. Mickey, 73 Neb. 281, 119 Am. St. Rep. 894, 102 N. W. 679; State ex rel. Coffin v. Howell, 26 Nev. 93, 64 Pac. 466; Hunt v. State, 22 Tex. App. 396, 3 S. W. 233; George Bolln Co. v. North Platte Valley Irrig. Co. — Wyo. —, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 868, 121 Pac. 22.

And the journals were examined in the following cases, in order to ascertain whether there had been a compliance with such a constitutional mandate: O'Hara v. State, 121 Ala. 28, 25 So. 622; Mitchell v. Gadsden, 145 Ala. 132, 40 So. 350; Lee v. Gadsden, 146 Ala. 689, 40 So. 351; State ex rel. Woodward v. Skeggs, 154 Ala. 249, 46 So. 268; Adams v. Clark, 36 Colo. 65, 85 Pac. 642, 10 Ann. Cas. 774; Re Roberts, 5 Colo. 525; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Mead, 71 Mo. 266; State ex rel. McCaffery v. Mason, 155 Mo. 486, 55 S. W. 636; State ex rel. Hynds v. Cahill, 12 Wyo. 225, 75 Pac. 433; Young v. Hehn, 12 Wyo. 289, 109 Am. St. Rep. 986, 75 Pac. 443.

An enrolled bill will be declared void where the journals do not show that it was tem' itself imports a unity of purpose, as well as an entirety of operation, and the direction to the legislature to 'establish and maintain a system of free public schools' means one system, which shall be applicable to all the public schools within the state. Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 Pac. 558. And the idea of unity of purpose and entirety of operation is emphasized and made more apparent by the other excerpts from the Constitution above quoted."

No good cause has been shown to us in this case why the views in the foregoing case should be changed. The mandate of the Constitution to establish and maintain public schools throughout the state is directed to the legislature of the entire state, and not to any of the political subdivisions of the state. The establishment and maintenance of the free public schools is a state function; and the legislature is not only authorized to levy a tax to defray all expenses of the state in the administration of its affairs, but by § 2, art. 10, it is made the duty of the legislature to provide by law for an annual tax sufficient, with other resources, to defray the ordinary expenses of the state for each fiscal year.

Section 3, art. 11, of the Constitution, reads as follows: "The interest and income of the permanent school fund, the net income from the leasing of public lands which have been or may be granted by the United States to the state for the use and benefit of the common schools, together with any signed by the presiding officers of each house in the presence thereof, immediately after the title of the bill had been publicly read, notwithstanding the indorsements on the bill showed that such constitutional requirement had been complied with. George Bolln Co. v. North Platte Valley Irrig. Co. — Wyo. —, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 868, 121 Pac. 22.

But it was held in State ex rel. Woodward v. Skeggs, 154 Ala. 249, 46 So. 268, and Re Roberts, 5 Colo. 525, that all the journals need show was the fact of signing the bill by the presiding officers of the legislature, and not that it was done in the presence of the legislative body.

As to showing by the indorsements on a bill as originally introduced into the legislature, whether it was signed by the presiding officers of the legislature, as the Constitution directed, see George Bolln Co. v. North Platte Valley Irrig. Co. infra, IV. a, 2.

As to showing by parol that the signing of a bill by the presiding officers of the legislature was fraudulently obtained, see Carr v. Coke, infra, IV.

o. Nonpresentation of bill to governor within time prescribed by Constitution.

It was held in State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Mead, 71 Mo. 271, on the ground that a constitutional requirement that the legislative journals should show that a bill was presented by the secretary of the house to the governor for his approval on the day the bill was passed was directory merely, since it did not relate to the passage thereof,—that the rule as to the silence of the journals as to compliance with such a requirement was not applicable.

p. Nonapproval of bill by governor.

An enrolled bill cannot be impeached by showing that it did not receive the approval of the governor within the time prescribed by the Constitution. State ex rel. Crenshaw v. Joseph, — Ala. —, 57 So. 942; Morris v. Newark, 73 N. J. L. 268, 67 Atl. 1005; 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Bloomfield v. Middlesex County, 74 N. J. L. 261, 65 Atl. 890; People ex rel. Haller v. Clayton, 5 Utah, 598, 18 Pac. 628; Capito v. Topping, 65 W. Va. 587, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1089, 64 S. E. 845; Gibson v. Anderson, 65 C. C. A. 277, 131 Fed. 39.

Nor can an enrolled bill be impeached by evidence that the executive approved it on a day different from the date it bore. Gibson v. Anderson, 65 C. C. A. 277, 131 Fed. 39.

It was held in People ex rel. Haller v. Clayton, 5 Utah, 598, 18 Pac. 628, that the records of the secretary of state's office showing the date the legislature adjourned cannot be contradicted by the legislative journals, in order to show that an enrolled bill was not approved by the governor, after the adjournment of the legislature, within the time limited by the Constitution.

But in Powell v. Hays, 83 Ark. 448, 104 S. W. 177, 13 Ann. Cas. 220, it was held that in determining whether an enrolled bill was vetoed by the governor, the court might consider his proclamation to the effect that he found such bill when he assumed office, and that he erased his predecessor's approval therefrom, and vetoed the bill.

As to competency of records and proclamations of governor to show nonapproval of a bill, see infra, IV. a, 4.

As to the competency of parol evidence to show nonapproval of a bill by the governor, see infra, IV. b.

q. Enrolled bill different from that passed.

1. Different title.

In order to ascertain whether the title of an enrolled bill is the same as that adopted by the legislature, the journals may be examined. Stein v. Leeper, 78 Ala. 517; Abernathy v. State, 78 Ala. 411; State v. Bethea, 61 Fla. 60, 55 So. 550; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Green, 36 Fla. 154, 18 So. 334; State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 revenues derived from taxes authorized to be levied for such purposes, and any other sums which may be added thereto by law, shall be used and applied each year for the benefit of the common schools of the state, and shall be, for this purpose, apportioned among and between all the several common school districts of the state in proportion to the school population of the several districts, and no part of the fund shall ever be diverted from this purpose, or used for any other purpose than the support and maintenance of common schools for the equal benefit of all the people of the state." The language of the foregoing section, italicized by us, indicates that the framers of the Constitution contemplated that there would be funds derived from taxes for school purposes to be distributed; and said section prescribed how the same, together with other funds available to the state for the support of its public schools, shall be distributed. The railway company, in opposition to this inference, suggests that this language refers only to taxes "authorized;" and that by reason of § 20, art. 10, of the Constitution, no inference in support of the power of the legislature to levy a state tax for school purposes can follow from the foregoing section. If the railway company's contention be correct, then the language italicized is without any meaning whatever; but provisions in a Constitution that are usually drafted after careful and deliberate consideration by the framers, and are subsequently examined

Fla. 358, 18 So. 767; State ex rel. Godard v. Andrews, 64 Kan. 474, 67 Pac. 870; Belleville v. Wells, 74 Kan. 823, 88 Pac. 47; Stephens v. Labette County, 79 Kan. 153, 98 Pac. 790; Union P. R. Co. v. Sprague, 69 Neb. 48, 95 N. W. 46; Price v. Moundsville, 43 W. Va. 523, 64 Am. St. Rep. 878, 27 S. E. 218; Milwaukee County v. Isenring, 109 Wis. 9, 53 L.R.A. 635, 85 N. W. 131.

And where the title is a material part of a bill, an enrolled bill may be impeached by an affirmative showing from the journals to the effect that its title differs from that adopted by the legislature. Stein v. Lepper, 78 Ala. 517; Wade v. Atlantic Lumber Co. 51 Fla. 628, 41 So. 72; Fillmore v. Van Horn, 129 Mich. 52, 88 N. W. 69; Weis v. Ashley, 59 Neb. 494, 80 Am. St. Rep. 704, 81 N. W. 318; State v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 60 Neb. 741, 84 N. W. 254; Erwin v. State, 116 Tenn. 71, 93 S. W. 73; Simpson v. Union Stock Yards Co. 110 Fed. 799; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Smyth, 103 Fed. 376.

Thus, this doctrine has been applied where the journals disclosed that different titles were adopted by the house and senate. Fillmore v. Van Horn, 129 Mich. 52, 88 N. W. 69; State v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 60 Neb. 741, 84 N. W. 254; and Erwin v. State, 116 Tenn. 71, 93 S. W. 73.

But an enrolled bill will not be declared void in the absence of an affirmative showing from the legislative journals that its title as approved was not the same as that adopted by the legislature. State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, 18 So. 767.

So, an enrolled bill is not rendered void by an immaterial alteration of its title after passage and before approval. Stein v. Lepper, 78 Ala. 517; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Green, 36 Fla. 154, 18 So. 334; People ex rel. Gale v. Onondaga, 16 Mich. 254; State v. Doherty, 3 Idaho, 384, 29 Pac. 855; Union P. R. Co. v. Sprague, 69 Neb. 48, 95 N. W. 46.

And where the journals leave it in doubt whether the title of an enrolled bill was altered before approval, the presumption of regular enactment will prevail, and the bill 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

will be sustained. State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, 18 S. W. 767; State ex rel. Godard v. Andrews, 64 Kan. 474, 67 Pac. 870; Stephens v. Labette County, 79 Kan. 153, 98 Pac. 790; Belleville v. Wells, 74 Kan. 823, 88 Pac. 47.

So, where the journals show that the title borne by an enrolled bill is not the same as that adopted by the legislature, the journal recitals cannot be impeached. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Smyth, 103 Fed. 376.

As to the effect of an affirmative showing from the journals of nonconcurrence by one house of the legislature in an amendment to the title of a bill, see Erwin v. State, infra, III. q. 3.

As to showing by a bill as originally introduced into the legislature, that the title of the enrolled bill differed from the title of the bill as adopted by the legislature, see Com. v. Martin, infra, IV. a. 2.

2. Difference in substance.

Some courts hold that, in the absence of a constitutional requirement that the journals shall show the contents of bills, an enrolled bill cannot be impeached by a showing from the journals that it is not in the same form as that in which it was passed. Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495; State ex rel. Gregg v. Erickson, 39 Mont. 280, 102 Pac. 336; ATCHISON, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. STATE; McNeal v. Ritterbusch, 29 Okla. 223, 116 Pac. 778.

And in State ex rel. Reed v. Jones, 6 Wash. 452, 23 L.R.A. 340, 34 Pac. 201, and Duncan v. Combs, 131 Ky. 330, 115 S. W. 222, it was held that the rule of absolute conclusiveness applied, and that an enrolled bill could not be impeached by evidence of the journals showing that it differed from the bill as passed.

But, on the other hand, the weight of authority sustains the rule that an enrolled bill may be impeached by an affirmative showing from the journals to the effect that the bill, as enrolled and approved by the and considered by the people before they are adopted, are not presumed to have been added for no purpose whatever; and a construction of them that renders them meaningless will be avoided, where they are susceptible of a construction that will give them force and effect, without rendering them clearly in conflict with other provisions of the Constitution. Section 9, art. 10, of the Constitution, places a limitation upon the amount of ad valorem taxes that may be levied for all purposes by the state, county, township, city or town, and school district for any one year. The limitations prescribed by said section are as follows: "State levy, not more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ mills; county levy, not more than 8 mills; provided, that any county may levy not exceeding 2 mills additional for county high school and aid to the common schools of the county, not over 1 mill of which shall be for such high school, and the aid to said common schools shall be apportioned as provided by law; township levy, not more than 5 mills; city or town levy, not more than 10 mills; school district levy, not more than 5 mills on the dollar for school district purposes, for support of common school; provided, that the aforesaid annual rate for school purposes may be increased by any school district by an amount not to exceed 10 mills on the dollar valuation, on condition that a majority of the voters thereof voting at an election vote for said increase."

governor, materially differed from that passed. Jones v. Hutchinson, 43 Ala. 721; Abernathy v. State, 78 Ala. 411; Robertson v. State, 130 Ala. 164, 30 So. 494; Yancy v. Waddell, 139 Ala. 524, 36 So. 733; Board of Revenue v. Crow, 141 Ala. 126, 37 So. 469; King Lumber Co. v. Crow, 155 Ala. 504, 130 Am. St. Rep. 65, 46 So. 646; West End v. Simmons, 165 Ala. 359, 51 So. 638; Burr v. Ross, 19 Ark. 250; Scott v. Clark County, 34 Ark. 283; Rogers v. State, 72 Ark. 565, 82 S. W. 169; Robertson v. People, 20 Colo. 279, 38 Pac. 326, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 284; West v. State, 50 Fla. 154, 39 So. 412; State ex rel. Cheyney v. Sammons, — Fla. —, 57 So. 196; State v. Mulkey, 6 Idaho, 617, 59 Pac. 17; People ex rel. Oliver v. Knopf, 198 Ill. 340, 64 N. E. 843, 1127; Berry v. Baltimore & D. P. R. Co. 41 Md. 446, 20 Am. Rep. 69; Opinion of Justices, — N. H. —, 81 Atl. 170; State ex rel. Casper v. Moore, 37 Neb. 13, 55 N. W. 299; State v. Abbott, 59 Neb. 106, 80 N. W. 499; Territory ex rel. McMahon v. O'Connor, 5 Dak. 397, 3 L.R.A. 355, 41 N. W. 746; Burke v. Cincinnati, 10 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 542, 8 Ohio N. P. 108; State v. Rogers, 22 Or. 348, 30 Pac. 74; Jackson v. Weis & L. Mfg. Co. 124 Tenn. 421, 137 S. W. 757; State v. Wendler, 94 Wis. 369, 68 N. W. 759; Milwaukee County v. Isenring, 109 Wis. 9, 53 L.R.A. 635, 85 N. W. 131.

So, enrolled bills have been held void where the journals showed that several sections were omitted from a bill as approved by the governor (West End v. Simmons, 165 Ala. 359, 51 So. 638; King Lumber Co. v. Crow, 155 Ala. 504, 130 Am. St. Rep. 65, 46 So. 646); or that an enrolled bill contained matter that was stricken from the bill before its passage (State v. Wendler, 94 Wis. 369, 68 N. W. 759, and Opinion of Justices, — N. H. —, 81 Atl. 170).

In Nebraska it is conceded that the enrolled bill may be impeached by an affirmative showing from the journals that it was not passed in the same form; but it is held that it cannot be impeached by the mere silence of the journals as to matters that ought to be recorded therein. Colburn v. McDonald, 72 Neb. 431, 100 N. W. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The fact that the journals show the adoption of an amendment which was not in the enrolled bill is not a sufficient affirmative showing to defeat it on the ground that it did not pass in the form in which it was enrolled, since, for all that appeared, the amendment might have been reconsidered and defeated. McKinnon v. Cotner, 30 Or. 588, 49 Pac. 956.

So, since the Constitution of Florida does not require the nature of amendments to bills to be disclosed by the journals of the legislature, an enrolled bill cannot be impeached by a showing from such records to the effect that an amendment that was in an enrolled bill was rejected by the legislature, since such evidence was not sufficient affirmatively to show that the amendment was not adopted at a subsequent time, without appearing on the journals. West v. State, 50 Fla. 154, 39 So. 412; State ex rel. Cheyney v. Sammons, — Fla. —, 57 So. 196.

In State ex rel. Casper v. Moore, 37 Neb. 13, 55 N. W. 299, an appropriation bill was sustained as to the amount named in the bill as passed, notwithstanding an engrossing clerk added the sum of $10,000 thereto before the bill was enrolled.

But the failure of the journals to show the disposition of a motion to reconsider the rejection of an amendment that appeared in the enrolled bill will not be sufficient to defeat the bill, unless the Constitution requires such disposition to be shown by the journals, since it will be presumed that such motion prevailed, and that the amendment was subsequently adopted. State ex rel. Whitson v. Algood, 87 Tenn. 163, 10 S. W. 310.

As to the competency of parol evidence to show that an enrolled bill differs from the bill passed, see Annapolis v. Harwood, infra, IV. b.

As to the competency of the bill as originally introduced, to show that the enrolled bill differs from that actually passed, see infra, IV. a, 2.

As to the competency of a certificate which the state may levy a tax, but only fixes a limitation upon the amount it may levy for all purposes. Nor can it be inferred, because this section places a limitation upon the amount of tax that may be levied for school purposes by a school district, that it was intended thereby to prohibit the state from levying any tax for school purposes. It is quite common for the states, in maintaining a system of public schools, not only to levy a state tax to aid in the support of such schools, but to provide school districts with a system of government invested with power to levy tax for school district purposes, to supplement the funds and efforts of the state to maintain a public school system; and the various school districts may thereby increase their public school facilities, subject to the limitations upon their power to tax, as the inhabitants of such districts may feel disposed to do. Section 9, supra, does nothing further than place two limitations upon the power of any such school district to levy a tax. The first limitation applies when the levy is made by proper authorities, without a vote of the people. The other limitation is upon the increase over the first levy, that may be made by a vote of the people of the district. To hold that the Constitution has made it the mandatory duty of the legislature, as it clearly has, to establish and maintain a system of free schools; to establish separate schools for white and colored children; to provide for compulsory attendance at

of the chief clerks of the two houses of the legislature, to show that the contents of an enrolled bill differ from the bill as passed, see Annapolis v. Harwood, infra, IV. a. 6.

As to showing by the stipulations of litigants that an enrolled bill differed from the bill passed, see Re Granger, infra, IV. c.

3. Nonconcurrence in amendments.

Some courts hold that, unless the Constitution declares that the journals shall show the concurrence of one branch of the legislature in an amendment to a bill made by the other branch, the silence of the journals as to such concurrence in an amendment that appears in an enrolled bill is not sufficient to defeat it. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599; Weis v. Stubblefield, 85 Kan. 199, 116 Pac. 205; Re Taylor, 60 Kan. 87, 55 Pac. 340; Chesney v. McClintock, 61 Kan. 94, 58 Pac. 993; State ex rel. Oldham v. Dean, 84 Neb. 344, 121 N. W. 719; State ex rel. Wahoo Waterworks Co. v. Wahoo, 62 Neb. 40, 86 N. W. 923; Jackson v. Weis & L. Mfg. Co. 124 Tenn. 421, 137 S. W. 757; State ex rel. Whitson v. Algood, 87 Tenn. 163, 10 S. W. 310; School Dist. No. 11 v. Chapman, 82 C. C. A. 35, 152 Fed. 887, certiorari denied in 205 U. S. 545, 51 L. ed. 923, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 792.

And, in the absence of a constitutional mandate that the journals shall show amendments to bills, the fact that an enrolled bill did not contain an amendment which the journals show was passed will not render the bill void, since it will be presumed that such amendment was reconsidered and receded from. Burks v. Jefferson County, 40 Ark. 200.

So, an enrolled bill cannot be impeached on the ground that the journal of one house shows that of four amendments which appeared in an enrolled bill, such house concurred in but two of them. Conley v. Dilley, — Iowa, —, 133 N. W. 730.

Where such a degree of carelessness is disclosed in the preparation of the legislative journals as would justify the court 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) in refusing to accept their silence as against the affirmative showing of an enrolled bill, it will not be declared void because the concurrence of both houses of the legislature in an amendment contained in the enrolled bill is not shown by the journals. State ex rel. Wahoo Waterworks Co. v. Wahoo, 62 Neb. 40, 86 N. W. 923; State ex rel. Oldham v. Dean, 84 Neb. 344, 121 N. W. 719.

And where the journal entries relating to the adoption of an amendment that appears in an enrolled bill are contradictory, the bill will be sustained upon the presumption of regular enactment. Re Taylor, 60 Kan. 87, 55 Pac. 340.

But, on the other hand, other courts hold that they may go back of an enrolled bill to the legislative journals, to ascertain whether an amendment was duly concurred in. Scott v. Clark County, 34 Ark. 283; Rogers v. State, 72 Ark. 565, 82 S. W. 169; Jackson v. Weis & L. Mfg. Co. 124 Tenn. 421, 137 S. W. 757; Pueblo County v. Strait, 36 Colo. 137, 85 Pac. 178; State ex rel. Cheyney v. Sammons, — Fla. —, 57 So. 196; Callison v. Brake, 63 C. C. A. 354, 129 Fed. 196, affirming 122 Fed. 722.

And where the journals affirmatively show that one branch of the legislature did not concur in an amendment adopted by the other, an enrolled bill containing such amendment will be void. Rogers v. State, 72 Ark. 565, 82 S. W. 169; State v. Savings Bank, 79 Conn. 141, 64 Atl. 5; State ex rel. Cheyney v. Sammons, — Fla. —, 57 So. 196; People ex rel. Oliver v. Knopf, 198 Ill. 340, 64 N. E. 843, 1127; State ex rel. Caillouet v. Laiche, 105 La. 84, 29 So. 700; Rode v. Phelps, 80 Mich. 598, 45 N. W. 493; Moore v. Neece, 80 Neb. 600, 114 N. W. 767; Territory ex rel. McMahon v. O'Connor, 5 Dak. 397, 3 L.R.A. 355, 44 N. W. 746; State ex rel. Rogers v. Price, 8 Ohio C. C. 25, 4 Ohio C. D. 296; State ex rel. Cheyenne v. Swan, 7 Wyo. 166, 40 L.R.A. 195, 71 Am. St. Rep. 889, 51 Pac. 209.

But the contrary, however, was held in De Loach v. Newton, 134 Ga. 739, 68 S. E. 708, 20 Ann. Cas. 342; and State ex rel.

such schools; to provide for a uniform system of text-books; and to require certain subjects to be taught in the schools, and yet had denied to the legislature the power to levy taxes to raise funds with which to accomplish these purposes,—is to hold that the Constitution has provided a means to defeat its own purposes; that it has imposed a duty without conferring the power to execute it. The tax levied by House Bill No. 168 is not levied upon any special district or districts in the state, but is levied uniformly upon the property of the entire state. It is not levied for the benefit of any certain school district or districts of the state, but is levied for the benefit of all the schools of the state. The only feature about the tax whatever, that in any way connects it with the school districts of the state, is that in the distribution thereof it is apportioned to the districts, to be expended in the maintenance of the public schools of the state. This feature of the bill only makes the districts the disbursing agents of the state for the carrying out of the purposes of the Constitution, to wit, maintaining the public schools of the state.

It follows from the foregoing conclusion that it is our judgment that the portion of House Bill No. 168, attacked in this proceeding, is valid.

All the justices concur.

So, notwithstanding the Constitution does not require amendments to bills to be spread upon the journals, an enrolled bill may be impeached by the evidence of such records, where they show that an amendment was adopted which was not in the enrolled bill. State ex rel. Cheyenne v. Swan, 7 Wyo. 166, 40 L.R.A. 195, 75 Am. St. Rep. 889, 51 Pac. 209.

So, an enrolled bill may be impeached by records of the secretary of state, which the law declares to be competent evidence, that show the nonconcurrence of one house in an amendment which the enrolled bill contained. Rogers v. State, 72 Ark. 565, 82 S. W. 169.

And an enrolled bill has been held void where the journals showed that an amendment which in effect created a new bill was not read three times as the Constitution directed. Erwin v. State, 116 Tenn. 71, 93 S. W. 73.

As to the competency of a bill as originally introduced into the legislature, to show nonconcurrence in an amendment, see State v. Savings Bank, infra, IV. a, 2.

As to records kept by the secretary of state as evidence to show nonconcurrence in an amendment, see Rogers v. State, infra, IV. a, 5.

As to the competency of an engrossed bill to show that an amendment was adopted which was not in the enrolled bill, see State v. Abbott, infra, IV. a, 3.

r. Bill passed at special session of legislature.

1. Not within scope of proclamation of governor convening it.

The proclamation of the governor convening the legislature in extraordinary session may be consulted in order to determine whether an enrolled bill is within the scope of the purpose outlined in such proclamation, where the Constitution prohibits the enactment of any legislation foreign to such purpose. Parsons v. People, 32 Colo. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And the journals will be examined to determine whether a bill that was not within the scope of the proclamation convening the legislature in special session was adopted by a two-thirds majority essential to the passage of measures not within the purview of such proclamation. Farmers' Union Warehouse Co. v. McIntosh, 1 Ala. App. 407, 56 So. 102; State ex rel. Woodward v. Skeggs, 154 Ala. 249, 46 So. 268.

So, where it appears from the governor's proclamation to the legislature, that an enrolled bill is not germane to the purposes therein specified, it will be void. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Moss, 50 Colo. 282, 115 Pac. 696; Wells v. Missouri P. R. Co. 110

While the doctrine that a bill is void if not within the scope of the governor's proclamation convening the legislature in extraordinary session, was adopted in Brown v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 119, 22 S. W. 596; Long v. State, 58 Tex. Crim. Rep. 209, 127 S. W. 208, 21 Ann. Cas. 405; Stockard v. Reid, 57 Tex. Civ. App. 126, 121 S. W. 1144; and Manor Casino v. State, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 34 S. W. 769, the contrary was held in Presidio County v. City Nat. Bank, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 511, 44 S. W. 1069; Ball v. Presidio County, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 27 S. W. 702; Baldwin v. State, 21 Tex. App. 591, 3 S. W. 109.

2. Not within scope of governor's proclamation or message.

Where the Constitution requires the legislation enacted at a special session to be confined to subjects designated in the proclamation convening such session, or to those recommended by special message of the governor, after the legislature has convened such message may be consulted in order to ascertain whether an enrolled bill is within its scope. State v. Rawlings, 232 Mo. 544, 134 S. W. 530. So, under a constitutional provision confining such legislation to business specially named in the proclamation, the message may be looked to, to determine the construction put by the governor on the scope of the proclamation. Parsons v. People, 32 Colo. 221, 76 Pac. 666.

And if not within the scope of such message, such bill is void. Jones v. Theall, 3 Nev. 233; Manor Casino v. State, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 34 S. W. 769.

But in Ball v. Presidio County, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 27 S. W. 702, the court refused to hold void an act passed at a special session because it was not within the scope of the governor's proclamation, where the only evidence was such proclamation and the senate journal, which did not show a message from the governor upon the subject of such enactment, and the court said it would not undertake to hold an act void on such evidence, which was not conclusive as to the absence of a sufficient message.

3. Failure to give notice of application for passage of local or special act.

In the absence of a constitutional requirement that the legislative journals shall show that notice was given of intention to apply for the passage of a local or special act, an enrolled bill of that character cannot be impeached for failure to give such notice, or for the insufficiency of the notice actually given. Hall v. Steele, 82 Ala. 562, 2 So. 650; Harrison v. Gordy, 57 Ala. 49; Clarke v. Jack, 60 Ala. 271; Walker v. Griffith, 60 Ala. 361; McKemie v. Gorman, 68 Ala. 442; Jennings v. Russell, 92 Ala. 603, 9 So. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

421; Keene v. Jefferson County, 135 Ala. 465, 33 So. 435; Robinson v. State, — Ala. App. —, 58 So. 121; Waterman v. Hawkins, 75 Ark. 120, 86 S. W. 844; Caton v. Western Clay Drainage Dist. 87 Ark. 8, 112 S. W. 145; Rushton v. State, 58 Fla. 94, 50 So. 486; Peed v. McCrary, 94 Ga. 487, 21 S. E. 232; Fullington v. Williams, 98 Ga. 807, 27 S. E. 183; Cutcher v. Crawford, 105 Ga. 180, 31 S. E. 139; Lee v. Tucker, 130 Ga. 43, 60 S. E. 164; White v. Atlanta, 134 Ga. 532, 68 S. E. 103; Clark v. Eve, 134 Ga. 788, 68 S. E. 598; Burge v. Mangum, 134 Ga. 307, 67 S. E. 857; State v. Murray, 47 La. Ann. 1424, 17 So. 832; Cox v. Pitt County, 146 N. C. 584, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 253, 60 S. E. 516; Bray v. Williams, 137 N. C. 387, 49 S. E. 887; Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244; Smith v. Helmer, 7 Barb. 416; Rakowski v. Wagoner, 24 Okla. 282, 103 Pac. 632; Perkins v. Philadelphia, 156 Pa. 554, 27 Atl. 356; Edinburgh & D. R. Co. v. Wauchope, 8 Clark & F. 710.

Nor can a special or local bill providing for the removal of a county seat be impeached by showing that the legislature, in adopting it, acted without having before it, as required by law, evidence of an election for its removal having been held, where the journals do not affirmatively show lack of notice of such election. Cutcher v. Crawford, 105 Ga. 180, 31 S. E. 139; Lee v. Tucker, 130 Ga. 43, 60 S. E. 164.

And it was held in McClinch v. Sturgis, 72 Me. 288, and Day v. Stetson, 8 Me. 365, that a statutory requirement that notice of the pendency of an application for the passage of a special act of incorporation should be given to those interested therein was directory merely, and the failure to comply therewith would not invalidate an enrolled bill.

And it has been held in Texas that, in the absence of pleading and proof to the contrary, it will be presumed that proper notice of application for the passage of a local or special act was given, as the Constitution required. Thompson v. State, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 370, 56 S. W. 603; Moller v. Galveston, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 693, 57 S. W. 1116; Cravens v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 135, 136 Am. St. Rep. 977, 122 S. W. 29.

But if the Constitution requires the legislative journals to show that such notice was given, they may be examined in order to ascertain whether notice was actually given, or to test the sufficiency of the notice given. Wallace v. Board of Revenue, 140 Ala. 491, 37 So. 321; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Sayre, 142 Ala. 641, 39 So. 240, 4 Ann. Cas. 656; Childers v. Shepherd, 142 Ala. 385, 39 So. 235; Law v. State, 142 Ala. 62, 38 So. 798; Dudley v. Fitzpatrick, 143 Ala. 162, 39 So. 384; Green v. State, 143 Ala. 2, 39 So. 362; State ex rel. Van Deusen v. Williams, 143 Ala. 501, 39 So. 276; Norvell v. State, 143 Ala. 561, 39 So. 357; Ex parte Black, 144 Ala. 1, 40 So. 133; Jacobs v. State, 144 Ala. 98, 40 So. 572; Uniontown v. State, 145 Ala. 471, 39 So. 814, 8 Ann. Cas. 320; State ex rel. Hanna v. Tunstall, 145 Ala. 477, 40 So. 135; State ex rel. Perdue v. Abernathy, 146 Ala. 689, 40 So. 353; State ex rel. Frederick v. Brodie, 148 Ala. 381, 41 So. 180; Brame v. State, 148 Ala. 629, 38 So. 1031; State ex rel. Saltzman v. Weakley, 153 Ala. 648, 45 So. 175; Ex parte Kelly, 153 Ala. 668, 45 So. 290; Ex parte O'Neal, 154 Ala. 237, 45 So. 712; Ham v. State, 156 Ala. 645, 47 So. 126; Barnett v. State, 165 Ala. 59, 51 So. 299; Ensley v. Simpson, 166 Ala. 366, 52 So. 61; Miller v. Griffith, 171 Ala. 337, 54 So. 650; State ex rel. Clark v. Carter, — Ala. —, 56 So. 974; Robinson v. State, — Ala. —, 58 So. 121; Lower v. State, 3 Ala. App. 122, 57 So. 500.

And if the journals disclose the insufficiency of the notice given, it will render an enrolled bill void. Wallace v. Board of Revenue, 140 Ala. 491, 37 So. 321; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Sayre, 142 Ala. 641, 39 So. 240, 4 Ann. Cas. 656; State ex rel. Frederick v. Brodie, 148 Ala. 381, 41 So. 180; Ex parte Kelly, 153 Ala. 668, 45 So. 290; State ex rel. Saltzman v. Weakley, 153 Ala. 648, 45 So. 175; Norvell v. State, 143 Ala. 561, 39 So. 357; State, Ewing Twp. Prosecutor, v. Trenton, 57 N. J. L. 318, 31 Atl. 223; Atty. Gen. v. Tuckerton, 67 N. J. L. 120, 50 Atl. 602.

So, a local or special enrolled bill will be void if the journals show that its purpose was not germane to that stated in the notice of intention to apply for its passage. Brame v. State, 148 Ala. 629, 38 So. 1031; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Speake, 144 Ala. 509, 39 So. 224; Goodwyn v. Sherer, 145 Ala. 501, 40 So. 279; Larkin v. Simmons, 155 Ala. 273, 46 So. 451; State ex rel. Thomas v. Gunter, 170 Ala. 165, 54 So. 283; Christian v. State, 171 Ala. 52, 54 So. 1001.

And such an enrolled bill will be void if the journals disclose that such notice did not set forth the substance of the proposed local or special act, as the Constitution requires. Lancaster v. Gafford, 139 Ala. 372, 37 So. 108; Wallace v. Board of Revenue, 140 Ala. 491, 37 So. 321; Hooton v. Mellon, 142 Ala. 245, 37 So. 937; Tillman v. Porter, 142 Ala. 372, 38 So. 647; Elba v. Rhodes, 142 Ala. 689, 38 So. 807; Norvell v. State, 143 Ala. 561, 39 So. 357.

And an enrolled local or special bill is void where the purpose thereof, as stated in such notice, showed that the bill would be unconstitutional. Alford v. Hicks, 142 Ala. 355, 38 So. 752.

So, such an enrolled bill will be void if the journals affirmatively show the insufficiency of the proof of giving such notice (Kumpe v. Irwin, 140 Ala. 460, 36 So. 1024); or where the affidavit of publication without the notice is spread on the journals (State ex rel. Frederick v. Brodie, 148 Ala. 381, 41 So. 180); or where such proof omitted the name of the notary public before whom it was acknowledged (Sellers v. State, 162 Ala. 35, 50 So. 340).

As to the effect of a protest or committee report entered on the journals showing want of such notice, see infra, IV. a, 9 and 10.

As to showing by stipulations of litigants that notice of intention to apply for the 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

passage of a local or special act was not given, see infra, IV. c.

t. Violation of statutory or legislative rules of procedure in passing bill.

An enrolled bill is not open to attack on the ground that a statutory rule of legislative procedure was not observed in passing it. McClinch v. Sturgis, 72 Me. 288; Day v. Stetson, 8 Me. 365; Sweitzer v. Territory, 5 Okla. 297, 47 Pac. 1094; Jones v. Territory, 5 Okla. 536, 49 S. W. 934; State v. Septon, 3 R. I. 119; Manigault v. Springs, 199 U. S. 473, 50 L. ed. 274, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127, affirming 123 Fed. 707.

Nor will an enrolled bill be declared void because of the failure of the legislature to observe, in passing it, its own rules of procedure. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Gill, 54 Ark. 101, 11 L.R.A. 452, 15 S. W. 18; Simon v. State, 86 Ark. 527, 111 S. W. 991; Miller v. Oelwein, — Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 1045; Gray v. Taylor, 15 N. M. 742, 113 Pac. 588; McDonald v. State, 80 Wis. 407, 50 N. W. 185.

u. Fraud or improper motive of legislature in passing bill.

An enrolled bill is not open to attack on the ground that its passage was obtained by fraudulent means, or that improper motives actuated the legislature in passing it. Little Rock v. North Little Rock, 72 Ark. 195, 79 S. W. 785; Kirst v. Street Improv. Dist. No. 120, 86 Ark. 1, 109 S. W. 526; People ex rel. Searer v. Glenn County, 100 Cal. 419, 38 Am. St. Rep. 305, 35 Pac. 302; State ex rel. McVey v. Burris, 4 Penn. (Del.) 3, 49 Atl. 930; Blaine County v. Heard, 5 Idaho, 6, 45 Pac. 890; Wright v. Kelley, 4 Idaho, 624, 43 Pac. 565; State ex rel. Kitcham v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 166 Ind. 580, 77 N. E. 1077; Wichita v. Burleigh, 36 Kan. 34, 12 Pac. 332; State ex rel. Belden v. Fagan, 22 La. Ann. 545; Jewell v. Weed, 18 Minn. 272, Gil. 247; State ex rel. Blakeman v. Hays, 40 Mo. 604; People ex rel. McMullen v. Shepard, 36 N. Y. 285; Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16; Sunbury & E. R. Co. v. Cooper, 33 Pa. 278.

And this is true notwithstanding the journals show that a bill was passed by fraudulent or illegal means. Blaine County v. Heard, 5 Idaho, 6, 45 Pac. 890; Wright v. Kelley, 4 Idaho, 624, 43 Pac. 565; Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16.

So, where the Constitution does not prescribe what shall be spread on the journals, they cannot be used to impeach an enrolled bill by showing that the enrolment thereof, as well as the signature of the presiding officers of the legislature thereto, was obtained by fraud. Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16.

Nor will an enrolled bill be declared void because of the alleged bribery of some members of the legislature. Lynn v. Polk, 8 Lea, 293.

Or because its passage was obtained by fraudulent and fictitious votes. London & C. Loan & Agency Co. v. Rural Municipality, 7 Manitoba L. Rep. 128.

But it was said in State ex rel. Morris v. Mason, 43 La. Ann. 590, 9 So. 776, that evidence was admissible to show fraud, error, or improper exercise of judgment on the part of the agents of the state or its representatives in the enactment of a law.

As to the admissibility of parol evidence to show that the enrolment of a bill was obtained by fraud, see Carr v. Coke, infra, IV. b.

v. Bill passed without enacting clause.

A bill that was passed without an enacting clause, which was required by Constitution, is void where one was added to the bill by a legislative clerk before its approval by the governor. People v. Dettenthaler, 118 Mich. 595, 44 L.R.A. 164, 77 N. W. 450.

As to the competency of parol evidence to show that such enacting clause was added at the direction of the house, see People v. Dettenthaler, infra, IV. b.

IV. Impeachment of bills by evidence other than legislative journals.

a. Records and documents.

1. In general.

The legislative journals are the only evidence competent to impeach an enrolled bill. Ex parte Howard-Harrison Iron Co. 119 Ala. 484, 72 Am. St. Rep. 928, 24 So. 516; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599; State ex rel. Crenshaw v. Joseph, — Ala. —, 57 Mo. 942; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simons, 75 Kan. 130, 88 Pac. 551; Re Howard County, 15 Kan. 194; Rash v. Allen, — Del. —, 76 Atl. 370; State v. Abbott, 59 Neb. 106, 80 N. W. 499; State v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 60 Neb. 741, 84 N. W. 254.

But it was said in State v. Bowman, 90 Ark. 174, 118 S. W. 711, that the court may resort to any source of information in order to arrive at a correct determination as to the validity of an enrolled bill.

Extrinsic evidence is incompetent to show that an enrolled bill was not approved by the governor within the time limited by the Constitution therefor, after the adjournment of the legislature. State ex rel. Crenshaw v. Joseph, — Ala. —, 57 So. 942; Bloomfield v. Middlesex County, 74 N. J. L. 261, 65 Atl. 890; People ex rel. Haller v. Clayton, 5 Utah, 598, 18 Pac. 628; Capito v. Topping, 65 W. Va. 587, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1089, 64 S. E. 845; Gibson v. Anderson, 65 C. C. A. 277, 131 Fed. 39.

And in People ex rel. Haller v. Clayton, 5 Utah, 598, 18 Pac. 628, it was held that the journals were not competent to contradict the records of the secretary of state, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by showing that an enrolled bill was not approved by the governor within the time limited by the Constitution.

2. Bill as originally introduced.

A bill as originally introduced into the legislature has been resorted to in a number of cases in order to ascertain the legality of its adoption. Loftin v. Watson, 32 Ark. 414; Haney v. State, 34 Ark. 263; Burks v. Jefferson County, 40 Ark. 200; State v. Savings Bank, 79 Conn. 141, 64 Atl. 5; Berry v. Baltimore & D. P. R. Co. 41 Md. 446, 20 Am. Rep. 69; Dunn v. Brager, 116 Md. 242, 81 Atl. 517; State v. Rawlings, 232 Mo. 544, 134 S. W. 530; New Hanover County v. De Rosset, 129 N. C. 275, 40 S. E. 43; Com. v. Martin, 107 Pa. 185; Milwaukee County v. Isenring, 109 Wis. 9, 53 L.R.A. 635, 85 N. W. 131.

Thus, such an original bill has been consulted to ascertain whether an enrolled bill differed from the bill as actually adopted. Haney v. State, 34 Ark. 263; Burks v. Jefferson County, 40 Ark. 200; State v. Savings Bank, 79 Conn. 141, 64 Atl. 5; Dunn v. Brager, 116 Md. 242, 81 Atl. 517; State v. Rawlings, 232 Mo. 544, 134 S. W. 530. See also Milwaukee County v. Isenring, 109 Wis. 9, 53 L.R.A. 635, 85 N. W. 131.

And such a bill has been resorted to in order to determine whether the enrolled bill bore the same title as that adopted by the legislature. Com. v. Martin, 107 Pa. 185.

So a bill as introduced into the legislature may be examined to ascertain whether its purpose was changed during passage, in violation of a constitutional prohibition. Loftin v. Watson, 32 Ark. 414.

And in New Hanover County v. De Rosset, 129 N. C. 275, 40 S. E. 43, such a bill, together with the indorsements thereon relating to its passage, were examined in order to ascertain whether it was read on three several days as the Constitution required.

And in State v. Savings Bank, 79 Conn. 141, 64 Atl. 5, the court resorted to the original file of a bill upon which was indorsed the action taken by the legislature in passing it, and held the enrolled bill void, as it did not appear that both houses concurred in an amendment which was in the bill.

But in George Bolln Co. v. North Platte Valley Irrig. Co. — Wyo. —, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 868, 121 Pac. 22, it was held that the journals, and not the indorsements on the bill as introduced, would control in determining whether a bill was signed by the presiding officers of the legislature in the manner directed by the Constitution.

And it was held in State v. Abbott, 59 Neb. 106, 80 N. W. 499; New Hanover County v. Armour Packing Co. 135 N. C. 62, 47 S. E. 411; State ex rel. Walbridge v. Jones, 11 Ohio C. D. 496, that an enrolled bill cannot be impeached by showing defects in the passage thereof by comparison with the bill as originally introduced into the legislature, and by the indorsements thereon.

So it was held in Rash v. Allen, — Del. —, 76 Atl. 370, that such original bill, together with the indorsements thereon, cannot be considered in determining whether a constitutional requirement that certain facts should be entered on the legislative journals was complied with.

Nor can the recitals of the journals be contradicted by such original bill. New Hanover County v. Armour Packing Co. 135 N. C. 62, 47 S. E. 411.

3. Engrossed bill.

A bill as engrossed after passage, together with several slips of paper attached thereto, is incompetent to impeach the enrolled bill, by showing that amendments were adopted which were not in such bill. State v. Abbott, 59 Neb. 106, 80 N. W. 499.

Nor is a bill as engrossed by one house competent to show the omission of words from the enrolled bill. State ex rel. Walbridge v. Jones, 11 Ohio C. D. 496.

4. Records and papers of governor.

It was held in State ex rel. Crocker v. Junkin, 79 Neb. 532, 113 N. W. 256, that where the recitals of the journals as to the time of adjournment of the legislature were ambiguous and conflicting, records of the governor's office might be consulted to disclose the date of adjournment, in order to show the invalidity of an enrolled bill because it was not approved by the governor after the adjournment of the legislature, within the time limited by the Constitution.

And the governor's proclamation that a bill was found by him when he assumed office, and that he erased the approval of his predecessor and vetoed the bill, may be considered in order to determine whether an enrolled bill was in fact vetoed. Powell v. Hays, 83 Ark. 448, 104 S. W. 177, 13 Ann. Cas. 220.

It was held in Lankford v. Somerset County, 73 Md. 105, 11 L.R.A. 491, 20 Atl. 1017, rehearing in 73 Md. 125, 22 Atl. 412, that, in order to show that a bill was not vetoed by the governor after the adjournment of the legislature, within the time limited by the Constitution, a record kept by the secretary of state, as required by the Constitution, might be resorted to in order to show that the legislature adjourned on a different day from that certified by the officers of the legislature.

But it was held in State ex rel. Crenshaw v. Joseph, — Ala. —, 57 So. 942, that the nonapproval of a bill by the governor and its return to the legislature within the time limited by the Constitution, so that it became a law without his approval, could not be established by the indorsement on the bill by the governor's secretary of the date on which it was received by the governor. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

5. Records of secretary of state.

An enrolled bill may be impeached by records of the secretary of state, kept pursuant to law and declared to be competent evidence, by showing non-concurrence of one house in an amendment contained in the enrolled bill, where the journals did not show its contents. Rogers v. State, 72 Ark. 565, 82 S. W. 169.

And an enrolled bill published in a compilation of the laws will be declared void where the records of the secretary of state show that it was not re-enacted after being declared void by the supreme court for defects in its passage. Bowen v. Missouri P. R. Co. 118 Mo. 541, 24 S. W. 436; Bran-nock v. St. Louis, M. & S. E. R. Co. 200 Mo. 561, 118 Am. St. Rep. 695, 98 S. W. 604.

6. Certificates of legislative officers.

An enrolled bill cannot be impeached by a certificate of the chief clerks of the two houses of the legislature, showing that its contents differed from the bill as passed. Annapolis v. Harwood, 32 Md. 471, 3 Am. Rep. 161.

7. Records and memoranda of legislative officers and clerks.

The recitals of the legislative journals cannot, in order to impeach an enrolled bill, be contradicted or altered by memoranda made by legislative officers. State ex rel. McKinley v. Martin, 160 Ala. 181, 48 So. 848; Ex parte Howard-Harrison Iron Co. 119 Ala. 484, 72 Am. St. Rep. 928, 24 So. 516; Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Colorado Loan & T. Co. 20 Colo. 1, 36 Pac. 793; State ex rel. Markens v. Brown, 20 Fla. 407.

And it was held in Rash v. Allen, — Del. —, 76 Atl. 370, that records and dockets of the speaker, clerks, and other legislative officers, are incompetent to show compliance with a constitutional mandate in the passage of a bill, which that instrument declared should be disclosed by the journals.

But in Black v. Buncombe County, 129 N. C. 121, 39 S. E. 818, the calender of the house was examined to determine whether a bill was read on three several days as the Constitution required.

The fact that the President of the United States did not veto a bill within the time limited by the Constitution, so that it became a law without approval may be shown by a memorandum in the minute book kept by the journal clerk of the House of Representatives, to the effect that the President's veto was received on a different day from that stated in the journal. United States v. Allen, 36 Fed. 174.

But the value of this decision is destroyed by Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495, which establishes the rule of absolute conclusiveness of an enrolled bill.

8. Stenographer's minutes.

The notes of the stenographer of the house cannot be used to impeach a bill, by showing that action on it was indefinitely postponed and never taken up. McNeal v. Ritterbusch, 29 Okla. 223, 116 Pac. 778.

9. Committee reports.

An enrolled bill of a local or special character cannot be impeached by a minority report of a legislative committee, which showed that notice of intention to apply for its passage had not been given. Cutcher v. Crawford, 105 Ga. 180, 31 S. E. 139.

Nor is a report of a legislative committee as recorded on the journals competent to show the passage of a bill by a necessary aye and nay vote, where the journals did not disclose such fact. Rio Grande Sampling Co. v. Catlin, 40 Colo. 450, 94 Pac. 323.

10. Protests of members of legislature.

Notwithstanding the Constitution requires that the protest of any member of the legislature shall be entered on the journals, such a protest cannot be invoked in order to impeach an enrolled bill. Ensley v. Simpson, 166 Ala. 366, 52 So. 61; Auditor General v. Menominee County, 89 Mich. 552, 51 N. W. 483.

The rule has been applied where it was sought to contradict a recital of the journal that a quorum was present when a bill was passed, by such a protest, which, together with affidavits accompanying it, was entered on the journal. Auditor General v. Menominee County, 89 Mich. 552, 51 N. W. 483.

Nor can the recital of the journals that notice of application for the passage of a local or special act was given be contradicted by such a constitutional protest and affidavits entered on the journals. Ensley v. Simpson, 166 Ala. 366, 52 So. 61.

But under the Constitution of Missouri, in order that an enrolled bill may be impeached for nonobservance of some constitutional mandate during its passage, a protest showing such irregularity must be noted on the journals before the bill is signed by the presiding officers of the legislature. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Mead, 71 Mo. 266; State ex rel. McCaffery v. Mason, 155 Mo. 486, 55 S. W. 636.

b. Parol evidence.

Parol evidence is incompetent to impeach an enrolled bill by showing the disregard of a constitutional mandate in its passage. Jackson v. State, 131 Ala. 21, 31 So. 380; Andrews v. People, 33 Colo. 193, 108 Am. St. Rep. 76, 79 Pac. 1031; Koehler v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 552, 14 N. W. 738, rehearing in 60 Iowa, 603, 15 N. W. 609; Berry v. Baltimore & D. P. R. Co. 41 Md. 446, 20 Am. Rep. 69; Auditor General v. Menominee County, 89 Mich. 552, 51 N. W. 483; Atty. Gen. v. Rice, 64 Mich. 385, 31 N. W. 203; Wilson v. Markley, 133 N. C. 616, 45 S. E. 1023; Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16; State ex rel. Walbridge v. Jones, 11 Ohio C. D. 496.

And parol evidence is incompetent to contradict or alter the recitals of the journals, in order to show defects in the passage of a bill. State ex rel. McKinley v. Martin, 160 Ala. 181, 48 So. 846; Jackson v. State, 131 Ala. 21, 31 So. 380; Weeks v. Smith, 81 Me. 538, 18 Atl. 325; Atty. Gen. v. Rice, 64 Mich. 385, 31 N. W. 203; Auditor General v. Menominee County, 89 Mich. 552, 51 N. W. 483; Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16; Wilson v. Markley, 133 N. C. 616, 45 S. E. 1023; State ex rel. Herron v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 348, 7 N. E. 447, 12 N. E. 829; State ex rel. Walbridge v. Jones, 11 Ohio C. D. 496; State ex rel. Eckhardt v. Hoff, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 29 S. W. 672; White v. Hinton, 3 Wyo. 753, 17 L.R.A. 66, 30 Pac. 953; Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 113 C. C. A. 316; 191 Fed. 692.

Thus, where the legislative journals show that an enrolled bill was regularly passed, it cannot be impeached by parol evidence showing that it was not introduced into the legislature within the time limited by the Constitution therefor (Atty. Gen. v. Rice, 64 Mich. 385, 31 N. W. 203); or that it was not read as the Constitution requires (Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16); or that it was introduced, passed, and approved by the governor after the expiration of the legislative session by operation of law (White v. Hinton, 3 Wyo. 753, 17 L.R.A. 66, 30 Pac. 953); or that it was adopted by aid of votes of members not legally seated (State ex rel. Herron v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 348, 7 N. E. 447, 12 N. E. 829).

So, parol evidence is inadmissible to show that an enrolled bill differs from that passed by the legislature (Annapolis v. Harwood, 32 Md. 471, 3 Am. Rep. 161); or to show slight alterations therein before it was approved by the governor (Ames v. Union P. R. Co. 64 Fed. 165, affirmed on other points in 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418); or that the enrolment of a bill and the signatures thereto of the presiding officers of the legislature were obtained by fraud (Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16); or to show the intent of the legislature in enacting a bill (Garland County v. Hot Springs County, 68 Ark. 83, 56 N. W. 636); or to show that a bill was passed without an enacting clause (People v. Dettenthaler, 118 Mich. 595, 44 L.R.A. 164, 77 N. W. 450); or to show when an enrolled bill became effective (Re Wellman, 20 Vt. 653, Fed. Cas. No. 17,407).

Nor is parol evidence admissible to show that the purpose of a bill was changed, in defiance of the Constitution, after the expiration of the time for introduction of bills, so as to make it a new bill. Sackrider v. Saginaw County, 79 Mich. 59, 44 N. W. 165.

And the records of the secretary of state cannot be impeached by parol evidence showing that an enrolled bill was not approved by the governor. People ex rel. Partello v. McCullough, 210 Ill. 488, 71 N. E. 602.

Nor can such records be impeached by parol evidence showing that an enrolled bill was not approved by the governor within the time limited by the Constitution. People ex rel. Haller v. Clayton, 5 Utah, 598, 18 Pac. 628.

So, it cannot be shown by parol that the governor vetoed an enrolled bill, where the Constitution requires such fact to be shown by the journals. State ex rel. Colbert v. Wheeler, 172 Ind. 587, 89 N. E. 1, 19 Ann. Cas. 834.

Nor can it be shown by parol that, because of the governor's continued absence from his office, he could not have approved a bill within the time limited by the Constitution. Wrede v. Richardson, 77 Ohio St. 182, 122 Am. St. Rep. 498, 82 N. E. 1072.

But, on the other hand, parol evidence has been admitted in some cases to impeach an enrolled bill.

Thus, in Allegany County v. Warfield, 100 Md. 516, 108 Am. St. Rep. 446, 60 Atl. 599, parol evidence was admitted tending to show that a bill was not actually approved by the governor, although he had, without intending to approve it, affixed his signature thereto, where he immediately erased it upon discovering his error.

So, parol evidence bearing on the question whether or not an enrolled bill was actually vetoed by the governor was admitted in Powell v. Hays, 83 Ark. 448, 104 S. W. 177, 13 Ann. Cas. 220, and State ex rel. Colbert v. Wheeler, 172 Ind. 578, 89 N. E. 1, 19 Ann. Cas. 834.

And in State ex rel. Crocker v. Junkin, 79 Neb. 532, 113 N. W. 256, parol evidence of the clerk of the house and secretary of the senate was received, together with the records of the governor's office, in order to show that an enrolled bill was void on the ground that it was not approved by the governor after the adjournment of the legislature, within the time limited by the Constitution, where the recitals of the journals as to the day of adjournment of the legislature were ambiguous and conflicting.

c. Stipulations and admissions as to invalidity of bill.

Stipulations or admissions of litigants that a bill was not constitutionally enacted are incompetent to impeach an enrolled bill. Graves v. Alsap, 1 Ariz. 274, 25 Pac. 836; Peckham v. People, 32 Colo. 140, 75 Pac. 422; Anderson v. Grand Valley Irrig. Dist. 35 Colo. 525, 85 Pac. 313; Happel v. Brethauer, 70 Ill. 166, 22 Am. Rep. 70; Fullington v. Williams, 98 Ga. 807, 27 S. E. 183; Cutcher v. Crawford, 105 Ga. 180, 31 S. E. 139; Re Granger, 56 Neb. 260, 76 N. W. 588; Morris v. Newark, 73 N. J. L. 268, 62 Atl. 1005; Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119.

Thus, it cannot be shown by the stipulation of litigants that a bill as originally introduced, together with indorsements thereon, was not the same as the enrolled bill passed by the legislature. Re Granger, 56 Neb. 260, 76 N. W. 588.

Nor will the court determine whether an act was properly approved by the governor, upon the stipulation of the parties as to the facts upon which the claim of irregularity is based. Morris v. Newark, 73 N. J. L. 268, 67 Atl. 1005.

Nor can a local or special act be impeached by the admissions of litigants to the effect that constitutional notice of intention to apply for its passage was not given. Fullington v. Williams, 98 Ga. 807, 27 S. E. 183; Cutcher v. Crawford, 105 Ga. 180, 31 S. E. 139; Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119. Contra, Chalfant v. Edwards, 173 Pa. 246, 33 Atl. 1048.

Nor will an enrolled bill be declared void upon the admission in the pleadings that it was not passed in a constitutional manner. Adams v. Clark, 36 Colo. 65, 85 Pac. 642, 10 Ann. Cas. 774.

Nor are admissions of parties or stipulations of counsel as to the contents of the journals competent for the purpose of impeaching the validity of an enrolled bill. Anderson v. Grand Valley Irrig. Dist. 35 Colo. 525, 85 Pac. 313.

But, on the contrary, it has been held or assumed in some cases that admissions or stipulations of litigants are admissible to impeach an enrolled bill. Chalfant v. Edwards, 173 Pa. 246, 33 Atl. 1048; Sala's Succession, 50 La. Ann. 1009, 24 So. 674; Givanovich's Succession, 50 La. Ann. 625, 24 So. 679; Palmer v. Bank of Zumbrota, 72 Minn. 266, 75 N. W. 380; and State ex rel. Hynds v. Cahill, 12 Wyo. 225, 75 Pac. 433.

Thus, an enrolled bill for raising revenue was declared void upon a concession that it originated in the senate in violation of the Constitution. Sala's Succession, 50 La. Ann. 1009, 24 So. 674; Givanovich's Succession, 50 La. Ann. 625, 24 So. 679.

And in Palmer v. Bank of Zumbrota, 72 Minn. 266, 75 N. W. 380, a bill was held void on a concession that it was not passed by a constitutional two-third majority.

So, in State ex rel. Hynds v. Cahill, 12 Wyo. 225, 75 Pac. 433, the court considered an agreed statement of facts as to the regularity of the passage of an act in compliance with constitutional requirements.

V. Resort to legislative journals in aid of bills.

a. To establish law for which no enrolled bill can be found.

In State ex rel. Colbert v. Wheeler, 172 Ind. 578, 89 N. E. 1, 19 Ann. Cas. 834, the legislative journals and files of the governor's office, as well as those of the state librarian, were consulted in order to determine whether an act actually existed, where the enrolled bill was not found in the office of the secretary of state.

And in State v. Savings Bank, 79 Conn.

141, 64 Atl. 5, the journals as well as the original file of the bill, with a record of the legislative proceedings pertaining thereto indorsed thereon, were resorted to in order to determine whether a bill that was not found in the office of the secretary of state actually became a law.

But it was held in Graves v. Alsap, 1 Ariz. 274, 25 Pac. 836 that the legislative journals could not be resorted to in order to ascertain whether a law was enacted and still in force, where no enrolled bill was found in the proper archives, since the absence of an enrolled bill therefrom was conclusive evidence, said the court, that such an act never existed.

b. To show passage of bill by constitutional majority.

The legislative journals may be used to sustain a joint resolution, by showing that it was passed by a necessary two-thirds majority, notwithstanding the certificate of the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature annexed to such resolutions, as required by statute, stated that it was passed by a majority vote. Re Weeks, 109 App. Div. 859, 96 N. Y. Supp. 876, affirmed without opinion in 185 N. Y. 541, 77 N. E. 1197.

And in New York & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 540, 42 N. E. 1088, an enrolled bill was sustained where the journals showed that it was passed by a necessary two-thirds vote, notwithstanding the certificate attached to the bill stated only that three-fifths of the members of the legislature were present when it was passed.

c. To show passage of bill over governor's veto.

It may be shown by the legislative journals that an enrolled bill was passed by the legislature over the governor's veto. State ex rel. Holt v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L.R.A. 65, 21 N. E. 274; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Odum, 53 Tex. 343.

And in Re Welman, 20 Vt. 653, s. c. Fed. Cas. No. 17,407, the court said that it might be necessary and admissible in some instances, particularly where an act becomes a law by passage over a veto, to carry an inquiry into the legislative journals.

In Hovey v. State, 119 Ind. 395, 21 N. E. 21, it was said, in substance, that in order to determine whether a bill was passed over the governor's veto, where the bill did not bear his approval, but the certificate of the secretary of state attached thereto stated that it was adopted over his veto, the court might, for the purpose of information merely, resort to any public record for which the law provides, in order to furnish a history of legislative events, although no evidence could override the constitutional authentication on the face of an enrolled bill, behind which courts will not look.

d. To show enactment of bill with emergency clause.

A bill that did not, when approved, contain an emergency clause, cannot be shown by the journals to have been enacted with such clause by a constitutional majority, so as to permit the bill to take immediate effect. Re General Appropriation Bill, 16 Colo. 539, 29 Pac. 379.

VI. Resort to evidence other than journals in aid of bills.

a. Documentary.

1. To show passage of bill.

It was held in State ex rel. McClay v. Mickey, 73 Neb. 281, 119 Am. St. Rep. 894, 102 N. W. 679, that where the journals did not show that an act was passed, otherwise than to state its title, although it had received the approval of the executive, its existence could not be established by a certificate made by the clerical officer of the legislature after it had adjourned sine die, since, if it were permissible to establish a bill in that manner, there would not be a compliance with the constitutional mandate that all bills shall be signed by the presiding officers of both houses in the presence thereof.

A report of a committee of the legislature, as recorded on the journal, is not admissible to show that a bill was, in fact, passed by an aye and nay vote, which the journal did not disclose. Rio Grande Sampling Co. v. Catlin, 40 Colo. 450, 94 Pac. 323.

2. To show reading of bill.

In Black v. Buncombe County, 129 N. C. 121, 39 S. E. 818, the calendar of the house was examined in order to determine whether a bill was read in the manner directed by the Constitution.

In New Hanover County v. De Rosset, 129 N. C. 275, 40 S. E. 43; and Black v. Buncombe County, 129 N. C. 121, 39 S. E. 818, an original bill was resorted to which showed by an indorsement thereon that it was read on three several days as the Constitution required.

3. To show approval of bill.

A record kept by the governor of the presentation of bills to him for approval is competent to establish the fact that an enrolled bill was approved within the time limited by the Constitution notwithstanding the entry in such record was made by a subordinate in the course of his duties. Wrede v. Richardson, 77 Ohio St. 182, 122 Am. St. Rep. 498, 82 N. E. 1072.

Where the journal entries are conflicting as to the date on which the legislature adjourned, it may be established by records kept by the governor, so as to show that he approved an enrolled bill within the time limited by the Constitution. State ex rel. Crocker v. Junkin, 79 Neb. 532, 113 N. W. 256.

4. To identify enrolled bill as that actually passed.

In Butler v. Fourche Drainage Dist. — Ark. —, 146 S. W. 120, a bill as originally introduced into the legislature, together with the indorsements made thereon by the officers of the legislature, was examined in order to identify it as the bill that was actually passed, where the journals, as the result of an error in recording the vote on the passage of the bill, referred to it by a wrong number. But the court expressly stated that it did not intend to hold that the journals could be contradicted in such manner, since it resorted to such evidence, in connection with the various journal entries pertaining to the passage of the bill, for the purpose of identification only.

5. To supply omission from enrolled bill.

In State ex rel. Benton County v. Boice, 140 Ind. 506, 39 N. E. 64, 40 N. E. 113, it was held that an omission from an enrolled bill could not be supplied by resorting to the engrossment thereof.

b. Parol evidence.

The existence of an act that was not found in the office of the secretary of state, and did not appear upon the legislative journals, cannot be established by parol. Burke v. Cincinnati, 10 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 544.

So, parol evidence is not admissible to show concurrence of both houses of the legislature in a bill which the journals disclosed was not concurred in. Koehler v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 543, 14 N. W. 738, s. c. on rehearing, 60 Iowa, 603, 15 N. W. 609.

But in United States v. Allen, 36 Fed. 174, in order to show that a bill actually became a law without the approval of the President, parol evidence of the journal clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, in connection with a memorandum in his minute book, was admitted, to the effect that the President's veto was returned to the House after the expiration of the time limited by the Constitution therefore.

But the value of this decision is destroyed by Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495, which establishes the rule of absolute conclusiveness of an enrolled bill.

So, the member who introduced a bill for the incorporation of a town cannot show by parol that the town of W. in D. county was intended where there were two towns of that name in the state, and the bill did not designate which one it referred to. State ex rel. Eckhardt v. Hoff, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 29 S. W. 672.

But in Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 113 C. C. A. 361, 191 Fed. 692, parol evidence was received to show that a bill was passed by a necessary aye and nay vote, and that it was, together with the names of those voting for and against the measure, entered on the journals as the Constitution required, where the pages pertaining to the passage of the bill had been abstracted from the journals, and, when found, sustained such evidence.

VII. Resort to journals to determine which of two inconsistent bills is in force.

In order to determine which of two inconsistent bills, which were approved by the governor on the same day, is valid as the latest expression of the legislative will, the journals of the legislature may be examined. Somers v. State, 5 S. D. 321, 58 N. W. 804; Derby v. State, 24 Ohio C. C. 304.

VIII. Conclusiveness of journal recitals.

Notwithstanding legislative journals may be used to overthrow an enrolled bill, yet their recitals are conclusive, importing absolute verity, and cannot be contradicted or altered in any manner. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Buckley, 54 Ala. 599; Robertson v. State, 130 Ala. 164, 30 So. 494; State ex rel. McKinley v. Martin, 160 Ala. 181, 48 So. 846; Cohn v. Kingsley, 5 Idaho, 416, 38 L.R.A. 74, 49 Pac. 485; People ex rel. Wiese v. Bowman, 247 Ill. 276, 93 N. E. 244; McCulloch v. State, 11 Ind. 424; Koehler v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 543, 14 N. W. 738, 15 N. W. 609; Belleville v. Wells, 74 Kan. 823, 88 Pac. 47; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simons, 75 Kan. 130, 88 Pac. 551; State ex rel. Morris v. Mason, 43 La. Ann. 590, 9 So. 776; Rash v. Allen, — Del. —, 76 Atl. 370; Atty. Gen. v. Rice, 64 Mich. 385, 31 N. W. 203; People ex rel. Hart v. McElroy, 72 Mich. 446, 2 L.R.A. 609, 40 N. W. 750; Rohrbacker v. Jackson, 51 Miss. 735; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Northern P. R. Co. 34 Mont. 268, 85 Pac. 1032, 9 Ann. Cas. 579; Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L.R.A. 737, 47 Am. St. Rep. 801, 22 S. E. 16; Wilson v. Markley, 133 N. C. 616, 45 S. E. 1023; New Hanover County v. Armour Packing Co. 135 N. C. 62, 47 S. E. 411; Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 269; Milwaukee County v. Isenring, 109 Wis. 9, 53 L.R.A. 635, 85 N. W. 131; White v. Hinton, 3 Wyo. 753, 17 L.R.A. 66, 30 Pac. 953; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Smyth, 103 Fed. 376.

As to matters required by the Constitution to be entered upon the journals, they are conclusive evidence thereof. Rash v. Allen, — Del. —, 76 Atl. 370.

But it was said in State ex rel. Morris v. Mason, 43 La. Ann. 590, 9 So. 776, that, notwithstanding the conclusiveness of the legislative journals, proof is admissible to show that they have not been made the actual depository of the legislative proceedings as they transpired, or to show fraud, error, or improper exercise of judgment on the part of the state, its agents, or representatives.

As to contradicting the journals by parol, see supra, IV. b.

As to contradiction of legislative journals by memoranda of legislative officers or clerks, see supra, IV. a, 7.

As to contradiction of legislative journals by a constitutional protest of members of the legislature, entered on the journals, see Auditor General v. Menominee County and Ensley v. Simpson, supra, IV. a, 10.

And as to the contradiction of the journal records by a bill as originally introduced into the legislature, see New Hanover County v. Armour Packing Co. supra, IV. a, 2.

As to contradicting the journals by indorsements on a bill as originally introduced into the legislature, see George Bolln Co. v. North Platte Valley Irrig. Co. supra, IV. a, 2.

IX. Effect of inconsistent journal entries.

Where the recitals of the journals are ambiguous and conflicting as to the observance of some constitutional mandate in the passage of a bill, an enrolled bill will be sustained upon the presumption of regular enactment. Woolfolk v. Albrecht, — N. D. —, 133 N. W. 310; Homrighausen v. Knoche, 58 Kan. 646, 50 Pac. 879 (whether bill passed by constitutional majority); Re Taylor, 60 Kan. 87, 55 Pac. 340 (whether a bill was amended); Belleville v. Wells, 74 Kan. 823, 88 Pac. 47 (whether title was altered before approval); Missouri R. Co. v. Simons, 75 Kan. 130, 88 Pac. 551 (whether passed by an aye and nay vote).

The presumption of validity of an enrolled act is not overcome by defects or seeming inconsistencies between the journals of the two houses, where, when fairly interpreted, they verify the enrolled act. Weis v. Stubblefield, 85 Kan. 199, 116 Pac. 205.

It was held in Lincoln v. Haugan, 45 Minn. 451, 48 N. W. 106, that the printed journals would control where the written journals, which were not made up day by day as the statute directed, showed, as the result of an apparent error, that a bill did not receive an affirmative vote necessary to its passage, but which vote was correctly shown by the printed journals, notwithstanding the statute declared that the written journals should "be considered the true and authentic journals," since it also declared that full faith and credit must be given the printed journals.

As to the right to resort to other evidence to show the date of a legislative adjournment, where the journal entries are contradictory, see State ex rel. Crocker v. Junkin, 79 Neb. 532, 113 N. W. 256.

X. Presumption of regular enactment of bills.

A strong presumption of the regular enactment arises from the enrolment of a bill with due regard for all constitutional mandates, which may, in those jurisdictions which do not recognize the absolute conclusiveness of such a bill, be overthrown 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

by an affirmative showing of the nonobservance of a constitutional requirement. Stein v. Leeper, 78 Ala. 517; Uniontown v. State, 145 Ala. 471, 39 So. 814, 8 Ann. Cas. 320; English v. Oliver, 28 Ark. 317; Scott v. Clark County, 34 Ark. 283; Webster v. Little Rock, 44 Ark. 536; Felt v. Payne, 60 Ark. 637, 30 S. W. 426; State v. Moore, 76 Ark. 197, 70 L.R.A. 671, 88 S. W. 881; State v. Bowman, 90 Ark. 174, 118 S. W. 711; Re Roberts, 5 Colo. 525; Woolfolk v. Albrecht, — N. D. —, 133 N. W. 310; State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 359, 18 So. 767; Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, 58 Am. Dec. 571; Schuyler County v. People, 25 Ill. 182; Bedard v. Hall, 44 Ill. 91; *Hensoldt v. v. Swan, 7 Wyo. 166, 40 L.R.A. 195, 75 Am. St. Rep. 889, 51 Pac. 209. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Smyth, 103 Fed. 376.

It was said in Clendaniel v. Conrad, — Del. —, 83 Atl. 1036, that "every legal presumption is to be made in favor of the validity of the act. If the journal entries fail to show that the enrolled act was not the act that was in fact passed, or if the journal entries are such as to make it doubtful which one of two acts was passed, then the presumption in favor of the enrolled and published act stands, and the same must be held valid."

It will be presumed that the legislature in enacting a bill complied with all non-mandatory provisions of the Constitution. State ex rel. McCaffery v. Mason, 155 Mo. 486, 55 S. W. 636.

In order to overcome the prima facie presumption of regularity accompanying an enrolled bill, so as to render it void, the showing by the legislative journals of a disregard of a constitutional requirement must be:

—clear. Hensoldt v. Petersburg, 63 Ill. 157; Larrison v. Peoria, A. & D. R. Co. 77 Ill. 11; Berry v. Baltimore & D. P. R. Co. 41 Md. 446, 20 Am. Rep. 69; People ex rel. Hart v. McElroy, 72 Mich. 446, 2 L.R.A. 609, 40 N. W. 750; —clear and palpable. Scott v. Clark County, 34 Ark. 283;

—clear and convincing. State v. Peterson, 38 Minn. 143, 36 N. W. 443;

—conclusive. Auditor General v. Menominee County, 89 Mich. 552, 51 N. W. 483;

—strong and clear. Miesen v. Canfield, 64 Minn. 513, 67 N. W. 632; Woolfolk v. Albrecht, — N. D. —, 133 N. W. 310; —clear and beyond all doubt. State v. Wray, 109 Mo. 594, 19 S. W. 86;

—clear, conclusive, and beyond all doubt. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Francis, 26 Kan. 724; Re Vanderberg, 28 Kan. 243; Weyand v. Stover, 35 Kan. 545, 11 Pac. 355; Homrighausen v. Knoche, 58 Kan. 646, 50 Pac. 879; Chesney v. McClintock, 61 Kan. 94, 58 Pac. 993; State ex rel. Godard v. Andrews, 64 Kan. 474, 67 Pac. 870; Belle-ville v. Wells, 74 Kan. 823, 88 Pac. 47; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simons, 75 Kan. 130, 88 Pac. 551; Re Taylor, 60 Kan. 87, 55 Pac. 340; Stephens v. Labette County, 79 Kan. 153, 98 Pac. 790;

—explicit and unequivocal. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Smyth, 103 Fed. 376; —express and unequivocal. State v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 60 Neb. 741, 84 N. W. 254; Webster v. Hastings, 59 Neb. 563, 81 N. W. 510; Stratton v. State, 79 Neb. 118, 112 N. W. 361.

Where the legislative journals, upon which the Constitution requires to be entered the final vote upon a bill, are so mutilated and incomplete, the pages relating to the passage of a bill being missing, that it does not appear therefrom that such mandate was complied with, and other evidence supplies such defect, the enrolled bill will be sustained, as the silence of the journals in such respect is not sufficient 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to overcome the presumption of regular enactment raised by the enrolment of the bill. State ex rel. Douglas v. Frank, 60 Neb. 327, 83 N. W. 76, s. c. on rehearing, 61 Neb. 679, 85 N. W. 956.

And such evidence does not contradict the record, but merely establishes it, as it was made in fact by the legislature, and the journal, when mutilated, may be established in the same manner as any other lost record. State ex rel. Douglas County v. Frank, 61 Neb. 679, 85 N. W. 956.

XI. Legality of enactment of bill as question of law.

Whether an enrolled bill was legally enacted is a question of law, and not of fact. Scott v. Clark County, 34 Ark. 283; Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am. Dec. 93; Stelling v. Kansas City, 85 Kan. 397, 116 Pac. 511; Weeks v. Smith, 81 Me. 538, 18 Atl. 325; Ramsey County v. Heenan, 2 Minn. 330, Gil. 281; Ayars's Appeal, 122 Pa. 266, 2 L.R.A. 577, 16 Atl. 356; Blessing v. Galveston, 42 Tex. 641; Amoskeag Nat. Bank v. Ottawa, 105 U. S. 667, 26 L. ed. 1204; Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 90 C. C. A. 166, 164 Fed. 180, 113 C. C. A. 316, 191 Fed. 692.

And it was held in Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 113 C. C. A. 316, 191 Fed. 692, that such question would be determined by the court whenever drawn in question, irrespective of whether or not it was made an issue by the pleadings.

However, in Colorado it is held that the question of the validity of a bill as affected by defects in its passage, although decided by the court as a question of law, raises a question of fact. Rio Grande Sampling Co. v. Catlin, 40 Colo. 450, 94 Pac. 323; Vindicator Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Firstbrook, 36 Colo. 510, 86 Pac. 313, 10 Ann. Cas. 1108; Anderson v. Grand Valley Irrig. Dist. 35 Colo. 525, 85 Pac. 313; Peckham v. People, 32 Colo. 140, 75 Pac. 422; Marean v. Stanley, 21 Colo. 43, 39 Pac. 1086; Nesbit v. People, 19 Colo. 441, 36 Pac. 221.

It was said in Nesbit v. People, 19 Colo. 441, 36 Pac. 221, that "it may seem paradoxical but it is nevertheless true, that a question of fact respecting the existence or nonexistence of a law is a question of law," to be decided by the court.

XII. Necessity of pleading illegal enactment of bill.

It has been held that the validity of a bill as affected by some defect in its passage involves a question of fact, which must be raised by appropriate pleadings. Rio Grande Sampling Co. v. Catlin, 40 Colo. 450, 94 Pac. 323; Vindicator Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Firstbrook, 36 Colo. 510, 86 Pac. 313, 10 Ann. Cas. 1108; Anderson v. Grand Valley Irrig. Dist. 35 Colo. 525, 85 Pac. 313; Peckham v. People, 32 Colo. 140, 75 Pac. 422; Marean v. Stanley, 21 Colo. 43, 39 Pac. 1086; Colorado & S. R. Co. v. Davis, — Colo. App. —, 120 Pac. 1048; Bresee v. Preston, — Neb. —, 135 N. W. 544; Dar- lington v. New York, 2 Robt. 274, affirmed in 31 N. Y. 164, 88 Am. Dec. 248. Contra, State v. Swiggart, 118 Tenn. 556, 102 S. W. 75; Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 113 C. C. A. 316, 191 Fed. 692.

And it was held in Auditor v. Haycraft, 14 Bush, 284, that, in order to attack the validity of a bill, the question must be raised by appropriate pleadings.

So, it has been held in Texas that, in order to question a special or local act because of the lack of or insufficiency of the constitutional notice of intention to apply for its passage, the question must be raised by appropriate pleadings. Thompson v. State, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 370, 56 S. W. 603; Moller v. Galveston, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 693, 57 S. W. 1116; Cravens v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 135, 136 Am. St. Rep. 977, 122 S. W. 29.

But it was held in Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 113 C. C. A. 316, 191 Fed. 692, that the question whether an enrolled bill was enacted with due observance of all constitutional formalities would be determined by the court whenever drawn in question, irrespective of whether made an issue by the pleadings.

XIII. Proof of existence and contents of journals.

a. Necessity of.

In a few jurisdictions it is held that, in order to question the regular enactment of an enrolled bill, the legislative journals must be proved and brought into the record by bill of exceptions. Nesbit v. People, 19 Colo. 450, 36 Pac. 221; Marean v. Stanley, 21 Colo. 43, 39 Pac. 1086; Sargent v. La Plata County, 21 Colo. 158, 40 Pac. 366; Zang v. Wyant, 25 Colo. 557, 71 Am. St. Rep. 145, 56 Pac. 565; Peckham v. People, 32 Colo. 140, 75 Pac. 422; Anderson v. Grand Valley Irrig. Dist. 35 Colo. 525, 85 Pac. 313; Rio Grande Sampling Co. v. Catlin, 40 Colo. 450, 94 Pac. 323; Hill v. Bourkhart, 5 Colo. App. 58, 36 Pac. 1115; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wren, 43 Ill. 77; Bedford v. Hall, 44 Ill. 91; Hensoldt v. Petersburg, 63 Ill. 157; Grob v. Cushman, 45 Ill. 119; Binz v. Weber, 81 Ill. 288; Erford v. Peoria, 229 Ill. 546, 82 N. E. 374; Coleman v. Dobbins, 8 Ind. 156; Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514, 95 Am. Dec. 710; Auditor v. Haycraft, 14 Bush, 284; Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 31 Minn. 472, 18 N. W. 285, 289; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650; State v. Wray, 109 Mo. 594, 19 S. W. 86; Darlington v. New York, 2 Robt. 274, affirmed in 31 N. Y. 164, 88 Am. Dec. 248; State v. Brown, 33 S. C. 151, 11 S. E. 641. But the contrary has been held in Scott v. Clark County, 34 Ark. 283; State v. Swiggart, 118 Tenn. 556, 102 S. W. 75; Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 90 C. C. A. 166, 164 Fed. 180.

In Auditor v. Haycraft, 14 Bush, 284, it was held that the journals must be proved in order to show irregularity in the passage of a bill, since the declaration by statute that the journals are to be evidence precluded the idea that the court might take judicial notice of them.

But when such journals are offered in evidence, they prove their own authenticity. Grob v. Cushman, 45 Ill. 119.

b. Judicial notice of.

The weight of authority sustains the rule that where an enrolled bill is not considered conclusive, but open to attack, judicial notice will be taken of the existence and contents of the legislative journals pertaining to the passage thereof. Moody v. State, 48 Ala. 115, 17 Am. Rep. 28; Moog v. Randolph, 77 Ala. 597; Montgomery Beer Bottling Works v. Gaston, 126 Ala. 425, 51 L.R.A. 396, 85 Am. St. Rep. 42, 28 So. 497; State ex rel. Crenshaw v. Joseph, — Ala. —, 57 So. 942; Jobe v. Urquhart, — Ark. —, 143 S. W. 121; State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, 18 So. 767; State ex rel. Holt v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L.R.A. 65, 21 N. E. 274; Re Howard County, 15 Kan. 194; Re Vanderberg, 28 Kan. 243; Homrighausen v. Knoche, 58 Kan. 646, 50 Pac. 879; State ex rel. Godard v. Andrews, 64 Kan. 474, 67 Pac. 870; Stelling v. Kansas City, 85 Kan. 397, 116 Pac. 511; Com. v. Jackson, 5 Bush, 680; Brown v. Broussard, 43 La. Ann. 962, 9 So. 911; People ex rel. Drake v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481; Callaghan v. Chipman, 59 Mich. 610, 26 N. W. 806; Atty. Gen. v. Rice, 64 Mich. 385, 31 N. W. 203; People ex rel. Hart v. McElroy, 72 Mich. 453, 2 L.R.A. 609, 40 N. W. 750; Miesen v. Canfield, 64 Minn. 514, 67 N. W. 632; State v. Wray, 109 Mo. 594, 19 S. W. 86; State ex rel. Douglas County v. Frank, 61 Neb. 679, 85 N. W. 956; Gray v. Taylor, 15 N. M. 742, 113 Pac. 588; State ex rel. Herron v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 348, 7 N. E. 447, 12 N. E. 829; Burke v. Cincinnati, 10 Ohio St. & C. P. Dec. 544; State v. Rogers, 22 Or. 348, 30 Pac. 74; Portland v. Yick, 44 Or. 439, 102 Am. St. Rep. 633, 75 Pac. 706; Somers v. State, 5 S. D. 321, 58 N. W. 804; State v. Swiggart, 118 Tenn. 556, 102 S. W. 75; Ritchie v. Richards, 14 Utah, 345, 47 Pac. 670; McDonald v. State, 95 Pac. 698, 80 Wis. 407, 50 N. W. 185; Dane County v. Reindahl, 104 Wis. 302, 80 N. W. 438; Brown v. Nash, 1 Wyo. 85; State ex rel. Sullivan v. Schnitzer, 16 Wyo. 479, 95 Pac. 608; Milwaukee County v. Isenring, 109 Wis. 91, 53 L.R.A. 635, 85 N. W. 131; State ex rel. Cheyenne v. Swan, 7 Wyo. 166, 40 L.R.A. 198, 72 Am. St. Rep. 889, 51 Pac. 209; Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Duke, 90 C. C. A. 166, 164 Fed. 180.

But the contrary has been held in a few jurisdictions. Hill v. Bourkhart, 5 Colo. App. 58, 36 Pac. 115; Sargent v. La Platte County, 21 Colo. 158, 40 Pac. 366; Zang v. Wyant, 25 Colo. 557, 71 Am. St. Rep. 145, 56 Pac. 565; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wren, 43 Ill. 77; Grob v. Cushman, 45 Ill. 119; Binz v. Weber, 81 Ill. 288; Erford v. Peoria, 229 Ill. 546, 82 N. E. 374; Coleman v. Dobbins, 8 Ind. 156; Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514, 95 Am. Dec. 710; Auditor v. Haycraft, 14 Bush. 284; Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 31 Minn. 472, 18 N. W. 285, 289; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650; State v. Wray, 109 Mo. 594, 19 S. W. 86; State v. Brown, 33 S. C. 151, 11 S. E. 641.

It was held in Auditor v. Haycraft, 14 Bush. 284, that the idea that judicial notice might be taken of the legislative journals was precluded by a statutory declaration that they were to be considered as evidence.

While in Somers v. State, 5 S. D. 321, 58 N. W. 804, where the court, of its own motion, took judicial notice of the legislative journals in order to determine which of two inconsistent acts, which were approved by the governor on the same day, was the latest expression of the legislative will, it said that ordinarily it would not take judicial notice of the legislative proceedings as shown by the journals, but that when a question could be intelligently decided only upon information therein contained, they would be resorted to.

W. J. I.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM C. LITTLE, Appt.,

v.

JOHN S. LIGGETT.

Principal and agent — loan broker — compensation.

1. Where an agent employed to effect a loan has diligently performed services under the employment, but is prevented from an attempt to complete the transaction by the refusal of his employer to accept the loan, he is entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services, even if he has not carried the matter far enough to have fully earned his commissions.

Same — when commissions earned.

2. An agent employed "to procure a loan" has ordinarily earned his commission when he has produced a person willing and able to make the loan upon the prescribed terms; and his claim to compensation will not be defeated by the refusal of such person to complete the transaction, because it turns out that a material representation made by the employer is contrary to the fact.

Headnotes by MASON, J.

Note. — As stated in the foregoing opinion, the right of a broker to commissions where the sale fails because of inaccuracy of the owner's representations is considered in the note to Hugill v. Weekley, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1262. The right of a broker to commissions on failure of employer's title is 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Sedgwick County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover a commission for securing a loan upon certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Adams and George W. Adams, for appellant:

Appellee having given the reason for his conduct in failing to carry out the terms of the contract, he was estopped to give other reasons for his conduct.

Redinger v. Jones, 68 Kan. 627, 75 Pac. 997; Gould v. Banks, 8 Wend. 562, 24 Am. Dec. 90; Holbrook v. Wight, 24 Wend. 169, 35 Am. Dec. 607; Everett v. Saltus, 15 Wend. 474; Wright v. Read, 3 T. R. 554; Duffy v. O'Donovan, 46 N. Y. 223; Winter v. Coit, 7 N. Y. 288, 57 Am. Dec. 522.

Where a real estate broker has procured a purchaser for the property of his principal, the solvency and ability of such purchaser to perform the obligation of his contract will be presumed until the contrary is proved.

Grosse v. Cooley, 43 Minn. 188, 45 N. W. 15; Gerding v. Haskin, 2 Misc. 172, 21 N. Y. Supp. 636; Krahner v. Heilman, 16 Daly, 132, 9 N. Y. Supp. 633; Fairly v. Wapoo Mills, 44 S. C. 227, 29 L.R.A. 215, 22 S. E. 108.

If it should be held under the pleadings and proceedings, notwithstanding the refusal of appellee to accept the loan, that appellant was required to procure a lender who was able, ready, and willing to make a loan, before entitled to his commission, the question is for the jury.

Hayden v. Grillo, 42 Mo. App. 1; McFarland v. Lillard, 2 Ind. App. 160, 50 Am. St. Rep. 234, 28 N. E. 229; Goss v. Broom, 31 Minn. 484, 18 N. W. 290; Cook v. Kroe-meke, 4 Daly, 268; Hart v. Hoffman, 44 How. Pr. 168; Phister v. Gove, 48 Mo. App. 455; Duclos v. Cunningham, 102 N. Y. 678, 6 N. E. 790; Gilder v. Davis, 137 N. Y. 504, 20 L.R.A. 398, 33 N. E. 599; Condict v. Cowdrey, 139 N. Morris, 19 Misc. 497, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1109.

Messrs. S. B. Amidon, D. M. Dale, and Jean Madalene, for appellee:

It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove treated in the notes to Yoder v. Randol, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 576, and Little v. Fleishman, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1182. Various other questions relating to brokers' right to commissions are treated in notes referred to in the Index to Notes under the title "Brokers."

financial responsibility, not because he contracts to guarantee responsibility, but because he must prove before he can recover, that the failure to make a contract was the fault of his principal, and not his own.

Moore v. Irwin, 89 Ark. 289, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1168, 131 Am. St. Rep. 97, 115 S. W. 662; Colburn v. Seymour, 32 Colo. 430, 76 Pac. 1058, 2 Ann. Cas. 182.

The acceptance of the loan on the part of the bank was not shown.

Davidge v. Guardian Trust Co. 203 N. Y. 331, 96 N. E. 751.

The procuring of an agreement to make a loan is not the same as procuring a loan.

Rosenthal v. Gunn, 119 N. Y. Supp. 165; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 902; Moore v. Irwin, 89 Ark. 289, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1168, 131 Am. St. Rep. 97, 115 S. W. 662.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

William C. Little sued John S. Liggett, alleging, in substance, that Liggett had employed the Wichita Loan & Trust Company to negotiate a loan of $40,000 upon real estate; that the company had arranged for the loan, but that Liggett, having sold his property, did not accept it; that the company had assigned its claim for compensation to Little, who asked judgment for $1,000, as the price agreed upon for the company's services, and also as their fair value. The defendant answered with a general denial, admitting, however, that he had made a written application to the company to procure him a loan, but saying that it had been agreed that he need not accept the loan, unless he should desire; and if he did not accept it he was to pay no commission. A reply was filed, consisting of a general denial. Upon trial, a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence was sustained, and he appeals.

There was evidence to this effect: The defendant employed the company to procure the loan for him, to enable him to build a three-story building upon the property. He told the company's representative that he had $5,000 on hand and could raise $25,000 elsewhere; and that the estimated cost of the building was $55,000. He furnished sketches showing its character. An agent of the company made a trip East and laid the matter before the investment committee of the New Hampshire Savings Bank of Concord, and was afterwards told by the president and treasurer of the bank that it would make the loan. On his return, he told the defendant that the money would be ready for him as soon as he was ready to use it. A number of conversations were had on the subject. Plans for the building were prepared, and bids were made upon 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) it, ranging from $60,000 to $80,000. After the matter had been pending several months the defendant definitely concluded not to build, and sold his lots. The arrangement had been that the money was to be furnished, in accordance with the usual custom in such cases, as the work on the building progressed. There was no agreement that the defendant was not to be liable for the commission, unless he accepted the loan.

We think the demurrer to the evidence should have been overruled. The defendant maintains that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that the bank was financially able to make the loan, and that there was a failure of proof in this respect. Upon the announcement of the ruling on the demurrer, the plaintiff asked to be allowed to show the financial ability of the bank by witnesses then present. The request was refused. In view of the pleadings and the evidence, the question of the bank's ability to make the loan must be regarded as largely formal. The doing of substantial justice required that the plaintiff should be allowed to reopen the case for the purpose of making a showing of that character, if thereby the objections presented by the demurrer could be met. The court must be regarded as having in effect decided that, conceding the financial responsibility of the bank, the plaintiff had failed to make out a prima facie case.

The defendant maintains that, in order to recover, it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that the loan was actually procured, or at least that the bank had entered into a binding agreement to lend the money; and that this was not shown, because there was no evidence that the officers of the bank, whose statements were relied upon, had authority to act in the matter. These officers included the president, the treasurer, and the investment committee. Whether or not they may be presumed to have had power to bind the bank, the plaintiff was, under the evidence, entitled, at all events, to a recovery quantum meruit. The company that was employed to effect the loan had performed services and incurred expenses under the employment. It had handled the matter with apparent success; it had done all that was incumbent upon it up to the actual closing of the transaction, and was prevented from going further by the refusal of the defendant to accept the loan. In this situation, the agent was entitled to recover, at least to the extent of the value of the services performed. Mechem, Agency, § 620; Glover v. Henderson, 120 Mo. 367, 41 Am. St. Rep. 695, 25 S. W. 175.

While the plaintiff was upon the witness stand, he returned a negative answer to the question whether the loan would have been made if the building could not have been erected for its amount. Probably he meant that the money would not have been furnished, unless, together with what the defendant could procure elsewhere, it would have been sufficient for that purpose. Taken literally, the plaintiff's statement was inconsistent with the rest of his testimony; for he said that the building was expected to cost $55,000, while the loan asked was but for $40,000. Such inconsistency does not authorize the sustaining of a demurrer. Acker v. Norman, 72 Kan. 586, 84 Pac. 531.

The defendant presents an argument substantially amounting to this: The agreement for the loan was procured upon the representation that a building of a particular description and rental value could be constructed for $40,000, when in reality the cost would have been from $80,000 to $80,000; that, with knowledge of this fact, the bank would not have made the loan; that no commission is earned by an agent who produces a person ready and willing to make a loan upon an incorrect statement of fact, even where such statement is obtained from the principal. There are cases apparently supporting that contention. In Curtiss v. Mott, 90 Hun, 439, 35 N. Y. Supp. 983, 168 N. Y. 663, 52 N. E. 1124, a real estate broker was employed to find a buyer for a piece of property which the owner represented as producing a certain income. The agent found one who was able and willing to take the property on that representation, but who refused to complete the purchase on learning that in fact the income was considerably less than the amount named. It was held that the agent was not entitled to his commission, although he might, perhaps, have an action against his employer for damages because of the misrepresentation. In Hausman v. Herdtfelder, 81 App. Div. 46, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1039, substantially the same ruling was made; the sale being prevented by the fact that the property offered for sale was of less area than the owner had represented. These cases seem to be in conflict with Cohen v. Farley, 28 Misc. 168, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1102, and with the great weight of authority. We think that, where a property owner employs an agent to find a purchaser for, or to procure a loan upon, property, the description given by the owner is a material part of the contract of employment: and if the agent fails of success only because the property turns out to be substantially different from that described, he is entitled to his compensation, having performed the service for which he was employed. The situation is entirely analogous 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

to that arising where a sale is defeated by the inability of the owner to make a marketable title, and in that case the agent is held to have earned his commission. Davis v. Lawrence, 52 Kan. 383, 34 Pac. 1051. The cases bearing upon the question are fully collected in a note in 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1262, entitled "Right of broker to commissions where sale fails because of inaccuracy of owner's representations." The statement of any circumstance which has a bearing upon the expedience of making the loan may be, for practical purposes, regarded as a part of the description of the property; it is essentially of the same effect.

The written application signed by the defendant recited that he appointed the company his agent "to procure a loan." It is argued that this language shows an agreement that no commission was to be paid, unless the loan was actually made. We think the rule is the same as in the case of the ordinary real estate broker's contract,—the commission is earned when the agent has produced a person willing and able to deal with the employer upon the terms specified. 19 Cyc. 263, 269, note 78.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

REPORT by the Superior Court of Plymouth County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court after directing a verdict in defendant's favor, of an action brought to recover damages for the suffering and death of plaintiff's intestate, caused by the explosion of a railroad signal torpedo, the property of defendant. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles W. Bartlett, Joseph W. Bartlett, Frederick E. Jennings, and Arthur Thad Smith, for plaintiff:

The defendant having in its custody a powerful and treacherous explosive in an unmarked container, which completely concealed its true character, owed to the plaintiff's intestate the highest degree of care to prevent such explosive from falling into his hands and injuring him.

Messrs. Frank W. Knowlton and Roger B. Hull, for defendant:

The duty of care owed by the defendant to all the world does not impose upon it the duty of seeing, at its peril, that the railroad torpedoes, however potentially dangerous they may be, are not carried away from its premises and so used as to cause injury.

R. Co. 115 Ky. 447, 103 Am. St. Rep. 330, 74 S. W. 171.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The injuries to the plaintiff's intestate which resulted in his death after a period of conscious suffering were caused by the explosion of a railroad signal torpedo, the property of the defendant. It may be assumed that the jury would have been warranted in finding upon the evidence the following facts: In the management of its business as a carrier of passengers, trains were provided with torpedoes, which whenever necessary were to be used by the flagman on the train ahead to warn trains approaching from the rear that a preceding train not very far distant was passing over the same track. The warning consisted in the noise of the explosion as the oncoming train struck the torpedo which the flagman affixed to the rail by straps forming a part of the apparatus. To be effective, not only the torpedo must be exploded by contact with the train, but the detonation must be sufficiently great to attract the attention of trainmen. The jury properly could infer from these circumstances, and from the testimony of the plaintiff's expert as to the character of the composition with which it was charged, as well as from the rule promulgated by the company, which was introduced in evidence, that the defendant knew, or by the use of due diligence should have known, that the torpedo contained a highly explosive compound. If exploded without proper precautions, or under extraneous conditions, pieces of the shell or case might fly with such force in various directions as to endanger the safety of persons in the vicinity. The use of a dangerous agency of this nature, which must be classed with gunpowder, and explosives like nitroglycerine and dynamite in its various forms, while lawful, imposed upon the defendant the duty of taking every proper precaution to prevent personal injuries to those lawfully upon the company's premises, from explosions which might be precipitated through the carelessness of its servants. Derry v. Flitner, 118 Mass. 131; Oulighan v. Butler, 189 Mass. 287, 292, 75 N. E. 726; Dulligan v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 201 Mass. 227, 231, 87 N. E. 567. The inquiry, accordingly, is whether the injury in question reasonably should have been anticipated by the defendant. Obertoni v. Boston & M. R. Co. 186 Mass. 481, 67 L.R.A. 422, 71 N. E. 980. The train which came into the station where the intestate, a boy of fifteen years of age, and his young companions, were waiting for the departure of friends, carried in the baggage car a torpedo to be used as a signal, which the jury could find was carelessly ejected by the defendant's baggage master, and fell within the railroad location. The evidence having warranted a finding that the intestate was not a trespasser, it would follow that if from the impact of the fall, or from the innocent intermeddling of bystanders, whose presence might have been anticipated, an explosion had followed injuring him, the company as matter of law would not have been exonerated. Lucas v. New Bedford & T. R. Co. 6 Gray, 64, 66 Am. Dec. 406; Bradford v. Boston & M. R. Co. 160 Mass. 392, 35 N. E. 1131; McKone v. Michigan C. R. Co. 51 Mich. 601, 47 Am. Rep. 596, 17 N. W. 74; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hammer, 72 Ill. 347; Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136. But the defendant was not bound to foresee that one of the intestate's companions, actuated doubtless by a boy's impulse and curiosity, in which apparently the intestate shared, to possess and explode the torpedo, would remove it almost immediately from the premises, and that after the lapse of ten days the experiment would be tried in the vicinity of their homes, and the intestate, who participated, would be fatally injured by the explosion. Denny v. New York C. R. Co. 13 Gray, 481, 74 Am. Dec. 645; Quigley v. Clough, 173 Mass. 429, 430, 45 L.R.A. 500, 73 Am. St. Rep. 303, 53 N. E. 884; Smith v. Peach, 200 Mass. 504, 86 N. E. 908; McDowell v. Great Western R. Co. [1903] 2 K. B. 331, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 652, 88 L. T. N. S. 825, 19 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Times L. R. 552. The accident is deplorable, but the wrongful asportation which brought the intestate in contact with the exploding torpedo occasioned the mischief, and distinguishes the case at bar from Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136, and the doctrine stated in Lebourdais v. Vittrified Wheel Co. 194 Mass. 341, 344, 80 N. E. 482. The injury not having been caused by its negligence, the presiding judge correctly ruled that there could be no recovery under either count, and in accordance with the terms of the report, judgment must be entered for the defendant on the verdicts.

OKLAHOMA CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

J. C. HAMPTON, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

(— Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 123 Pac. 571.)

Evidence — order of introduction — rebuttal.

1. (a) The fact that evidence may have been introduced in chief by the state does not necessarily prevent its introduction as evidence in rebuttal. The introduction of such evidence is a matter of discretion of the trial court, and will not be ground for reversal, unless an abuse of this discretion is shown.

(b) For evidence which might have been introduced in chief, but which was properly introduced in rebuttal, see opinion.

Same — crime — intention.

2. (a) Any fact is admissible in evidence which tends to shed light upon the intention of a defendant charged with the commission of a crime for which he is upon trial, even though it may tend to prove a separate offense.

(b) In a homicide case, it is competent to put in evidence the actions, conduct, and general demeanor of a defendant before the killing, for the purpose of proving that he was armed and in a vicious humor, provided only that such conduct is so near the time of the homicide as to tend to show the Note. — Waiver of privilege as to communication between husband and wife by calling one spouse as a witness for the other.

The competency of a spouse as witness in a cause in which the other is a party is often confused with the privilege as to disclosure of confidential communications, when, as a matter of principle, the two are entirely distinct, the one being a question of competency, the other a question of privilege. A spouse may be a competent witness state of mind of the defendant at the time of the killing.

Witness — failure to call wife — comment.

3. (a) Where it appears from the record that the wife of a defendant who is upon trial is a material witness in his behalf, and he does not place her on the witness stand or account for his not doing so, such failure of the defendant to call his wife as a witness in his behalf is a proper subject of comment to the jury by counsel for the state.

(b) The statute which prohibits husband and wife from being witnesses against each other is intended to protect confidential communications between them, but does not deprive the husband or wife of the testimony of the other as to any communications between them which would be competent evidence, were it not for the marital relations.

(c) The statute referred to is for the benefit of the husband and wife, and such communications are rigidly protected by the law from disclosure, except where this protection is waived by the party upon trial; and the husband or wife may waive the provisions of the statute by calling the other party to the marital relations as a witness. For the reasons supporting this construction of the statute, see opinion.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Bryan County convicting him of manslaughter. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. F. Semple and Utterback, Hayes & McDonald for appellant.

Messrs. Charles West, Attorney General, Smith C. Matson, Assistant Attorney General, and C. F. Davenport, for the State:

The reception of evidence is discretionary with the court, and no abuse of discretion has been shown.

Shires v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 69, 99 Pac. 1100; Harvey v. Territory, 11 Okla. 157, 65 Pac. 837; Cochran v. United States, 14 Okla. 108, 76 Pac. 672; 12 Cyc. 559.

Evidence of the conduct, actions, and general demeanor of the defendant before the

in a cause in which the other is an interested party, and yet not be permitted to disclose confidential communications with the other. Ex parte Beville, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 273, and note.

The rule which limits cross-examination generally to such matters as are brought out in the examination in chief seems to have been applied in some of the cases. This is the rule in California, New York, and Texas, while in Missouri, cross-examination is allowed as to any matter pertinent to the case. 40 Cyc. 2500.

The general rule is that the privilege of such communications may be waived, but in some jurisdictions the rule is otherwise. 40 Cyc. 2397. The question as to whether it is waived by calling one spouse as a witness for the other has not been considered in many cases.

In Percival v. Jack, 4 Cal. App. 199, 90 Pac. 555, where a party to a civil action called her husband, who testified in her behalf and was cross-examined by the defendant, it was held that the husband might be recalled for further cross-examination without the consent of the wife, and the general rule is laid down that where one spouse calls the other as a witness, the other side is entitled to cross-examine as to all matters brought out on the examination in chief. It is further stated in this opinion, however, that the testimony obtained from the witness was immaterial.

In Hobbs v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 71, 112 S. W. 308, neither the question of waiver nor confidential communications is directly discussed, but it is held that where the defendant in a criminal prosecution calls his wife to testify to a communication made to her, the state may subject her credibility to such tests by reasonable cross-examination as will disclose the truthfulness or inaccuracy of any statement which she makes. The same rule is applied in Marsh v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 144, 112 S. W. 320. The cases apparently go only to the question as to whether the cross-examination of the wife was proper within the Texas rule limiting cross-examination to matters gone into on direct. The same appears to have been true in a second appeal of the former case. 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 299, 117 S. W. 811.

In Columbia & P. S. R. Co. v. Hawthorne, 3 Wash. Terr. 353, 19 Pac. 25, where a plaintiff had called his wife to testify, it was held that he thereby consented that she might testify. Only this general statement appears in the report of this case, and it is not clear that any confidential communications were involved.

In People v. Wood, 126 N. Y. 249, 27 N. E. 362, where the wife of the defendant in a criminal prosecution was called as a witness for him, the question of waiver was not considered, but it was held that the defendant could object to any disclosure of confidential communications, thereby overruling the holding of the trial court that the wife was the only one who could object to disclosure under such circumstances.

In State v. Bell, 212 Mo. 111, 111 S. W. 24, where a defendant in a criminal prosecution called his wife as a witness, it was held error to require her to testify as to a confidential communication with her husband; but no question of waiver was discussed.

See note to Brown v. State, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 811, as to comment by prosecuting attorney on failure of defendant to produce witness, as ground for reversal or new trial.

killing is admissible to prove that he was armed and in a vicious humor.

Williams v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 523, 114 Pac. 1114.

Furman, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

First. Upon the trial of this cause, the state placed Richard Nichols on the stand to testify in rebuttal, and, over the repeated objections of counsel for appellant, said witness was permitted to state that he was present and witnessed the difficulty in which the appellant killed the deceased, and said witness saw the appellant, J. C. Hampton, just before the fatal shot was fired, and that the witness saw the right hand of the deceased at the time he was shot by appellant, and knows what the deceased was doing with his right hand at that time, and that the deceased did not make any motion with his right arm toward his right side or right pants' pocket at the time he was shot by appellant.

Counsel for appellant objected to the introduction of this testimony, on the ground that it was not in rebuttal of anything testified to upon the part of appellant, and should have been introduced as evidence in chief. Appellant was a witness in his own behalf and testified to a state of facts which were intended to make out a case of self-defense.

He testified that he was first assaulted by the deceased, and then proceeds to testify as follows:

A. After he struck that lick, it staggered me back a step, I guess, or such a matter, and he stepped back just a half a step, I reckon, or something like that. I know he made a step, and throwed his hand back by his right side.

Q. Show the jury the position he was in, Jule.

A. I don't know whether I can show it. I can't tell just exactly where his hand was. He was back that way; I couldn't see it. I heard him exclaim, "Damn you, I will kill you," and he had his hand back that way.

Q. What did you do then, Jule?

A. I—

Q. Show them what you did.

A. I jerked my gun and shot as quick as I could; just jerked it out and shoved it out and shot.

From this it is evident that the appellant tried to make the jury believe that at the time he fired the fatal shot he had reasonable ground to believe that the deceased was attempting to draw some weapon with which to kill him. So it is seen that the testimony admitted on the part of the state was flatly contradictory of appellant's evidence. While the testimony of the witness Nichols might have been introduced by the state as evidence in chief, yet it does not necessarily follow that it should therefore have been rejected as evidence in rebuttal. The introduction of such evidence is a matter of discretion with the trial court, and will not be ground for reversal, unless an abuse of this discretion is shown. Shires v. State, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 98, 99 Pac. 1100; Harvey v. Territory, 11 Okla. 156, 65 Pac. 837; Cochran v. United States, 14 Okla. 108, 76 Pac. 672. We do not think that the court erred in admitting the evidence objected to.

Second. Mrs. Lizzie Fahy testified on the part of the state that on the night on which the deceased was killed the witness attended an entertainment or show; that while there she saw the appellant, and heard him say to Mr. Boysdon something about someone taking property away from him at Savannah, and heard appellant say: "I ain't going to stand it; before I will let them have it, I will knock the block of them. No; I will shoot it off of them." She also heard appellant say in the same conversation, "I was man enough to serve a term in the penitentiary once, and I am man enough to serve another term." Appellant objected to all of this testimony, upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The same witness testified that after the show broke up and the parties started home, the shooting occurred in which the deceased lost his life. Mrs. Mary Boysdon, a witness for the state, testified that she heard the same conversation and statement made by appellant as previously testified to by Mrs. Fahy, and that the conversation occurred an hour or two before the time of the shooting. To this testimony, the same objection was made.

Ira Smith testified in behalf of the state that he was present at the show which was given just before the difficulty in which the deceased lost his life. That he saw the appellant there. That he heard the appellant say: "I have settled that McGregor matter; but old man Lamb is trying to get the rest of what I have got, and he has started something he can't get away with." Witness then said to appellant: "I understand that you and old man Lamb are lodge brothers and belong to the same lodge, and a few minutes' conversation with you might be worth a whole lot to me." That appellant said that he and Macon Green and another man were going to get the old man that night, and said, "Will you stay with me?" To which witness replied, "I will do anything I can for you that is right." That witness and appellant then took a drink, and about that time Dr. Rappolee passed along, and appellant says, "There goes the son of a bitch now," and said, "Let him take this, if he can," and produced a gun. That witness told appellant that the man passing was Dr. Rappolee. Appellant then hollered and asked the man if he was Dr. Rappolee. The man replied, "Yes," and appellant asked him to come back and take a drink. That appellant told witness that he was going to get the deceased at his front yard gate, or between the place where the show was being held and the front yard gate. That witness saw a pistol in the hands of appellant at the time. When appellant was upon the witness stand, he was asked with reference to these conversations. He testified that he did use some such language.

In the light of this evidence, we think that the testimony of Mrs. Lizzie Fahy and Mrs. Mary Boysdon was properly admitted, because it tended to prove that the appellant was armed and in a vicious humor just before the killing, and it threw light upon the main transaction.

In the case of Williams v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 523, 114 Pac. 1114, this court held that any fact is admissible in evidence which tends to shed light upon the intention of a defendant in the commission of a crime for which he is upon trial, even though it may prove a separate offense. In a homicide case, it is competent to put in evidence the actions, conduct, and general demeanor of a defendant before the killing, for the purpose of proving he was armed and in a vicious humor, provided that such conduct is so near the time of the homicide as to tend to show the state of mind of the defendant at the time of the killing. For a full discussion of this question and citation of authorities thereon, see Williams v. State, supra.

Third. Upon the trial of this case, in the closing argument for the prosecution, counsel for the state addressed the jury as follows: "Ah, gentlemen, is it not a remarkable fact, further, that he builds his defense upon what his wife told him, and she sits here by his side? Under the law, she is a competent witness in his behalf; but the state is not permitted to reach out and place her upon the stand against him. Her mouth is closed, so far as the state is concerned. If what he says about her,—if what he says that she said to him is true, if it is unlike what he says everybody else told him, why in the name of human justice don't he put her on the stand and have her tell about it?" This argument was objected to by counsel for appellant, and a motion was made requesting the court to exclude it from the jury. This motion was overruled, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) to which ruling of the court appellant excepted. These facts all appear by proper recitals in the case made.

In the case of Rhea v. Territory, 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 231, 105 Pac. 314, this court held that in a criminal case, where it appears from the record that the wife of a defendant is a material witness in the case in his behalf, and he does not place her on the witness stand, such failure upon the part of the defendant to call his wife as a witness may be commented upon by counsel for the state. We are still of the same opinion.

Counsel for appellant rely upon § 6834, Comp. Laws 1909, which is as follows: "Except as otherwise provided in chapters [89] on Procedure—Criminal, and [90] Procedure—Criminal—Before Justice, the rules of evidence in civil cases are applicable also in criminal cases; provided, however, that neither husband nor wife shall in any case be a witness against the other except in a criminal prosecution for a crime committed one against the other, but they may in all cases be witnesses for each other, and shall be subject to cross-examination, as other witnesses, and shall in no event on a criminal trial be permitted to disclose communications made by one to the other except on a trial of an offense committed by one against the other."

In their brief, counsel for appellant say: "If the wife had been called as a witness by the defendant, she could not have divulged communications made by her to her husband, the defendant, at that time, and could not have divulged communications made by her husband to her." With this contention, we cannot agree. It makes a discrimination against, and places a burden upon, the marital relation. The true purpose and effect of this statute is to protect confidential communications between the husband and wife, where such communications, if testified to by either the husband or wife, would be injurious to the party against whom the evidence was admitted. It would indeed be a narrow and unjust construction of this statute to hold that it deprives the husband of any testimony which his wife could give in his behalf, which would be competent if she was not his wife.

Section 6487, Comp. Laws 1909, is as follows: "The rule of common law that penal statute are to be strictly construed has no application to this chapter. This chapter establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed, with a view to promote its objects, and in furtherance of justice."

We therefore hold that the object of this statute, with reference to the testimony of the wife or husband against or in favor of the other, was adopted for the purpose of protecting confidential relations between them, and was intended for the benefit of both husband and wife, and it cannot be construed so as to deprive either of them of any right which they would otherwise have; and that it is competent for the wife or husband to testify as to any communication passing between them which might be beneficial to the party upon trial, provided only that such communication was otherwise free from objections, and that such wife or husband is called as a witness by the other.

Society is interested in preserving the harmony of the marriage relations, and anything which tends to disrupt those relations is to be discountenanced. The law therefore protects all those private confidences which the relation of husband and wife hold as sacred, the disclosure of which might introduce strife, malevolence, and discord into the married life.

For a splendid brief and citation of authorities on the subject of communications made in confidence as privileged communications, see Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 583, 70 S. E. 781, Ann. Cas. 1912 B, 1259.

To further illustrate the principle that a statute should be so construed as to accomplish the purpose for which it was enacted, we will take the statute which makes it a crime for any person confined in prison to escape therefrom, or for any person to assist any prisoner so confined in escaping. The statute does not say a word as to the legality of the confinement, or as to the intention with which the escape is made or aided to be made. On the face of the statute, the offense is complete when any person confined in jail as a prisoner escapes or is aided to escape therefrom. Suppose that a man is confined as a prisoner in jail without warrant or the least show of lawful authority, who will contend that it would be an offense for such person to escape from such confinement and to regain liberty? Grant that a prisoner is legally confined, suppose the jail catches on fire, and he escapes therefrom to save his life, or suppose that the jailer is absent, and other persons assist a prisoner so confined to escape from jail, who will be bold enough to say that, under either of these circumstances, a crime has been committed? Yet, in each of them, the letter of the law would be violated. Suppose a husband, upon his return to his home, finds that during his absence a brutal crime has been committed upon his wife, and she informs him that her despoiler had threatened to kill her and her husband also, if she dared to tell of the outrage committed upon her, and, on account of what had happened and the threat made, the husband kills this man under circumstances which would raise the issue of self-defense, would it not be an outrage upon humanity and a travesty upon justice to say that the wife was incompetent as a witness in such case in her husband's behalf, as to the facts which she had communicated to him? There was an ancient act of Parliament that whoever shed blood on the streets of London should be guilty of a felony. A man fell down in a fit on the streets of London. A doctor was sent for, who bled the man to relieve his malady. This doctor was arrested, tried, and convicted for shedding blood on the streets of London; but, on appeal to the House of Lords, it was declared by that body that, while he had violated the letter of the law, he had not violated its spirit; that the law had been enacted by Parliament for the purpose of suppressing breaches of the peace, affrays, and riots on the streets of London, and that this was its sole purpose; and that it did not include within its penalty any acts which were done for the preservation of the peace or of human life. But we have even a higher authority than this. If we go to the source of all law, Sacred Writ, we will find written there: "The letter killeth; 'tis the spirit that giveth life." Looking, then, to the intent and purpose of the statute, rather than to its letter, it would be an insult to the intelligence of the legislature and to American manhood and womanhood to hold that the legislature intended to refuse to permit a wife to testify as to communications made by her to her husband which would assist in presenting a defense in his behalf. This court will never hold that a husband is not justified in believing his wife, and in acting upon communications received from her, and that when he so acts that she is not a competent witness regarding such communications in his behalf, provided only that such communications are otherwise competent as testimony.

In the case of Evans v. State, 5 Okla. Crim. Rep. 643, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 577, 115 Pac. 809, Judge Doyle, in discussing privileged communications made by a client to his attorney, says: "The statute is for the benefit of the client, not the attorney; and such communications are permanently protected from disclosure, except where the client waives the protection." The same fundamental rule applies to all privileged communications. The husband or wife may waive the provisions of the statute.

We believe that the remarks made by the prosecuting attorney in this case were fully justified by the evidence; and we believe the court did not err in refusing to exclude them from the jury. This court stands uncompromisingly for the enforcement of the law; and when it is shown by the record that a party charged with crime is guilty, and that he has been fairly convicted, this court can be depended upon to sustain such conviction.

We have examined the record carefully, and we have no doubt as to the guilt of appellant. The only question is as to whether or not he should have been convicted of murder or manslaughter. The jury having seen fit to find him guilty of the lower offense, he should be exceedingly thankful therefor. We do not hesitate to say that, if the jury had convicted him of murder and assessed his punishment at death, it would have been sustained. There is considerable evidence in the record tending to show that the deceased and the defendant were both bad men; but this in no wise justifies or mitigates the offense committed.

We find no error in the record. The judgment of the lower court is therefore, in all things, affirmed.

Doyle, J., concurs. Armstrong, J., having presided at the trial of appellant in the court below, was disqualified, and did not participate in the consideration and decision of the case in this court.

CHARLES L. HYDE, Appt.,

v.

Eminent domain — operation of railroad — injury to adjoining property — liability.

1. A railroad company acting under the power of eminent domain is not, although the Constitution forbids damaging property for public use without compensation, liable for diminution in value of property

Note. — Right under constitutional provision against "damaging" private property for public use without compensation, to compensation for consequential damages to property, no part of which is taken, from smoke, noise, dust, etc., incident to ordinary operation of railroads.

This question is discussed in the note to Tidewater R. Co. v. Shartzer, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1053. Since that note it has been held that a constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken or "damaged" without compensation entitles the owner to damages from a railroad company, on account of smoke and cinders carried upon his property by ordinary currents of wind, but not by unusual currents. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Elliot, 129 Ky. 121, 110 S. W. 817.

Same — closing highway — liability.

2. A railroad company is not, under a Constitution forbidding the damaging of property for public use without compensation, liable for the diminution in value of private property because of inconvenience caused by the closing of streets not abutting on the property, but which afford access to it, where communication between the property and the general system of highways still remains.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brown County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the construction and operation of defendants' lines of railway. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Taubman & Williamson, for appellant:

Plaintiff is entitled to recover for incidental and consequential damages.

Omaha Horse R. Co. v. Cable Tramway Co. 32 Fed. 727; Omaha v. Kramer, 25 Neb. 489, 13 Am. St. Rep. 504, 41 N. W. 295; Searle v. Lead, 10 S. D. 312, 39 L.R.A. 345, 73 N. W. 101; Hyde v. Fall River, 189 Mass. 439, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 269, 75 N. E. 953; Smith v. St. Paul M. & M. R. Co. 39 Wash. 355, 70 L.R.A. 1018, 109 Am. St. Rep. 889, 81 Pac. 840; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 27 L. ed. 739, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 719; Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lelivett, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1, note; Cogswell v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 10, 57 Am. Rep. 701, 8 N. E. 537; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Scott, 132 Ill. 429, 8 L.R.A. 330, 24 N. E. 78; Shepherd v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 130 U. S. 426, 32 L. ed. 970, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 598; McElroy v. Kansas City, 21 Fed. 257;

ried upon his property by ordinary currents of wind, but not by unusual currents. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Elliot, 129 Ky. 121, 110 S. W. 817.

So, in Idaho & W. N. R. Co. v. Nagle, 106 C. C. A. 578, 184 Fed. 598, the Federal court, following the decisions of the Washington supreme court, held that the jarring of the earth by the operation of trains, and the casting of soot and cinders upon adjoining property, and the emission of smoke physically injuring such property, are damages within the meaning of such a constitutional provision.

So, damages from smoke, cinders, and ashes thrown from locomotives are recoverable under a constitutional provision Gainesville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Hall, 78 Tex. 169, 9 L.R.A. 298, 22 Am. St. Rep. 42, 14 S. W. 259.

Messrs. George W. Seevers and Campbell & Walton, for respondents:

Plaintiff has suffered no damage for which as a matter of law he could recover.

against damaging property without compensation. Danville & I. H. R. Co. v. Tidrick, 137 Ill. App. 553.

And likewise damages from vibration or jar from passing trains, resulting in a direct physical disturbance of the property. Ibid.

But there can be no recovery under such a provision by reason of mere noise from the operation of a traction company's road upon its own property. Griveau v. South Chicago City R. Co. 130 Ill. App. 519.

Nor is the operation of trains and engines on tracks lawfully constructed for the purpose of switching and making up trains, near a church, the effect of which is to interrupt religious services in consequence of the noise, a damaging of property within the meaning of such a constitutional provision. Church of Jesus Christ, L. D. S. v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 36 Utah, 238, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 860, 140 Am. St. Rep. 819, 103 Pac. 243. And see HYDE v. MINNESOTA, D. & P. R. Co.

Nor are noise, smoke, and dust, and other inconveniences and discomforts which must be borne by the general public, occasioned by the operation of a railroad in the street, recoverable under a constitutional provision that property shall not be taken, "injured, or destroyed" without compensation. Willock v. Beaver Valley R. Co. 222 Pa. 590, 72 Atl. 237, s. c. on subsequent appeal, 229 Pa. 526, 79 Atl. 138.

Nor can there be any recovery under such a provision, for noise, vibration, and dirt from the operation of a railroad. Wunderlich v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 223 Pa. 114, 72 Atl. 247.

Generally as to the right of an abutter to compensation for railroads in streets, see note to Rasch v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 673, and especially with reference to the effect of a constitutional provision against "damaging" property, and special injuries, on pages 741 et seq. of that note.

It is to be observed that neither the present note nor the one which it supplements deals with the question whether an allowance may be made for damages of the kind under consideration, in condemnation proceedings where part of the property has been taken. In this connection, see note to Idaho & W. R. Co. v. Columbia Conference, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 497, as to allowance for noise in proceedings to condemn a railroad right of way.

Nor do these notes deal with the right to recover such damages on the ground of nuisance. In that connection, see note to Ferrell v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 371, as to the liability of a railroad company for creating a nuisance, in connection with the note to Louisville & N. Terminal Co. v. Lellyett, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49, as to the effect of legislative authority upon liability for private nuisance.

As to right of property owner whose means of access from one direction is shut off or interfered with by closing of adjoining street or portion of street upon which he is situated, see notes to Hyde v. Fall River, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 269; Newark v. Hatt, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 637.

Whiting, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages which plaintiff alleged he had suffered through the acts of defendants. Upon the trial before the circuit court and jury, defendants objected to the introduction of any evidence under the complaint, basing their objection upon the ground that such complaint did not state facts constituting a cause of action. The objection was sustained, and verdict for defendants directed. Judgment having been rendered upon such verdict, plaintiff appealed to this court, and in his brief states: "There is but one question in this case. Plaintiff contends that he is entitled to recover for incidental and consequential damages. Defendant resists this contention, and claims that, inasmuch as the defendants constructed and are operating their line of railway upon their own land, the plaintiff, even though damaged, cannot recover." The cause has been presented to this court, both by the briefs and oral arguments, as though it were an appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint when such demurrer had been interposed before answer, and it will be so treated by this court.

The facts which such demurrer would admit are, in substance, as follows: Plaintiff is the owner of numerous lots in a row of blocks running east and west within, but at the extreme southern end of, the city of Aberdeen. There is no highway on the south side of such blocks, but there is a street along the north side thereof, and there are streets between such blocks, which last-mentioned streets originally extended, without interruption, to the north through said city. The defendants acquired the row of blocks next north of the row where plaintiff's property is situate, and, entering said city from the southeast with their right of way, defendants entered upon such row of blocks acquired by them, and used the same for a railroad right of way running westerly across the south end of such city. Defendants used no part of the street adjoining plaintiff's property on the north, but did cross all the streets running north from plaintiff's property, and closed two of such streets where the same crossed their right of way. There were at least two streets east of, and parallel to, and two streets west of and parallel to, those closed, which were not closed by such right of way, and the street running east and west along the north side of plaintiff's property connected with all of said open streets. It does not appear that there are any structures upon plaintiff's property. The defendants have constructed a line of railroad, depot grounds, coal bins, water tanks, depot, and engine house upon the row of blocks owned by them; their exact location as relates to the property of plaintiff not appearing.

This is not an action asking equitable relief by way of injunction; and, while the plaintiff, in one paragraph of his complaint, has set forth many sources of alleged injury, the only allegation of said complaint upon which he predicates his claim for money damages are those found in paragraph XI. of such complaint. We must therefore disregard all such matters as are not pleaded as grounds for the recovery of the judgment asked for, Paragraph XI. of the complaint reads as follows: "That the defendants are now operating said system of railway and running trains along the tracks of the same, and are using all of the space between Eleventh and Twelfth avenues as aforesaid, as switch yards and depot grounds; that First street and Second street have been closed to travel by the defendants, and no crossings are maintained over and across the switch yards and depot grounds of the defendants at First and Second streets, and that, by reason of the location, construction, operation, and maintenance by said railway company of said line of railway, and the closing and crossing of said streets, as aforesaid, and the continuous operation of trains over and across the streets aforesaid, north and east of the property of the plaintiff, and by reason of the smoke, dust, noise, and trembling of the earth occasioned by the operation of the trains of the defendants, and the location of the depot and roundhouse across or over the streets leading from plaintiff's property to the city proper, the plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of fifteen thousand ($15,000) dollars. Wherefore, plaintiff demands judgment against the defendants for the sum of fifteen thousand ($15,000) dollars, besides the costs and disbursements of this action." It will thus be seen that plaintiff's claim for damages is based upon the location, construction, maintenance and operation of the line of road and switch yards, such operation causing smoke, dust, noise, and trembling of the earth, and upon the closing of the streets to the north of, but not adjacent to, plaintiff's property.

We shall not attempt to harmonize the views advanced in the almost numberless decisions wherein the questions presented by this appeal have been discussed. All that we shall strive to do is to call attention to what we deem certain basic propositions which seem to have been frequently rejected or overlooked, and then determine the principles that should control under the facts presented by the complaint. From the reading of appellant's brief, it is apparent that he bases his right of recovery upon the use of the words "or damaged" in § 13, art. 6, of the Constitution of this state, which section reads: "Private property shall not be taken for public use, or damaged, without just compensation as determined by a jury, which shall be paid as soon as it can be ascertained and before possession is taken. . . ." From the reading of many of the decisions, it would seem that the courts have frequently held that the right of action to recover damages rested upon constitutional provisions similar to the above. Such holdings are certainly erroneous. We would cite the reader hereof to the excellent discussion found in a case from a state having no constitutional provision whatsoever, and would like to quote the opinion in full if space permitted. Staton v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. 111 N. C. 278, 17 L.R.A. 838, 16 S. E. 181. See also notes in 17 L.R.A. 838-842.

The history of the right to recover for the taking or damaging of property under the power of eminent domain, like the history of such power itself, extends back long prior to our Constitutions, either Federal or state. The power of eminent domain is an inherent right vested in sovereignty as a necessary attribute thereof; but long before the founding of the American Colonies it had become thoroughly established, as part of the English law, that it was unlawful to take the property of an individual for even a public use without making due compensation therefor. The taking of private property without compensation must have been especially repugnant to a people such as those who founded our present government, —the very corner stone of which is the equality of man before the law. We find that some of the courts have held that, even where there was no constitutional inhibition, the legislature had no power to take private property for public use without just compensation. See cases cited in the Staton Case, supra. The framers of the Federal Constitution did not even think it necessary to place therein any guaranty of this right to recover damages, thus showing that this right was fully recognized. The guaranty will be found in the 5th Amendment. Very few of the Colonies had any such guaranty in their fundamental laws, and most of them had none until long after statehood, while one, North Carolina, has never seen fit to place such a guaranty in her Constitution. Sooner or later the sovereign authority, the people, protected themselves from any attempt upon the part of their legislatures to deprive them of their right to recompense, by enacting the several constitutional provisions now in force. In the early days these constitutional provisions only guaranteed reimbursement in case of a "taking" of property, and the result was that some of the courts, construing the word "property" in its narrow sense as the "thing" owned, rather than giving to it the broader and truer meaning of "the exclusive right to possess, enjoy, and dispose of a thing" (Webster's New Int. Dict.), held that there was no provision against the mere "damaging" of the thing which was the subject of property, but that one could recover only when there was an actual "taking of the thing." See Thompson v. Androscoggin River Improv. Co. 54 N. H. 545, and case of Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 51 N. H. 504, 12 Am. Rep. 147, wherein, as well as in the Staton Case, supra, clear discussions of the results flowing from the misconstruction of the word "property" are found.

The cases holding to this narrow construction of the word "property," and holding that no recovery could be had under a constitutional provision guarantying recompense only where there had been a "taking" of the thing, were clearly in error, both in giving too narrow a meaning to the word "property," and also in holding that the right of recovery rested upon the Constitution rather than upon the common law or upon an inherent right superior to any legislative enactment. The result of these decisions was that many of the states amended their Constitutions by inserting therein the words "or damaged," or equivalent words, making them read, in effect, the same as the provision of our Constitution above quoted. The fact, however, remains, that the right to recover damages, whether the injury flows from a "taking" or a "damaging" of the property, is a right not coming from the Constitution; the only effects of the constitutional provisions being to prevent the legislatures from depriving the people of such right, and granting the right, under Constitutions such as ours, of preventing the "taking" or "damaging" until the recompense is made. We think there can be no question but that the including of the words "or damaged" does not broaden the effect of the constitutional provision over what it would be were the word "taken" alone used and the word "property" given its broad meaning, as given to it in the New Hampshire cases, supra, and that the including of such words does not extend the right of recovery to include that for any injury for which damages could not have been recovered at common law.

We must never lose sight of the fact that the question of negligence has nothing whatever to do with the question of right to recover damages, where such damages have resulted from the exercise of the power of eminent domain. The delegating to a person or corporation of the power of eminent domain can never in any manner absolve the person or corporation exercising such powers from liability for any negligence on his or its part, either in the exercise of such power or in the carrying on of any enterprise after the exercise of such power; and any action for damages resulting from negligence can in no manner raise any question based upon the exercise of the power of eminent domain, whether such action be brought prior to an alleged exercise of the power or afterwards. The damages to be recompensed for under the law of eminent domain are, from the very necessity of things, only those flowing from injuries that cannot reasonably be avoided even by the use of due care in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and are, ordinarily, only such as could be anticipated by a jury in the trial of an action brought before the "damage" had taken place. In the case at bar there is no plea of negligence. Therefore no question of negligence on the part of defendants is before us, and we must presume that defendants acted with all due care in everything pertaining to the matters complained of.

Not only is the question of negligence entirely foreign to the law of eminent domain, but the laws pertaining to private nuisances and to damages flowing therefrom are in no manner affected by the question of eminent domain. It seems inconceivable that it could ever be claimed that, when the state delegates to a private person or corporation the right to take or damage property under the law of eminent domain, it does more than to declare that lawful which otherwise would be unlawful, perchance render that not a public nuisance which otherwise would be one, leaving he or it, in so far as the taking or damaging of property may infringe upon the superior rights of the owners, liable to compensate for all damages flowing from the injury suffered; yet it is stated by some courts that, by giving to a corporation the right of eminent domain for the purpose of carrying on some enterprise, such enterprise cannot be held to be a private nuisance. This is clearly wrong. Any enterprise which would be a private nuisance when separated from the power of eminent domain will be exactly the same private nuisance if conducted by a person vested with the right to exercise such power of eminent domain. To illustrate: An abbatoir, when located near a dwelling house, must be conceded to be a private nuisance. If by statute a party be given the right to condemn and take or damage property to use as the site for an abbatoir, such abbatoir properly conducted would not be a public nuisance, yet, if located in a residence district, it would be a private nuisance, and any party injured thereby could recover damage for such private injury, and, under the Constitution, the taking of property for such abbatoir and the erection thereof could be restrained until compensation for the taking and damaging were paid, which compensation, so far as compensation for the "damaging" of property was concerned, would be limited to the amount of injury which the owner of the property would suffer from the carrying on of the enterprise with due care. The payment of such damages would absolve him from further liability only so long as he should run his plant with due care. It is undoubtedly true that it very seldom happens that any statute ever authorizes, under the power of eminent domain, the doing of that which is of necessity a nuisance per se regardless of its situs; therefore seldom any question of nuisance necessarily arises from the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and such question ordinarily arises only when an enterprise, not necessarily a nuisance is, under the power of eminent domain, located where, owing to its proximity to some particular property, it becomes a nuisance as to such property.

It must be conceded, and the authorities universally so hold, that a railroad, when properly operated, is not ordinarily a nuisance, and that it can only become a private nuisance when improperly or negligently operated, a question not before us in this case, or when, though properly operated, yet, owing to its peculiar location, it infringes upon some right which an individual has separate and distinct from the rights of the public in general. Railroads are absolute necessities. At the present day the very existence of a city often depends upon them. Their work is such that it is necessary for them to get as close to the centers of business as possible, not only for their own welfare, but for the public good. One who buys land in a city usually hopes that its railroad facilities will increase, thus causing the city to grow and his land to enhance in value. This hope is usually in the breast of every person who has chosen city in preference to country life. Connected with its advantages come its disadvantages. One may be called upon to part with his property for the public benefit. Streets used by him may be closed.

He may reside in the vicinity of the right of way and be disturbed by the noise of moving trains, and by the contamination of the air caused by the smoke and gases therefrom; but these are but things which must necessarily be borne in exchange for the benefits. Of course, if the trains are negligently run, a railway may become both a private and a public nuisance, and holden as such. A railway company may so locate its roundhouse that it may become a nuisance to the adjoining property holders, but the question of nuisance will depend not only upon the location of the roundhouse, but frequently upon the question of negligence in its conduct, and often upon the nature of the adjoining property. A railroad must respond in damages if it cuts off one's access to his property in any direction, but it does not necessarily follow that it cannot destroy a privilege of traveling certain streets distant from the property of such party. A railroad cannot dump cinders upon the land of another, thus injuring it, nor can it allow its engine to blow steam across the land of others. It follows that a railway must condemn sufficient land so that steam from its engines and cinders from its furnaces will not cause physical injuries to persons or property off the right of way.

What, then, is included in the word "damaged" as it is used in the above-quoted section of our Constitution? In the use of the terms "damage" or "damaged," as we have used them herein, we have had in mind only legal damage, and certainly it was in that sense that the word "damaged" was used in the Constitution and in our various statutes. Those Constitutions which use the term "or injured" where ours uses the term "or damaged" are more exact in the use of language. One thing that has often led to confusion is in not distinguishing clearly between "injury" and "damage," and in the careless use of the one term where the other should have been used. A person cannot be injured unless he has been wronged, and he cannot be wronged unless some right is infringed. Legal damage is the loss or detriment caused by the injury, the wrong,—the infringement of some right vested in one. Moreover, one is not wronged, though he may have suffered damages, unless he has suffered the infringement of some right vested in him which right is superior to the right vested in the party causing the damage, upon which right such other party defends against the consequence of his own acts. It therefore follows that, if a person desiring to enjoy the property of which he may be possessed makes a use of the subject thereof, which use is, under all the surrounding circumstances, a reasonable use thereof, not infringing in any manner upon any superior rights of another, he cannot, by such use, have wronged any other party, and cannot be holden for any damages suffered by any other person, though such damages flowed from such exercise of his right of property. I may be a merchant and have a lucrative business established. Another party may start a business, and by fair competition destroy my business, yet I cannot recover the damage suffered because I have suffered no legal injury. A party may have had a ferry across the river at Pierre, and have been earning good returns therefrom prior to the time when the bridge was built across the river. The building of the bridge may have destroyed the business of the ferryman, but he cannot recover from the bridge company for the injuries suffered. A man may have a low building, with windows on all sides. The owners of adjacent land may erect skyscrapers on three sides, cutting off largely the light and air before enjoyed, and the building may be practically ruined in value, yet there is no right of action to recover the damage, as there has been no wrong,—no legal injury has been inflicted. A person may erect a factory on the lot adjoining one's residence, and, while the operation of such factory may not be a nuisance, yet the fact that there is a factory there may destroy the value of the residence as such. There is no redress, as there is no wrong to redress, though the damage may be great in dollars and cents. Mohawk Bridge Co. v. Utica & S. R. Co. 6 Paige, 555; Bordentown & S. A. Turnp. Road v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 17 N. J. L. 314.

So in the case at bar, conceding that the plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $15,000, the question is: Does it appear from the allegations of the complaint that such damages flow from an infringement of a superior right vested in plaintiff, from what, under the surrounding circumstances, was an unreasonable use by defendants of their property, from a legal injury, or do they flow from acts on the part of defendants which in no manner constitute a wrong—a legal injury—to plaintiff. Must one to whom is given the power to take or damage property under the right of eminent domain respond for damages of a kind other than those any other person would be liable for? If the power of eminent domain was not given to a railway company, and such a company should acquire property by purchase, and should operate a railway thereon, operating it in a manner not rendering it a nuisance to the adjoining property, should the owners of such adjoining property have any greater or less right to recover damage because of the lack of power of eminent domain? Can the other party be more wronged in the one case than in the other? Certainly a railway company is in no worse position, so far as its duty to respond for damages inflicted upon others is concerned, because to it is given the power of eminent domain, and it obtains its right of way through the exercise of such power. The power of eminent domain vested in a private person or corporation in no manner lessens or increases its rights and liabilities in regard to payment of damages suffered by another through the exercise of such power, from what they would be if it took or damaged property without the exercise of such power, except that, for the taking or damaging, it may be required to respond before it does the taking or damaging.

In its last analysis, the question of whether there is an infringement of a private right, giving rise to an action to recover for "damaging" property, resolves itself into the one question: Did the party complained of so conduct its own business, as, under the circumstances, to constitute the exercise of its property rights a reasonable exercise thereof, and thus comply with the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non ladas? In determining this,—in fact, the sole question before us in this case,—we may discard as absolutely immaterial the existence of the power of eminent domain. Considering now the allegations of the complaint, we find the alleged sources of damage divisible into two classes: (1) Those resulting from the operation of the trains; (2) those resulting from the closing of two streets. We will consider the two separately.

There being no allegation of negligence on the part of the defendants in the management of their trains, and the location and operation of a railroad not being a nuisance per se, it cannot be presumed that the conditions and circumstances surrounding the establishment and operation of defendants' business were such that such establishment and operation were an unreasonable use of defendants' property and property rights and thus converted into a nuisance what otherwise would not be one. Neither does the mere allegation that plaintiff has suffered damage suffice, as such damage may have resulted from a use by defendants of their property and property rights which use was perfectly reasonable. Let it not be inferred that we hold that there could be no liability on the part of defendants. We have already mentioned some unreasonable uses of railroad property and unreasonable management thereof, and we fully agree with the decision of the court in Baltimore 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

& P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 27 L. ed. 739, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 719, cited by defendants; but the allegations in the case at bar wholly fail to set forth facts bringing this case in analogy with the facts in that case. Plaintiff would have the right to erect upon his land, as would also those of whom defendants purchased their right of way, a factory which, even if properly managed, might produce smoke, noise, and a trembling of the earth, annoying to the occupants of adjoining property and destructive of the value thereof, and yet the operating of such factory might be, under the circumstances, a perfectly reasonable use of property and rights therein. The nearest approach to an allegation sufficient to show an unreasonable use by defendants of their property rights is the allegation as to the "trembling of the earth occasioned by the operation of the trains." There is absolutely nothing to show that such "trembling" was of a nature or degree to be dangerous to any structure that had been or might be erected upon plaintiff's land. There should be sufficient to show that the "trembling" is such that works an injury to plaintiff by injuring his property. Any other "trembling" must be classed with noise and smoke resulting from a reasonable use of property.

As regards the closing of the streets, it matters not how they were closed, whether by location of depot and roundhouse thereon, or in some other manner. They were closed, and the damage, if any, flowing from such closing, would be the same, regardless of how or by whom closed. The authorities are in hopeless conflict upon the question of a railroad's liability for closing a street, where the part of street closed does not abut upon the land owned by the party claiming to be damaged. The great weight of authority seems to be that there is no liability in such a case. It will be found that many of the courts so holding base their decisions upon the wording of the constitutional provisions of the particular state. In that we think they err, as we believe, as hereinbefore stated, that the right to recover damages resulting from an exercise of the power of eminent domain is not based upon the Constitution, though it may be limited thereby.

While a railway company has the implied right, under the power of eminent domain, to cross a public highway with its right of way, and thus impose a further public use upon that part of the highway,—a use that must necessarily interfere to some extent with its use for other highway purposes,—there is no such implied right to vacate and close any part of a highway, upon the pretext that it is needed for railway purposes; and any such closing would constitute a public nuisance, and be punishable as such.

It follows that we must presume, there being no allegation to the contrary, that the defendants did not commit a criminal offense, and that the parts of the streets closed had been vacated by the duly qualified municipal body of the city of Aberdeen.

We note this fact for the reason that, in at least one case, it has been intimated there might be a claim for damages against a railway company if the street had not been duly vacated, where there would be none if it had been vacated at the request of the railway company. Harrington v. Iowa C. R. Co. 126 Iowa, 388, 102 N. W. 139. But we think a holding to that effect would be error. If a private right, as distinguished from a public right, is impaired, it is immaterial, so far as the question of private damage is concerned, whether the injury, if any, was inflicted under a rightful exercise of the power of eminent domain, thus eliminating the question of public nuisance, or whether the injury came through the wrongful act of the other party; nor is it material whether the injury was inflicted to further a public purpose or to further a private purpose. Thus it is immaterial in this case, in determining the actionable nature of the damage, whether the damage was inflicted by the closing of the streets by the city at request of defendants, as in case of Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 141 Ind. 604, 34 L.R.A. 769, 50 Am. St. Rep. 343, 39 N. E. 223, or whether the closing was by the city. Let us suppose the two streets in question had been duly vacated by the proper authorities prior to defendant's advent into the city of Aberdeen, and with that the situation, defendants had acquired these parts of the former streets; would their keeping the same closed in any manner increase the damage that plaintiff would have already suffered from the closing of the streets? Certainly not. It follows, then, that the damages recoverable for the closing of these streets is none other or greater than the city of Aberdeen itself would be liable for upon their vacation, if vacated through proper action upon the part of such city.

What rights has one in and to the use of streets? He has, whether an owner of the land or not, whether a citizen or a stranger, the right, in common with the rest of the public, to travel all of the public highways, which right may be of great convenience to him so far as certain highways or parts thereof are concerned, but of no convenience whatsoever so far as other highways are concerned. This is a right not in any manner connected with the ownership of land or other subject of property, and cannot be held to be in any sense a private property in the highways.

He has the right, as the owner of land, to access to such land and to every part thereof where it abuts upon a highway. This is a right resting upon the ownership of the subject of property, and connected with and appurtenant to such subject of property, and is therefore a property right. It is a special private right entirely distinct from the public right, and is one that pertains not only to the part of the highway abutting the owner's land, but extends sufficiently beyond his own premises as to insure him reasonable facilities for connection with those highways in which he has no special rights. Further than this his property rights do not extend, and therefore any interference with a highway beyond the point where one's special rights end is not a "taking or damaging" of property, and is not the infringement of any right giving rise to action for damages.

The learned author of Elliott on Roads, 3d ed., at § 1180, says: "The right which an abutter enjoys as one of the public, and in common with other citizens, is not property in such a sense as to entitle him to compensation on the discontinuance of the road or street; but with respect to the right which he has in the highway as a means of enjoying the free and convenient use of his abutting property, it is radically different, for this right is a special one. If this special right is of value,—and it is of value if it increases the worth of his abutting premises,—then it is property, no matter whether it be of great or small value." And at § 1181 further says: "Owners of lands abutting upon neighboring streets, or upon other parts of the same street, at least when beyond the next cross street, are not, however, entitled to damages, notwithstanding the value of their lands may be lessened by its vacation or discontinuance." One of the leading cases upon this question is that of Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254, wherein the opinion was written by Chief Justice Shaw. What he said therein seems peculiarly applicable to the facts alleged in the complaint therein: "The inconvenience of the petitioner is experienced by him in common with all the rest of the members of the community. He may feel it more, in consequence of the proximity of his lots and buildings; still it is a damage of like kind, and not in its nature peculiar or specific. The creation of a public nuisance by placing an obstruction in a highway can only be punished and suppressed by a public prosecution; and though a man who lives near it, and has occasion to pass it daily, suffers a damage altogether greater than one who lives at a distance, he can have no private action, because in its nature it is common and public. But if he suffers a peculiar and special damage, not common to the public,—as by driving upon such an obstruction in the night, and injuring his horse,—he may have his private action against the party who placed it there. The damage complained of in this case, though it may be greater in degree, in consequence of the proximity of the petitioner's estates, does not differ in kind from that of any other members of the community who would have had occasion more or less frequently to pass over the discontinued highway. The petitioner has free access to all his lots by public streets. The burden of his complaint, therefore, is that in going to some of his houses in some directions he may be obliged to go somewhat further than he otherwise would. So must the inhabitant of the south end of the city, or the citizens of other towns, with their teams or carriages, who would have had a right to use the discontinued way. Upon the question of public convenience, it is the province of the mayor and aldermen, upon a balance of all considerations bearing upon it, to decide. It is not to be presumed that they will discontinue a highway once laid out, unless the considerations in favor of the discontinuance decidedly preponderate." This subject is most fully treated in the case of Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. supra, in which will be found a review of many other cases. We will also cite Davis v. Hampshire County, 153 Mass. 218, 11 L.R.A. 750, 26 N. E. 848; Cram v. Laconia, 71 N. H. 41, 57 L.R.A. 282, 51 Atl. 635; Long v. Wilson, 119 Iowa, 267, 60 L.R.A. 720, 97 Am. St. Rep. 315, 93 N. W. 282; O'Brien v. Central Iron & Steel Co. 158 Ind. 218, 57 L.R.A. 508, 92 Am. St. Rep. 305, 63 N. E. 302; Borghart v. Cedar Rapids, 126 Iowa, 313, 68 L.R.A. 306, 101 N. W. 1120; Aldrich v. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. 195 Ill. 456, 57 L.R.A. 237, 63 N. E. 155.

The latter case, decided in 1902, seems to be a leading case upon the subject, and directly in point in the case at bar. It appears from the statement of facts in that case that in 1888 the plaintiff owned two lots fronting on Ashland boulevard, in Chicago, and erected thereon an expensive apartment building. In 1892 the defendant obtained, by purchase and condemnation proceedings, a right of way through the same block, and located and constructed on said right of way, north of said premises, an elevated electric railway, and that since 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1895 it has run its cars on said railway, propelled by electricity, crossing Ashland boulevard 31 feet north of plaintiff's building. To recover damages to her property caused by the construction and operation of defendant's road, the plaintiff brought this action. On the trial in the court below the court struck out all of the plaintiff's evidence, and directed a verdict for the defendant. The learned supreme court of Illinois, on appeal, affirmed the judgment of the court below, and held, as appears by the headnotes of the case, as follows: "Under the constitutional provision against damaging private property for public use without just compensation, no recovery can be had unless there has been some direct physical disturbance of a right which the plaintiff enjoys in connection with his property, and which gives it an additional value, and by reason of such disturbance the plaintiff has sustained a special damage in excess of that sustained by the public generally. . . . If an elevated railroad occupying its own land or right of way except where it crosses public streets is carefully constructed and operated, no recovery, under the constitutional provision against damaging private property for public use, can be had by the owner of property located near the tracks, because of the usual noise, vibration, interference with light, air, and view necessarily attendant upon the proper operation of the railroad, and suffered by such owner in common with the public generally." The court in its opinion says: "There was no charge or proof that the road was negligently constructed or operated, but only that, by the construction and operation of the road so near to appellant's property and across the public street there, her property was damaged for public use, within the meaning of the Constitution, for which no compensation has been made, and for which she is entitled to recover. The road was located and constructed by the company in accordance with lawful authority, and upon its own land or right of way, and not in any public street or alley, except where it crosses streets or alleys by authority lawfully granted. For the purposes of this case, it must be assumed from the record that it was carefully constructed and carefully operated, and that by such construction and operation it did not injuriously affect the property of others, or the property in question of the plaintiff, any more than any such property would be affected in any case by the construction and operation of such a road so near to such property. Ashland boulevard, running north and south in front of plaintiff's property, was 100 feet wide, and had been paved and beautified as a residence street. . . . The record shows that no unusual noise or vibration of plaintiff's property was caused by the company in the matter complained of. Access to her property from any public street . . . was not cut off or injuriously affected. In short, whatever damages were sustained by the plaintiff were such, and only such, as were common to the public generally. In Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, this court allowed a recovery against the city for damages to the plaintiff's property caused by the construction of a viaduct, on the ground that it cut off access from the public street to plaintiff's property. . . . Here there has been no direct physical disturbance of any right, public or private, which the plaintiff enjoys in connection with her property, and which gives to it an additional value, whereby she has sustained a special damage in excess of that sustained by the public generally. The damages sued for are of the same kind and character as those sustained by the public generally in the ownership of property, which property may have been lessened in value by the construction and operation of the road. Noise, the obstruction of light and of view, are necessary incidents of the construction and operation of such roads, and, if every property owner could recover in all such cases, the making of public improvements would become practically impossible."

The case of Searle v. Lead, 10 S. D. 312, 39 L.R.A. 345, 73 N. W. 101, is referred to and relied upon by the appellant as sustaining his contention in the case at bar, but, upon examination of that case, it will be found to come within the rule laid down in Rigney v. Chicago, supra, and that it has no application to the case at bar. In that case it will be noticed from an examination of the facts stated in the opinion, the city was threatening to raise the grade of the street 3½ feet in front of plaintiff's property, and that the raising of the grade would necessarily physically interfere with the plaintiff's easement or right of ingress and egress to and from her property, and either compel her to live below the new grade with a stairway, or require her to incur the expense of raising her building to the grade. The city, therefore, threatened a direct physical injury to plaintiff's property, not common to all the property owners of that vicinity. In the case at bar, however, there is no allegation that the plaintiff's property was taken, or any easement or appurtenance thereto interfered with, or that the plaintiff had suffered any damage or injury not common to all the residents of that part of the city. Possibly the depreciation in plaintiff's property might have been greater in degree than that of other owners of property in the vicinity, but it was of the same nature, and did not physically interfere with any right, easement, or appurtenance belonging to the plaintiff's property. It is clear, therefore, that in no view of the case were the facts stated by the plaintiff in his complaint sufficient to authorize a judgment in his favor. The facts upon which this action is based were before this court in the case of Hyde v. Minnesota, D. & P. R. Co. 24 S. D. 386, 123 N. W. 849.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Corson, J., concurs specially.

Haney, J., dissenting:

The only question properly presented by this appeal is whether, upon the allegations of the complaint, "liberally construed, with a view of substantial justice between the parties," the plaintiff is entitled to any relief. As I read the complaint, it discloses that the defendant the Minnesota, Dakota, & Pacific Railway Company, a domestic corporation, constructed a railroad into and through certain described portions of the city of Aberdeen adjacent to lots then and now owned by the plaintiff; that by reason of the construction and operation of such railroad, the plaintiff's property was and has been rendered "practically valueless;" that the plaintiff has received no compensation for the damage thus caused; and that no proceeding has been heretofore instituted to ascertain the amount of such damage. So it is admitted that the plaintiff's property was and has been rendered "practically valueless" by the construction and operation of the defendants' railroad. In other words, it was and has been substantially damaged by the construction and operation of the railroad. If it should be inferred that all the damage or injury has been caused by the operation of the railroad, I might concede that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, but the alleged causes of injury include construction, and, if the mere construction of this railroad, though constructed in an ordinary and proper manner, substantially depreciated the value of plaintiff's property, he is, I think, entitled to compensation. One whose property is "damaged," though none of it be "taken" is entitled to compensation. State Const. art. 6, § 13. Searle v. Lead, 10 S. D. 312, 39 L.R.A. 345, 73 N. W. 101. This action should be governed by the same rules that would have governed a proceeding by the railway company to have the amount of the plaintiff's damage ascertained. In such a proceeding the measure of recovery should be the depreciation, if any, in the fair market value of the property, caused by the construction of the railroad. In such a proceeding, and in the case at bar, the damage is the difference, if any, in the value of the property before and after construction. Osgood v. Chicago, 154 Ill. 194, 41 N. E. 40. As I construe the complaint, it shows that there was a substantial depreciation in the value of the plaintiff's property, caused by the construction of the defendants' railroad. Therefore, I think, the defendants' objection to the introduction of any evidence should have been overruled, and the cause submitted, if the evidence would warrant it, under instructions defining the grounds and measure of the plaintiff's recovery as indicated. The determination of what should be considered in estimating the value of property before and after construction of a railroad in this class of cases, depending upon the facts of each particular case, might better, it seems to me, be deferred until required by an appeal involving rulings relating to the admission or rejection of evidence. These, in brief, are my reasons for thinking that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed.

LUDWIG SEUBERT, Respt.,

v.

FIDELITY-PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Appt.

(— S. D. —, 136 N. W. 103.)

Insurance — vacancy of building — sleeping quarters.

A building leased to a woman for a

Note. — Effect of sleeping on premises to prevent their becoming vacant or unoccupied within insurance policy.

Conditions against allowing the insured premises to become "vacant or unoccupied" are construed with reference to the kind of property insured and the uses contemplated by the policy.

The meaning of the term "vacant or unoccupied" is a question of law, but whether the building was, at the time of the loss, vacant or unoccupied within the meaning of the policy, is generally a question of fact. Rockford Ins. Co. v. Storig, 137 Ill. 646, 24 N. E. 674; Moody v. Amazon Ins. Co. 52 Ohio St. 12, 26 L.R.A. 313, 49 Am. St. Rep. 699, 38 N. E. 1011; Schuermann v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 161 Ill. 437, 52 Am. St. Rep. 377, 43 N. E. 1093.

boarding house does not become vacant and unoccupied within the meaning of a clause in an insurance policy rendering it void under such circumstances, if, after the tenant has removed the most of her furniture to another building, her husband and his man continue to occupy the building nights, looking after his stock, which remains on the premises.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Minnehaha County in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying a new trial in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Boyce, Warren, & Fairbank for appellant.

Messrs. Sam H. Wright and W. J. Ellwood, for respondent:

The building was not vacant and unoccupied within the meaning of the policy, and defendant was liable.

during the daytime, and a man was hired to sleep there at night. The court said: "Conditions of forfeiture in policies of insurance are inserted solely for the benefit of the insurer, and are therefore to be strictly construed. The condition in one of the policies here is that the premises shall not be allowed to become vacant or unoccupied, and so remain, without notice to the company; and in the other, that the house shall not cease to be occupied as a dwelling house. They are such conditions as the parties may lawfully create by contract; but whether they have been broken, so as to incur the forfeiture of the policy, is a question of fact to be determined from a consideration of the attending facts and circumstances proved. The burden of proof was upon appellant. Bennett v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 51 Conn. 504; Kelley v. Home Ins. Co. 5 Ins. L. J. 134, Fed. Cas. No. 7,658. Conditions against allowing the insured premises to become vacant or unoccupied are to be construed with reference to the species of property insured, and the uses to which it is or may be devoted under the contract. In this case the occupancy was to be as a dwelling house, and any occupancy as a dwelling house will be held to satisfy the condition in respect of its nonoccupancy. Temporary absence or non-user as a dwelling for reasonable time, as, if the occupants were upon a visit, or the like, was clearly not intended to be prohibited, nor can it be held to be within the contemplation of parties that there should have been no reasonable interval of occupation between incoming and outgoing tenants. It here appears that, on the surrender of the premises by the tenant, Frazier, the insured took prompt means to procure another tenant. It is also made to appear that for some days before the fire all that could reasonably be done to procure its occupation by a tenant was done, and in the meantime all was done that could reasonably be required to protect the property and to avoid a forfeiture of the policy. The tenant was to have moved in on the 4th of May, and then again on the 5th, but was prevented by unavoidable casualty; and on 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the evening of the 5th, while Miss Race, and those acting with her, were in the actual occupancy of the premises, fitting it for the reception of the tenant, the fire occurred. It is clear that the fire was not the result of nonoccupancy by the tenant. Appellee had the right to occupy the house by tenant or by herself and her brothers and sisters, as she was doing at the time of the accident. It is shown that at the time of the fire, and for some days previous thereto, she was in the actual occupancy of the house, either by herself or some member of her family, for all the purposes of a dwelling, except for the preparation of meals and eating them therein. The contract is silent as to the number of occupants required, and we are not prepared to say, in view of the occupation at night and by day, as here shown, that the house was unoccupied within the meaning of these conditions."

It was held in Lester v. Mississippi Home Ins. Co. — Miss. —, 19 So. 99, however, that the insured house was vacant for more than ten days within the terms of the policy, where the owner with her family had been away for some days on a hunting and fishing trip, but her husband returned to the house everyday or so to look after it, and a brother-in-law also cared for it, and a servant who lived two or three hundred yards from the house was left in charge, and stayed in the house every night except on the night of the fire.

And in Eureka F. & M. Ins. Co. Baldwin, 62 Ohio St. 368, 57 N. E. 57, it was held that the court should have instructed the jury that a building insured as a dwelling house was unoccupied within the meaning of a provision that it should not become unoccupied without the assent of the insurer, where the insured and his son, who resided in the house at the time the policy was issued, vacated it, and it was vacant up to the time of the fire, although the son slept in the house during the daytime, and had a bed and other furniture there, and the owner visited the house each day and resided next door and obtained rain water from a cistern in the house.

Where workmen, clerk, lodger, or care taker sleeps in part of building.

In Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 3 Colo. 422, it was held that there was no violation of the provision stipulating for a forfeiture if the building should become vacant or unoccupied, where the insured building, which was used as a boarding house at the time the policy was issued, was vacated, but one of the rooms was furnished and used as a sleeping apartment each night by a man who was engaged in repairing the building. The court said: "We do not think that the company, by requiring that the building should be occupied, stipulated for a higher degree of care and watchfulness than the occupancy by Mr. Feely implies. While we shall endeavor to guard the rights of insurance companies by a fair and reasonable construction of their contracts, we cannot consent to see frittered away the rights of the insured by an illiberal and unjust interpretation of a policy designed for their (the insured's) protection. We are of opinion that the building did not become vacant or unoccupied within the meaning of the policy."

And the provision against allowing the insured building to become vacant or unoccupied is not violated where the insured with his family moved from the premises, but left a large portion of his furniture there, and placed a servant in a room to occupy it, and the servant slept there until the house was destroyed. German American Ins. Co. v. Evants, 94 Tex. 490, 62 S. W. 417.

And there is no breach of the condition of a policy covering a building adapted to be used as a saloon, providing for a forfeiture if it should become "vacant or unoccupied, or not in use," where it appears that a clerk was sent on the Saturday afternoon before the fire to fix up the building for use, and that he made some repairs and cleaned the interior, and slept in the building Saturday night, and was sleeping there Sunday night when the fire broke out, and it also appears that there was some furniture suitable for a saloon and a small stock

Corson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, and from the order denying a new trial. The action was instituted by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $1,000 upon a policy of insurance issued by the defendant upon a certain dwelling house in the city of Sioux Falls, which was totally destroyed by fire. The complaint is in the usual form, and the only defense interposed by the defendant is that the house became "vacant or unoccupied," and remained so for ten days, within the meaning of the clause in the standard South Dakota fire insurance form, which provides that the "entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement inof liquors in the building at the time. Stensgaard v. National F. Ins. Co. 36 Minn. 181, 30 N. W. 468.

And in Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Kiernan, 83 Ky. 468, it was held that a policy describing the insured building as "occupied as a family residence," and containing a clause providing that it should become void if the house "become vacant or unoccupied," was not avoided where the family which had occupied it moved out, but the owner, upon failing to obtain another tenant, immediately got a man to stay in one room of the house, which was furnished for the purpose, and it appeared that such person ate and slept there, having access to the entire building for the purpose of caring for and watching it.

And where, by the terms of the policy, the insured did not obligate himself to limit the occupancy of the premises to any particular purpose, there is no breach of the provision stipulating for a forfeiture if the premises should be left vacant and unoccupied, where one room of the insured building was occupied by a band of musicians and another by a lodger who slept there. Pabst Brewing Co. v. Union Ins. Co. 63 Mo. App. 663.

In Bonenfant v. American F. Ins. Co. 76 Mich. 653, 43 N. W. 682, the court held that the mere fact that the insured, when he moved from the insured building, left someone to look after it, would not prevent a forfeiture where the policy provided that if the building shall become vacant or unoccupied, the risk shall become void. It does not appear in this case, however, whether the person left to care for the premises slept in the building.

In Poor v. Hudson Ins. Co. 2 Fed. 432, a verdict for the insured was held to be supported by the evidence, where a policy covering a building used as a summer hotel contained a provision that a family should live in it throughout the year, and it appeared that when it was destroyed, in November, two men slept in the hotel and had their clothing there, and worked outside and about the house, going in and out several times a day, although they took their dorsed thereon, or added thereto, shall be void, if a building herein described, whether intended for occupancy by owner or tenant, be or become vacant or unoccupied, and so remain for ten days." At the close of all the testimony, both parties moved the court for a direction of a verdict, and the case was submitted to the court, findings of fact being waived. The court thereupon entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $1,061.60, being the amount of the policy, interest, and costs.

The only question presented by the record seems to be as to whether or not the facts warranted the court in holding that the premises had not become "vacant or unoccupied," and so remained for ten days prior to the fire. It is disclosed by the evidence that the building was occupied by Margaret Filber, a tenant, at the time the policy was issued, as a boarding house; that on or about the 27th day of September, more than ten days prior to the fire, the principal part of the furniture was moved to another house in the vicinity, and Mrs. Filber, with a woman assisting her, lived thereafter at the new place of residence; that Mrs. Filber's husband and hired man slept for several nights thereafter at their former residence, and so continued to occupy the same nights until within about five or six days of the time of the fire; and that the horses, chickens, etc., belonging to the husband, remained in a barn upon the premises until the husband finally le-meals at an adjoining hotel. But in Poor v. Humboldt Ins. Co. 125 Mass. 274, 28 Am. Rep. 228, which apparently involved the same loss, it was held that the jury was not warranted in finding that a warranty that the insured building should be occupied by a family throughout the year had been complied with, where the evidence showed that for some time prior to the fire the building was occupied only by two workmen who were employed elsewhere during the daytime and who took their meals away from the building, but left their clothing in the building and slept there.

Where some furniture was left in building and a person slept there until shortly before fire.

A provision in an insurance policy on a dwelling house that the policy should become void if the premises became unoccupied without the consent of the company is avoided where the insured, about two weeks before the fire, moved to another city to reside, taking a part of her furniture and leaving the remainder in charge of a person to be sold, although she left a man in possession with instructions to remain and sleep in the house until he could rent it, and he slept there several nights, but at the time of the fire, had been absent in another place for three or four days. Cook v. Continental Ins. Co. 70 Mo. 610, 35 Am. Rep. 438. The court said: "After she left the premises, there was no one living in it. She lived in Kansas City, and Southwick was, by her, instructed to sleep in the house, but he did not sleep in it after Wednesday night next preceding the Saturday night of the fire. His sleeping there at night was not an occupation of the house within the meaning of the policy. He did not occupy the house during the day. It is true that there is more danger from incendiaries at night than in the daytime, but dwelling houses unoccupied during the day are in more danger from that class than when occupied, and the abandonment of the premises by plaintiff diminished the security against the destruction of the house 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by fire. It will be observed that the condition avoids the policy if the premises become unoccupied, without regard to the period of time that they remain unoccupied, therein differing from the cases cited; and, giving it a liberal construction, while the temporary absence of the entire family for a day, or a few days, might not avoid the policy, yet if the family occupying the house abandon it, as in this case, for another residence, requesting a person to sleep there until it should be rented, and such person leaves the place several days before the fire occurs and remains away until it is consumed by fire, with what propriety can it be said that it was 'occupied' when burned? If the absence of plaintiff had been for a visit, and not to change her residence, the case might (we do not say would) be different. 'Occupation of a dwelling house is living in it.' 'A mere supervision over it is not sufficient.' It was plaintiff's business, under the policy, to see that the house was occupied. If she had put a tenant in possession under a lease for a month or a year, and, four days previous to the fire, the tenant had vacated the premises and taken another house, her agreement with that tenant would not have availed her in a suit with the insurance company. So her instructions to Southwick, admitting that the observance of them by him would have saved the policy, cannot avail her, if, with or without her consent, he did vacate the premises several days before they were burned. He slept there at night when in Sedalia, but did not take his meals there; was not there during the day. He was not living in the house, and this is not the case of an occupant of the house who was but temporarily absent when the fire occurred; and the circuit court did not err in holding that the house was unoccupied when burned."

But in Home Ins. Co. v. Wood, 47 Kan. 521, 28 Pac. 167, it was held that the jury were justified in finding that the insured house was occupied, where the evidence showed that the furniture and household goods were still in the building, although they had been packed in some of the rooms

It is contended by the defendant that when Mrs. Filber, the tenant, left the premises and moved a larger part of the furniture therefrom, the house became "vacant or unoccupied," within the meaning of the clause contained in the policy. The respondent, however, in support of the judgment of the court below, insists that, as the house was occupied by the husband and his hired man nights for sleeping purposes, and the horses, chickens, etc., were retained upon the premises, and a part of the furniture still remained in the house, the same did not become vacant or unoccupied within the meaning of the terms of the policy, and that the court was therefore right in entering judgment in favor of the plaintiff. We are inclined to take the view that the respondent is right in his contention, and that, under the evidence, the house did not become vacant or unoccupied, and so remain for ten days prior to the fire. It is quite clear that the house was not vacant for a period of ten days prior to the fire, as there was some furniture belonging to the tenant still remaining in the house. In Woodruff v. Imperial F. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 133, the learned court of appeals of that state, in discussing a similar question, says: "A vacant house is literally an empty house. This house was not shown to be empty. There were some things actually seen in it," etc. It seems equally clear that the house was not unoccupied for ten to make other rooms vacant, and it appeared that the insured had slept in the house until within a week or five days of the fire, when he left to sleep elsewhere because he was not well, but he was at the house each day, as was another person to whom he had given a key and who was fixing one of the rooms as a sleeping room for himself, into which he had moved his bed and trunk, but who had not actually slept there.

There is no breach of the condition against allowing the insured building to become vacant or unoccupied, where the insured's family had been absent from the premises for about ten days upon a visit, but the husband during that time came back and stayed in the house overnight on two occasions and he and another man slept in the house on the night of the fire. Johnson v. New York Bowery F. Ins. Co. 39 Hun, 410.

And where the policy does not stipulate that the insured building shall be used as a dwelling, or require any particular mode of occupancy, it might be found that the provisions avoiding the policy in case the building is vacant or unoccupied were not violated, where the insured occupied the building at the time the policy was issued, and some months after rented the property, and after his first tenants had left, he let it to another tenant, who moved his goods into it, and the goods of a son-in-law were also placed there, and members of both families occupied the house to a limited extent, sleeping there occasionally and doing some work there, and it appearing that the property was carefully watched and cared for up to the time it was burned. Moody v. Amazon Ins. Co. 52 Ohio St. 12, 26 L.R.A. 313, 49 Am. St. Rep. 699, 38 N. E. 1011.

So, there is no breach of a condition of a policy providing for a forfeiture if the premises become unoccupied and remain so for thirty days, where the buildings insured had been used for a number of years as a summer residence by the insured, who spent the winter months in the city, and it appeared that after the family had returned to the city for the winter, the insured visited the premises as often as once a month, and her husband during the whole winter season visited the house several times a week slept there from two to five nights each week, and on several occasions entertained friends and prepared his meals there. Western Assur. Co. v. Mason, 5 Ill. App. 141.

And the fact that the custodian of an insured house has access to only one room does not render vacant or unoccupied so as to avoid a policy of insurance, where the agent was notified that the owner's family was to be absent, and agreed that it would be sufficient to have a man in the yard, the furniture having been left in the building, and the custodian occupying an adjoining building only 30 feet away, and a part of the time sleeping in the room to which he had access. Home Ins. Co. v. Hancock, 106 Tenn. 513, 52 L.R.A. 665, 62 S. W. 145.

And the jury are warranted in finding that a dwelling house was not vacant or unoccupied within the meaning of a policy, where the insured and his wife, who occupied the premises at the time the policy was issued, shortly afterward went to another city to enable the wife to receive medical treatment, and they did not again regularly occupy the house, but during the absence the husband slept there about half of the time, and was never away from it for more than three days at a time, except upon one occasion when he was absent on business, and it appeared that a part of the time he slept in the house every night, and that later on he and his wife visited it, cooked meals there, and spent the night there, and it appeared further that practically all of their household furniture remained in the house. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Peyson, 54 Neb. 495, 74 N. W. 960.

But in Spahr v. North Waterloo Ins. Co. 31 Ont. Rep. 525, it was held that a provision that a policy should become void days previous to the fire, as the husband of the tenant, Mr. Filber, and his hired man, slept in the house up to within five or six days of the fire. So long as a part of the furniture remained in the house, and the same was occupied nights by the husband of the tenant and his hired man, and he had his live stock on the premises, it cannot properly be said that it was vacant or unoccupied.

The authorities upon the question of what constitutes vacancy or nonoccupancy within the meaning of the clause in the policy are numerous, and the circumstances involved in each case are so different it is difficult to extract from these authorities any general rule upon the subject. As before stated, it is quite clear the premises were not vacant within the meaning of that term as used in the policy, as we have seen in the case at bar a part of the furniture of the tenant was still in the house up to within five or six days of the fire. It seems equally clear that the house was not unoccupied within the meaning of the policy, as it was in fact occupied by the husband of the tenant and his hired man up to within five or six days of the fire. In Thieme v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 100 App. Div. 278, 91 N. Y. Supp. 499, the supreme court, appellate division, first department, of the state of New York, held in an analogous case, as appears by the headnote, that "where plaintiff's husband, who lived in another house on the same lot, placed a bed in the insured house after the tenant

if the premises were untenanted or vacant, and remained so for more than ten days without notifying the insurer, was violated where the occupant of the house ceased to reside in it for several weeks, but left his furniture and clothing there, and during the interval persons looked after the stock around the place, watered flowers, and did washing in the house, and the husband slept in it twice during the time.

Where most of furniture is moved, but building is occasionally slept in.

In Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 82 Md. 88, 30 L.R.A. 633, 51 Am. St. Rep. 457, 33 Atl. 429, it was held that there was a breach of the condition of a policy providing that it should become void if the house became vacant or unoccupied, where the insured moved from the building to another near by, and no person occupied it from that time until it was destroyed, although occasionally some of the insured's workmen and his son slept in the house for a few nights, but did not occupy it during the daytime, and although provisions and other stores were kept in the house, and the insured's wife visited it to get provisions daily. The court in this case said: "Occupation of a dwelling house primarily implies a living in it; and consequently a fair and reasonable interpretation of the words, 'vacant and unoccupied,' when used to describe a dwelling house, would seem to be that the house is without an occupant, —without some person living in it. An actual use of the house as a place of abode or habitation is what the insurer contemplates, and what the policy designs to secure. When the occupant of a dwelling house moves out with his family, taking part of his furniture and nearly all his wearing apparel, and makes his place of abode elsewhere, such dwelling house, whilst thus deserted, must be regarded as unoccupied, that is, vacated, if the word be given its natural and ordinary signification. It is the very situation against the hazards of which the company clearly undertook to guard itself by an express stipulation and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

condition inserted in the very contract upon which the suit is founded. Obviously the word "unoccupied," as applied to a dwelling house in a fire insurance policy, signifies not used as a residence; and consequently a designated tenement becomes unoccupied when it is no longer used for the accustomed and ordinary purposes of a dwelling or place of abode. Hence, no matter what other use it may be devoted to, so long as it ceases to be a place of actual abode,—a place really occupied as a residence or habitation,—it is vacant or unoccupied according to the plain import of those words, and according, too, to the sense in which they are manifestly employed in the contract of insurance. It is not a mere casual or occasional sleeping in a house that constitutes an occupancy of it. The element of a fixed abode is an essential ingredient of every concept of occupancy, when applied to a dwelling house; and the term 'unoccupied' is employed to express the directly opposite condition."

And a provision against allowing the insured premises to become vacant or unoccupied is violated where a dwelling house, granary, and horse barn were insured under a policy stating that they were occupied by a tenant, and the tenant subsequently moved out, and the insured told the agent of the company that he was not going to leave a tenant in the house in the future, but wanted his men to stay there when they were at work on the place, and, in accordance with this, the agent indorsed on the policy that it was thereafter to be occupied for dwelling and farm purposes, and after that it appeared that the premises were occupied only by the insured's men, who cooked and ate and slept in the house only when they were at work on that place, and for periods of more than ten days no one occupied the house nights. Fitzgerald v. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. 64 Wis. 463, 25 N. W. 785.

And in Hartshorne v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 50 N. J. L. 427, 14 Atl. 615, it was held that there had been a breach of a policy providing that if the dwelling house insured should cease to be occupied as a vacated, and slept there five nights each week, carrying on his business on the premises during the day, the house was not vacant and unoccupied for ten days, within the forfeiture clause of the insurance policy." In the opinion the court, in construing the forfeiture clause, which is similar to that in the case at bar, says: "The policy of insurance is the standard policy, and the question is whether at the time of the fire the premises were vacant or unoccupied within the meaning of the terms of the policy. To forfeit the policy, it was required that the premises should be or become vacant or unoccupied, and so remain for ten days. The fact that the plaintiff's husband did not sleep in the house on the night of the fire would not avoid the policy, unless the house was vacant or unoccupied, notwithstanding the fact that he was in the habit of sleeping there at least five nights a week during the period that the premises were unrented. The reasonable meaning to be given to this provision seems to me to be that a house does not become vacant or unoccupied so long as there are persons living in the house for some portion of each day. The plaintiff and her family lived in an adjoining house, and the premises in question had been rented and occupied by the tenant. When the tenant moved away, the plaintiff's husband moved into the house. He was about the premises all day, attending to his business, which was carried on there, and at night he generally slept in the house that was destroyed. This, it seems to me, was an occupation of the house within the meaning of this provision of the policy. If the plaintiff had hired a man to look out for the house and occupy it until it was rented, the mere fact that occasionally he slept dwelling, the contract of insurance should become void, where the occupant of the insured house moved to an adjoining farm, taking all of his furniture from the dwelling except a bedstead and some bedclothes which were used by his son, who slept at the house for about a month after the family left, when he also ceased to sleep there because the weather became too cold.

But in Thieme v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 100 App. Div. 278, 91 N. Y. Supp. 499, affirmed in 185 N. Y. 576, 78 N. E. 1113, it was held that the provision in a policy stipulating against the insured building becoming vacant or unoccupied was not violated where the building in question was a two-story one containing living apartments, which had been rented prior to the month of May, when the tenants moved out and a lounge was immediately put in the building and the insured's husband slept there five or six nights a week, and sometimes a whole week, and slept there on July 3d, when the building was rented, but did not sleep there on the 4th of July, when the fire occurred, although he went around the house on that evening and slept near by in another house situated upon the same lot in which he and his wife resided. The court said: "The fact that the plaintiff's husband did not sleep in the house on the night of the fire would not avoid the policy, unless the house was vacant or unoccupied, notwithstanding the fact that he was in the habit of sleeping there at least five nights a week during the period that the premises were unrented. The reasonable meaning to be given to this provision seems to me to be that a house does not become vacant or unoccupied so long as there are persons living in the house for some portion of each day. The plaintiff and her family lived in an adjoining house, and the premises in question had been rented and occupied by the tenant. When the tenant moved away, the plaintiff's husband moved into the house. He was about the premises all day attending to his business, which was carried on there, and at night he generally slept in the house that was destroyed. This, it seems to me, was an occupation of the house within the meaning of this provision of the policy. If the plaintiff had hired a man to look out for the house and occupy it until it was rented, the mere fact that occasionally he slept away from the house would not have made it a vacant or unoccupied house, which remained vacant and unoccupied for ten days. . . . The clause in question contemplates that the building might be one which was rented and usually in the occupation of a tenant; but there is no provision inserted that in such case where the premises remained unrented, the policy should be void; but the condition is that whether intended for occupancy by the owner or by a tenant, if the premises became either vacant or unoccupied, the policy should be void. It is not claimed that the premises were vacant, and I do not think that they became unoccupied so long as a human being lived in the house, using it to sleep in or for such other purposes as a dwelling is habitually used. Now, the plaintiff recognized the necessity of someone being actually in the house at night to protect it, and for that purpose her husband habitually slept there while it was unrented; and it seems to me that this was an occupation of the house within the meaning of this clause of the policy."

And in Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Owens, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 132 S. W. 828, there was held to be no breach of the condition providing for a forfeiture in case the building was allowed to become vacant or unoccupied, where, shortly after a tenant moved out, the insured's brother-in-law moved into one room of the insured house, into which he moved a bed and clothes, etc., and slept there every night except when he was absent for a few days, although he took his meals at a house across the street, and it appeared that the other rooms in the house were not furnished.

away from the house would not have made it a vacant or unoccupied house which remained vacant and unoccupied for ten days."

The court was clearly right, therefore, in holding that upon the undisputed evidence in the case the conditions in the policy relied on by the defendant were not violated, and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to judgment. As bearing upon this question, though not directly in point, see Shackelton v. Sun Fire Office, 55 Mich. 288, 54 Am. Rep. 379, 21 N. W. 343; Home F. Ins. Co. v. Peyson, 54 Neb. 495, 74 N. W. 960; Moody v. Amazon Ins. Co. 52 Ohio St. 12, 38 N. E. 1011, 26 L.R.A. 313, 49 Am. St. Rep. 699, and note; Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Kiernan, 83 Ky. 468; *Halpin v. Insurance Co. of N. NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

JOSEPH L. BODINE, Plff. in Err.,
v.
C. BERG et al.

(— N. J. —, 82 Atl. 901.)

Evidence — presumption — foreign law.
1. In the absence of proof of the law of another jurisdiction, the inference is that the common law still prevails there.

Alteration of instrument — note — date.

2. At common law the alteration of the date of a promissory note is a material alteration, and when made by one not a stranger to the obligation, will avoid it as to all parties not consenting thereto.

Principal and agent — alteration of note — binding effect.

3. When the general manager of a bank accepts for the bank a promissory note payable to its order, with surety, in the place of one then held without surety, and as a part of the transaction of acceptance alters the date of the new note to correspond with that of the note surrendered, the bank is chargeable with the act of its officer as one

Headnotes by BERGEN, J.

Note. — The question as to the determination of a case properly governed by the law of another state which is not proved is considered at length in the note to Cherry v. Sprague, 67 L.R.A. 33; and the same question in respect of the law of a foreign done in the course of the business of the bank by a general agent; and it cannot, as to nonconsenting obligors, rely upon the altered note as evidence of the indebtedness, and at the same time disavow the act of its officer and agent, and claim his action to be that of a stranger, or beyond his authority. Same — ratification.

4. The bank is chargeable with the general manager's knowledge of the fact that it holds a note which has been altered by its general manager; and if, with this knowledge, it accepts payments on account of the note, and subsequently assigns the note as altered, such acts amount to a ratification of the act of the manager in altering the note.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on two promissory notes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Scott Scammell for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William E. Blackman for defendants in error.

Bergen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, as assignee of the Mechanics & Traders' Bank, Market Branch, of Brooklyn, New York, brought his suit against the defendants to recover the amount claimed to be due on two promissory notes, the first of which is in the form following:

$4,435.50. Brooklyn, N. Y., August 31, 1908.

On demand, after date, I promise to pay to the order of Mechanics and Traders' Bank, Market Branch, forty-four hundred and thirty-five & 50/100 dollars at Mechanics and Traders' Bank, Market Branch. Value received.

C. Berg.

Marie Berg.

The other note was dated October 12, 1908, and was in the same form, except as to amount, which is $4,200. The notes came into existence under the following circumstances: Mr. Berg had obtained from the bank a loan on his individual note, bear-country, in the notes to Parrot v. Mexican C. R. Co. 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 261, and Cuba R. Co. v. Crosby, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 40.

ing date August 31, 1908, and in October of that year the officers of the bank, becoming dissatisfied, called upon Mr. Berg to supply additional security, and agreed to accept his wife as surety. At the same time, it appears that Mr. Berg's account was overdrawn to the extent of about $4,100, so the loan clerk of the bank, under the direction of Mr. Mailey, who was the manager of the Market Branch of the bank, in which position he had, as he testified, the same control as a cashier ordinarily has, prepared two notes, the first to represent the credit already given on August 31, 1908, and another for $4,200 to represent the over draft; each note being dated October 12, 1908. Mr. Berg signed both, carried them to his wife, obtained her signature, brought them back, delivered them to the manager, and received from him the individual note, dated August 31, 1908, and tore it up, and thereupon the date of the new note, given for $4,435.50, was altered by erasing October 12th and inserting August 31st in its place.

Mr. Mailey, the general manager, testifies: "I still held in my possession the original note, and gave Mr. Berg this new note, and he took it home and had his wife sign it and brought it back to me and tore up the old note—that is, the one of C. Berg—and gave me this one in the place of it; and the date was changed in my office, at my desk, in the presence of Mr. Berg, to have it correspond with my loan book and also the original note." The real controversy in this case is over this note and the effect of the alteration of its date, no defense being interposed to the note for $4,200, except payment, and that question was submitted to the jury.

There is no testimony in the case that the wife ever consented to, or had any knowledge of, the alteration of the date; but, although the plaintiff produced evidence tending to show that Mr. Berg had knowledge of the alteration, he denied it, and this disputed question of fact was submitted to the jury by the trial court. Regarding the effect of the alteration of the note on the liability of the wife, the trial court charged the jury that "the legal effect of that change was to release the wife from any obligation on that note," to which exception was taken. A considerable portion of the brief of the plaintiff in error is based upon the negotiable instruments act of this state (P. L. 1902, p. 583); but the case is barren of any proof of the law of the state of New York, where this contract was made and delivered, relating to commercial contracts. The plaintiff did prove the law of New York state concerning the liability of married women, from which it appears that married women are not prohibited from assuming liability as surety. As there was no offer made to show what the law of New York was regarding the alteration of commercial paper, the inference is that the common law still prevails there (Waln v. Waln, 53 N. J. L. 429, 22 Atl. 203), and under it the alteration of the date of a contract is a material one, and discharges all parties to the instrument from liability thereunder, except those who have consented to it. Master v. Miller, 4 T. R. 320, 2 H. Bl. 140, 2 Revised Rep. 399, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 669, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. 1277, and notes.

In Wood v. Steele, 6 Wall. 80, 18 L. ed. 725, the date of a promissory note was changed after it was signed by the defendant Steele, as surety for one Newson, without his knowledge or the knowledge of the plaintiff, who accepted the note from Newson for a loan to him. The court instructed the jury "that if the alteration was made after the note was signed by the defendant Steele, and by him delivered to the other maker, Newson, Steele was discharged from all liability on said note." It did not appear by whom the alteration was made; but as it was delivered in its altered condition by Newson, and none of the other parties had knowledge of the change in date, the inference is that it was changed by Newson. In affirming the foregoing instructions, the court said: "It is now settled, both in English and American jurisprudence, that a material alteration in any commercial paper, without the consent of the party sought to be charged, extinguishes his liability. . . . The fact in this case that the alteration was made before the note passed from the hands of Newson cannot affect the result. He had no authority to change the date." The suit in the above case was brought by the holder of a promissory note against a surety, who defended upon the ground that the date had been altered, presumably by his joint maker, after he had signed it, and without his consent; and it is not unlike the present case, so far as Mrs. Berg is concerned, if her husband altered the note without her authority or knowledge.

The note in the present case was altered in a material respect by the managing officer of the payee, and retained as the property of the bank, without the knowledge of the wife, and if the party to whom the alteration is charged was not a stranger to the obligation altered, such change would release a nonconsenting obligor; for a material alteration made by a party to a note or obligation will avoid it as against another party not consenting. 2 Cyc. 150, and cases cited; Draper v. Wood, 112 Mass.

315, 17 Am. Rep. 92. It is urged that in making the alteration complained of, the general manager of the bank exceeded his authority, and that therefore the alteration was made, not by the bank, but by a stranger. We do not question the correctness of the proposition that the alteration of contracts by one not a party to them, or without authority therefor, would ordinarily be a spoliation which would not change the original contract between the parties to it, but the present case is not confined to such conditions; for here the general manager of the bank, in the due course of its business, accepted, as its agent, a note in substitution of another, and, as a part of the transaction, at once changed the date of the note from October 12, 1908, to August 31, 1908, for the declared purpose of making the date accord with the one to be given up. The act was done in furtherance of the interests of the bank by an officer having general powers over the making of loans and the acceptance of securities therefor, and, as claimed by plaintiff, with the consent and in the presence of one of the obligors, upon whom the change was binding; and the question is whether, as to the nonconsenting obligor, the alteration by the general manager of the bank was so foreign to his authority as to excuse the bank from all responsibility in the matter, and to make the general manager a stranger to the transaction.

In Hollingsworth v. Holbrook, 80 Iowa, 151, 20 Am. St. Rep. 411, 45 N. W. 561, a chattel mortgage given to secure the note of the plaintiff was materially altered by the agent of the mortgagee. The trial court instructed the jury as follows: "If, however, you find from the evidence that the property mortgaged was originally purchased by plaintiff from D. W. Halsted [the agent], and that all transactions in relation thereto, including the giving of the notes and securing the same, were had with D. W. Halsted, and that the defendant B. M. Halsted [mortgagee] intrusted the whole matter of renewing and securing the notes to D. W. Halsted, both as to time of extension and the kind and amount of security to be obtained, and that, after obtaining said mortgage, said D. W. Halsted fraudulently and wrongfully made the alleged alteration therein, then said D. W. Halsted was so far the agent of said B. M. Halsted that his said wrongful and fraudulent act will avoid the entire instrument." The action in this case was brought by the mortgagor to recover property taken by the mortgagee under the altered chattel mortgage, and the question presented was whether the holder of the mortgage was chargeable with the alteration made by his agent, without his knowledge. The appellate court, in affirming the foregoing instructions, said: "We think the paragraph in question was substantially correct, as applied to the facts in this case. The agent was not restricted by the terms of his agency as to the security he might take. He was authorized to act upon his own judgment, and take such security as he thought best. In performing the duties assigned to him, if the claim of the plaintiff be true, he made a fraudulent alteration in the mortgage. In doing so, he did not act for himself, nor for the mortgagor, but for his principal: It may be conceded that such alteration was not contemplated by his instructions as agent; but it was not forbidden, and it operated as a legal fraud upon plaintiff. It was in the line of his agency and because of it."

We are of opinion that when the cashier or manager of a bank accepts a promissory note payable to the order of the bank, with surety, in the place of one then held without surety, at the same time surrendering the unsecured note to its maker, and as a part of the transaction of acceptance alters the date of the new note to correspond with that of the note surrendered, the bank is chargeable with the act of its officer as one done in the course of the business of the bank by a general agent; and it cannot, as to the nonconsenting obligors, rely upon the altered note as evidence of the indebtedness, and at the same time disavow the act of its officer and agent, and claim his action to be that of a stranger, or beyond his authority.

There is a distinction between the authority of a special and of a general agent, which does not depend upon the number of transactions in which the agent is authorized to represent the principal, but upon the scope of his authority so to do in the given transaction. The true distinction, as stated by this court in Manchester Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Allee, 81 N. J. L. 605, 80 Atl. 466, is "between the authority to perform a particular act in a particular way, and the authority to perform all acts connected with a particular employment." In the transaction under review, the manager was, as thus defined, the general agent of the bank; and hence all acts performed by him strictly in connection with the particular employment in which he was put forward to represent the bank, and done in supposed furtherance of its interests, were binding upon it, whether or not they were beneficial to it, or whether, through the negligence of the agent or his ignorance of the legal effect of his acts, they were in fact injurious. The mistake or the negligence of such agent is, in law, the mistake or the negligence of the principal. The question is, not whether the agent, in what he did, acted without negligence, or whether the result of his conduct was beneficial to the principal, but whether the acts he performed were done strictly in connection with the particular matter in which he was employed to act for the principal. There is no rule of law by which an agent represents his principal only so long as his acts are beneficial and performed without negligence, but ceases to represent him when the acts he performs as agent are negligently performed, or turn out to be the reverse of beneficial to the principal. One who claims the beneficial results of a general agency cannot disavow the untoward results of the negligent acts of his own agent in the identical transaction.

The case of Hunt v. Gray, 35 N. J. L. 227, 10 Am. Rep. 232, relied on by the plaintiff in error, is not applicable; for there the alteration was made by one without any interest in the note, and therefore a stranger in law to the obligation, his only authority being to carry the note to a bank for discount, and his act in altering it was clearly one of spoliation, in which case, it is well settled, the alteration does not annul the obligation of the maker to satisfy it. Should we assume, however, that the alteration was made by the manager without the authority of the bank, the fact that the bank held as an asset this altered note was known to the manager, which knowledge was acquired by him in a transaction within the scope of the bank's business. "A notice to a cashier is notice to a bank. This must be the rule; otherwise it will be impossible to get on in the ordinary course." Trenton Bkg. Co. v. Woodruff, 2 N. J. Eq. 117. Therefore, in this case, the bank had knowledge that it was the holder of a promissory note, the date of which had been, as it is claimed, altered by its general manager without authority. In such case, the act of alteration may be ratified by the bank; and it has been decided that accepting payment on account of the note, and the bringing of a suit on the note as altered, amounts to a ratification of what had been done. First Nat. Bank v. Fricke, 75 Mo. 178, 42 Am. Rep. 397.

By accepting and retaining the beneficial result of an unauthorized act of his agent, the principal, having knowledge of the facts, ratifies such act, and cannot repudiate the consequences of a particular act of the same agent in the identical transaction which produces the contract, the fruits of which are retained. Keim v. Lindley, — N. J. Eq. —, 30 Atl. 1063, affirmed in 54 N. J. Eq. 418, 34 Atl. 1073; 1 Parsons, Contr. 40, 52; Rader v. Maddox (Teague v. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the present case, it is undisputed that, while the bank held the note, chargeable with knowledge of its alteration by its own officer, it did not disavow the act, but accepted payments on account thereof, and, also, after its maturity, assigned the note, as altered, to the plaintiff, who brings his suit on the note as changed. This amounts to a ratification by the bank of the act of its manager in altering the note when he accepted it for the bank; and therefore the alteration was not made by a stranger, but by the payee and holder at the time. We find no error in the conduct of the trial on this branch of the case.

The plaintiff in error also argues that the consideration given to the husband for the first note, which was afterwards destroyed, will support a recovery upon the common counts against both husband and wife, "even though the note was avoided by the markings of the bank." It is sufficient to say on this point that the attention of the trial court was not distinctly called to this matter; nor is there any assignment of error to support it. We are referred to the fourth and sixth assignments of error as raising this question.

The fourth assignment rests upon a refusal to charge as follows: "If you find that the alteration was innocently made, without any fraudulent intention, but did alter the written instrument in a material respect, then, if you find that the defendant Carl Berg was given new credit at the bank, and the loans already made to him were not called by the bank, and that the new note was given in consideration of the extension of time, and in order that further advances might be made, and that the defendants, and both of the defendants, promised to pay the sum of $4,435.50 if the loans were not called upon the defendant Carl Berg, and if further advances were made to him, then you must give judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of money which you shall find to be due upon the note, marked 'Exhibit P3,' and for the sum of money which you shall find to be due upon the loans made on October 12, 1908, by Mechanics & Traders' Bank to the defendant Carl Berg, upon the faith of the promise of the defendant Carl Berg and the defendant Marie Berg to pay the said loan, against both defendants." This is a request to charge, in substance, that, even if the wife should not be liable on the altered note, still she could be held on an independent promise for a consideration moving to her husband. There is no evidence to support any such promise; and, as the request was not limited to the husband, but included the wife as to both notes, it was properly refused. There was no request that the husband alone could be held upon the common counts.

The sixth assignment of error affords no basis for the argument that the right of the plaintiff to recover upon the common counts against the husband was excluded from the jury. What the court said was whether the note "can be recovered against the husband depends upon whether the change of date was made with his consent, because the changing of the date, without the consent of either of the parties, destroys the note's efficiency as the basis of an action of this kind upon the note." A careful examination of this record fails to disclose that the point last argued was ever called to the attention of the trial court. The case was tried entirely upon the question of the alteration of the note and the amount of payments made on account of both notes.

The views expressed lead to an affirmance of the judgment.

turn, Bogert, and White, JJ., dissent.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

L. A. WICKER, Appt.,

v.

HAYES JONES et al.

(— N. C. —, 74 S. E. 801.)

Evidence — burden of proof — inter- lineation in deed.

1. One assailing a deed showing an erasure or interlineation has the burden of proving that it was made after the time of execution.

Same — what may be considered.

2. In determining whether an interlineation in a deed was made before or after execution, the jury may consider any difference in ink and writing, and also the fact that it was withheld from registration.

Same — waiver of objection.

3. Objections to incompetent evidence are waived by permitting the witness subsequently to testify without objection to the facts sought to be elicited by it.

Same — incompetent — waiver of admissions.

4. Error in admitting incompetent evidence is waived by subsequently admitting the fact which it is offered to establish.

Note. — As to presumption and burden of proof as to the time of the alteration of an instrument, see note to Tharp v. Jamison, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 100.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Lee County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain lands. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Allen, J.:

This was originally a processioning proceeding, and, it appearing that title to the land was in controversy, it was transferred to the civil issue docket by consent of all parties, and pleadings were filed. The plaintiff complained for the possession of certain lands alleged to be in possession of defendants, and for a judgment clearing the title of certain other parts of the same tract alleged to be in plaintiff's possession. The defendants admitted possession of a portion of the land described in the complaint, which part was described by metes and bounds in the answer, and claimed title thereto. Nearly all the land in controversy was on the west side of Juniper branch, and the remainder on the east side.

The plaintiff offered evidence that Elisha Wicker, his father, was dead, and introduced the following deeds: Deed from Daniel McGilvary to A. H. McLeod, dated October 19, 1867, registered in office of register of deeds of Moore county, in Book 82, p. 558, on the 5th day of November, 1867. Deed of Alexander H. McLeod and wife to Elisha Wicker, dated September 16, 1874, registered in the office of the register of deeds of Lee county, in Book No. —, p. —, July 19, 1911. The plaintiff also offered evidence tending to prove that the deeds covered the lands in controversy and other land, and that he and those under whom he claimed had been in possession of the same for more than thirty years, but he admitted that his home was on the land in the deeds outside of the dispute, and that he had not cultivated continuously the land in controversy.

tion: Deed of Daniel Hall and wife, Mary Hall, to Mary J. Jones, dated 15th day of April, 1879, registered in Moore county, September 30, 1885, in Book No. 56, p. 361. The courthouse was burned in that county, and the deed was re-registered the 18th day of January, 1908, in Book No. 40, p. 50. Deed from Daniel Hall and wife to Mary J. Jones, dated the 29th day of April, 1882, registered in the office of the register of deeds in Moore county, September 29, 1885, Book No. 56, p. 359, and re-registered in Moore county on the 5th day of September, 1898, in Book No. 18, p. 470. Deed of W. C. Edwards to Daniel Hall, dated 2d day of April, 1876, registered in Lee county, June 19, 1911, in Book of Deeds No. 5, p. 118. Deed of J. W. Burns to Daniel Hall, dated December 31, 1878, registered in the office of register of deeds, Lee county, March 16, 1909, Book of Deeds No. 1, p. 292. There were erasures and interlineations in material parts, on the first and second of these deeds, and the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to prove that the erasures and interlineations were not in the same handwriting as the body of the deed, that different ink was used, and that they were not made at the date of the deed, but afterwards. The defendant also introduced evidence tending to prove that said deeds covered the lands in controversy, and that she had been in possession thereof for thirty years, and had, during that time, cultivated continuously 5 or 6 acres of the land. The home of the defendant was not on the land in dispute.

John B. Cameron, a surveyor, was asked the following question:

Q. Examine that plat, and see if you can locate this description (attorney reading deed of Daniel Hall and wife to Mary J. Jones, dated 15th day of April, 1876). Also this tract (Daniel Hall and wife to Mary J. Jones, dated 29th day of April, 1882). State whether or not, as a surveyor, you can say whether or not this land on the west side of Juniper branch within that line running from 5 to B, B to C, and from C to Juniper branch, and Juniper branch to the beginning, is contained in that description. (Objection by plaintiff. Overruled. Exception.)

A. According to your papers, it does. I didn't survey that. I platted it.

This witness afterwards testified, without objection, that the deeds of the defendant covered the land in controversy.

Defendant introduced certified copies of the plat of division of the lands of Elisha Wicker, father of the plaintiff. (Objection by plaintiff. Overruled. Plaintiff excepted.) Also certified copy of mortgage of L. A. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Wicker to Elisha Watson, dated 20th day of March, 1891. (Objection by plaintiff. Overruled. Plaintiff excepted.) The western line of the land in the division and of the land in the mortgage is Juniper branch. The plaintiff testified that all the land he owned was not embraced in the mortgage.

The only part of his Honor's charge excepted to is as follows: "Now, in respect to the two deeds put in evidence by the defendants, and purporting to be made to Mary J. Jones,—one dated the 15th of April, 1879, and the other dated the 29th of April, 1882—the plaintiff contends that, according to the evidence on the face of the deeds, there has been, since the execution and delivery of the deeds, a change in the grantee, and that the name of Mary J. Jones has been by such change made the grantee in such deed. Now, the burden of showing this, and that such change was made by the grantee or someone in her interest, or the interest of the defendants, or that it was not made by the grantor or by his consent, is upon the plaintiff."

The following verdict was returned by the jury: "(1) Is the plaintiff the owner of, and entitled to the possession of, the lands included in the following lines: C to D to 3 to 4 to 5 to B and to C,—or any part thereof?" Answer: "No." The court rendered the following judgment: "This cause coming on to be heard, and being heard before his Honor, C. M. Cooke, Judge, and a jury, and the following issues having been submitted to the jury: (1) Is the plaintiff the owner of, and entitled to the possession of, the lands included in the following lines: C to D to 3 to 4 to 5 to B and to C,—or any part thereof? (2) And, if a part, what part? (3) Are the defendants in the wrongful possession of said lands? (4) What damage, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover against the defendants? And the jury having answered the first issue, 'No,' it is therefore considered, ordered, and adjudged that the plaintiff is not the owner, nor entitled to the possession, of the lands within the following lines: C to D to 3 to 4 to 5 to B and to C, as shown on the map on file in this cause, but that the defendants are the owners and entitled to the possession of said lands. It is further adjudged that the defendant recover of the plaintiff and D. D. Buie, surety on the prosecution bond filed in this cause, their costs, to be taxed by the clerk of the court."

The plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When we speak of an "alteration" in a writing, we refer to the legal acceptation of the term, which implies a change made after its execution, and, while an erasure or interlineation may be an alteration, it is not such if made before the final execution of the writing. Under the rule of the ancient common law, as illustrated in its earliest decisions, it was held that any alteration, however insignificant, rendered the writing void, and that the judge must pass on the whole question (Pigot's Case, 11 Coke, 26b), but this was modified, even in the time of Lord Coke, to the extent that the alteration must be material, and that the question as to the time when made should be submitted to a jury. In 2 Co. Litt. 225b, it is said that "of ancient time, if the deed appeared to be rased or interlined in places material, the judges adjudged upon their view the deed to be voyd, but of latter time the judges have left that to the jurors to try whether the rasing or interlining were before the deliverie."

Modern authority in England and in the United States have further modified the doctrine, until it is now generally agreed that, when an alteration is established, it avoids the instrument, if it is material; that the materiality of the alteration is a question to be decided by the court, without the aid of a jury; that any alteration is material if it affects the identity of the instrument or the rights and obligations of the parties to it; and that the question of the time when the alteration was made is a fact to be determined by the jury. It is also held in all the states except Missouri and New Jersey, that an immaterial alteration does not affect the validity of the writing.

An alteration by a stranger without the knowledge of the grantee or obligee, while it cannot enlarge the obligations of the grantor or obligor, does not affect the right to enforce the writing as it was originally executed, and the intent with which the alteration is made is immaterial, unless it is fraudulent, in which event a court will not lend its aid. The cases supporting these principles are collected in the valuable note to Burgess v. Blake, 86 Am. St. Rep. 79, and in the learned and comprehensive article on Alteration of Instruments by Judge John F. Dillon, in 2 Cyc. p. 150.

Many other questions may arise as to the effect of the alteration of instruments, but in the midst of much conflict of authority we confine ourselves to those necessary to the consideration of the principal question presented by the appeal, which is whether the burden is on the party claiming under a deed on which an erasure or interlineation is apparent, to prove that it was made at the time of or before the execution of the deed; or is the burden on the party attacking the deed to prove that it was made after its execution. The question is important, and many titles may depend on its correct solution, as it will frequently arise after the parties to the transaction are dead. If it is held that the burden is on him who urges that the deed is void because of the erasure or interlineation, it may furnish the opportunity to the grantee to withhold the deed from registration after he has altered it, until the evidence is lost by which the wrongful act can be proven, and thus secure the title to property which was not conveyed to him; and, if it is decided that the burden is on the party claiming under the deed, he may lose property for which he has paid, because of inability to prove that the erasure or interlineation was on the deed when delivered. A brief summary of all the North Carolina cases bearing on the alteration of instruments, which we have been able to find after diligent research, shows that the question has not been settled in this state.

In Nunnery v. Cotton, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 222, it was held that any alteration by the obligee in a bond, whether material or not, avoided it. In this case the alteration was the cutting off the name of a witness on the bond. In Pullen v. Shaw, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 238, held, that an alteration by the obligee in a bond avoids, whether material or not, and by a stranger does so, if material. If no evidence is introduced, the question whether the alteration was made before or after execution is dependent on whether the alteration is favorable to the obligee or not. In Sharp v. Bagwell, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 115, held, that equity would not relieve one who had cut off the name of a witness from the bond in ignorance of its effect. In Mathis v. Mathis, 20 N. C. 55 (3 Dev. & B. L. 60), the action was on a bond for $12.50, and the proof was that the bond was given for $7.40. Held, that the plaintiff could not recover $7.50, but that, if he had sued for $7.50, he could have recovered that amount, as the alteration was made by a stranger. In Blackwell v. Lane, 20 N. C. 247, (4 Dev. & B. L. 113) 32 Am. Dec. 675, held, that the addition of the name of a subscribing witness to a bond, without the consent of the obligor, is not an alteration, because not material. In Davis v. Coleman, 29 N. C. (7 Ired. L.) 426, held, cutting off the name of one obligor and adding another avoided the bond as to all who did not consent to the change. In Simms v. Paschall, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 276, held, that the fraudulent expunging of a credit on a bond was no alteration, because the credit was no part of the bond. In Smith v. Eason, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 38, held, that an alteration in a material part of a bond avoids it. In Dunn v. Clements, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 59, held, that retracing the name of the obligor, which had faded, does not avoid, although the name was misspelled in retracing; the sound of the name being the same. In Norfleet v. Edwards, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 457, the action was on an instrument to pay money, and the signature was that of a partnership. Two seals after the partnership name were erased, and the words, "witness," at the left of the paper, stricken out. The judge charged the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that the erasures were made before or at the time of the execution. Held error, because, as the paper was signed by the partnership, the erasure was made to fix its character. The court says: "In most, if not in all, the cases in which the contrariety of decision may be seen, it will be observed that the erasures, interlineations, or rather alterations, were made in deeds, negotiable securities, or other instruments whose nature and character were determined upon or fixed; that is, they either were intended to be, or were, at the time when the alterations were made, deeds or negotiable securities or instruments of some other particular kind. The instrument in the present case differs from them all in this particular: That the alteration was made for the very purpose of determining and fixing its character. With a seal it would be a deed; while, if that were erased, it would become a promissory note. If it were executed as a deed, it could not bind all the partners, but, if made as a promissory note, it would have that effect. . . . Under such circumstances, is it not a fair presumption that the seal was erased at the time when the instrument was given by the one party and accepted by the other?" In Darwin v. Rippey, 63 N. C. 319, held, that the addition of the words, "in specie," after "dollars," in a bond, with the consent of the payee and the principal, avoided the bond as to the surety. In Long v. Mason, 84 N. C. 16, held, that the addition of the words, "at ten per cent," in a bond, by the principal, without the knowledge of the payee, a guardian, or of the surety, but with the consent of the ward, avoided the bond as to the surety. In Respass v. Jones, 102 N. C. 5, 8 S. E. 770, held that where the vendee struck out his name in a deed, and inserted that of his wife, to defraud his creditors, no title passed, and a court of equity would not aid him. In Cheek v. Nall, 112 N. C. 370, 17 S. E. 80, a husband raised the amount of a 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bond signed by him and his wife. Held, that the bond was void as to the wife. It was also held that an immaterial alteration would not avoid, such as changing the recited consideration in a mortgage; the description of the debt in the mortgage remaining unchanged. In Howell v. Cloman, 117 N. C. 77, 23 S. E. 95, a note and mortgage were for $500 when signed, and for $1,000 when registered. Held, that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove that the defendant consented to the change. In Martin v. Buffaloe, 121 N. C. 35, 27 S. E. 995, held, that the insertion of the name of the attorney and the amount of his fee in a deed to secure creditors, with the consent of the grantor, after he signed it, did not avoid the deed, because it was not a clause necessary to the operation of the deed. In Wetherington v. Williams, 134 N. C. 279, 46 S. E. 728, the question was one of fact as to the time of the change, and the question of the burden of proof was not raised. In Gaskins v. Allen, 137 N. C. 426, 49 S. E. 919, a married woman while under age signed a deed. After she became of age, she signed another deed to the same party for the same land. Both deeds were registered under one probate, the commission authorizing it being dated before, and the date of probate after, she was twenty-one. A charge was approved, placing the burden on the plaintiff, a subsequent grantee, to prove that the date of the probate had been changed. In Perry v. Hackney, 142 N. C. 368, 115 Am. St. Rep. 741, 55 S. E. 289, 9 Ann. Cas. 244, the grantee after probate struck out his name from a deed, and inserted the name of his wife, without the consent of the grantor, and it was held that no title passed. The authorities elsewhere are in hopeless confusion as to the burden of proof.

Judge Freeman says, in the note to Burgess v. Blake, 86 Am. St. Rep. 128: "Among the almost innumerable decisions, and the conflict of authorities upon the subject of the presumptions arising from alterations apparent upon the face of the instrument, there seems to be but one principle upon which the authorities are in harmony. That is that where an alteration in an instrument is alleged to have been made, and such alteration is not apparent upon the face of the instrument, the burden of showing that the latter has been altered is upon the party who alleges it. . . . This, however, seems to be the single note of harmony. Where the alteration is apparent, the authorities are hopelessly divided as to the presumptions arising from such apparent alteration. Any attempt to reconcile them would be useless, and an accurate classification of their varying views is impossible. They seem to fall, however, into four general classes, each of which is representative of a view opposed to that of the others: (1) One line of cases holds that no presumption arises from an alteration apparent on the face of the instrument, but that the entire question of the time when the alteration was made is for the jury to consider in the light of all the evidence, intrinsic and extrinsic. (2) Another holds that an alteration apparent on the face of the paper raises a presumption that it was made after execution and delivery. (3) A third line of authorities holds that the presumption that the alteration was made after execution arises only where the alteration or the facts surrounding it are suspicious. And finally it is held by another group of courts: (4) That an alteration apparent on the face of the paper is, without explanation, presumed to have been made before delivery. This classification of the authorities is, at best, approximate only, as many of the courts have taken compromise positions holding the presumption to depend upon various matters, such as denial under oath that the paper was executed, the nature of the instrument, i. e., whether a specialty or not," etc.

As eminent authority may be found for either position, and we have no precedent in this state to guide us, and we must adopt that rule which in our opinion accords with the habits and customs of our people, and which will, in the majority of cases at least, be conducive to the settlement of controversies of this character according to the right. A very large percentage of the deeds executed in this state are never seen by a lawyer until some question is raised as to title. They are written, in many instances, by men who know little or nothing of legal rules, and who are not expert pensmen, and the materials used—pen, ink, paper—are such as are gathered in the household, and frequently not the best. Under these circumstances, a mistaken in writing the deed may be expected, and, when discovered, an erasure or interlineation follows naturally, without thought of the consequences. If two kinds of ink are present, they would be used indiscriminately, and the draughtsman would not hesitate to ask one sitting by to make a necessary change.

We do not doubt that 99 per cent of the erasures and interlineations that appear in deeds are made in this way, and from honest and proper motives, and, if this is true, it would seem to be wise and just to adopt a rule which will tend to preserve and sustain titles acquired by such deeds, although under it an injustice may occasionally result, and in our opinion it is safer, and in accord with the better public 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

policy, to hold as we do, that the party claiming under a deed is entitled to introduce it in evidence upon proof of its execution, and that the burden is on the party who assails it, on account of erasures or interlineations appearing on its face, to satisfy the jury by the greater weight of the evidence that the erasures or interlineations were made after the execution of the deed. A discussion of the numerous authorities in favor of this rule (and there are, perhaps, as many against it) would be useless, and we content ourselves by reference to a small number selected from many. In Doe ex dem. Tatum v. Catomore, 16 Q. B. 746, Lord Campbell says: "In 2 Co. Litt. 225b, it is said that 'of ancient time, if the deed appeared to be rased or interlined in places material, the judges adjudged upon their view the deed to be void. But of latter time the judges have left that to the jurors to try whether the rasing or interlining were before the delivery.' In a note upon this passage in Hargrave and Butler's edition of Coke upon Littleton, it is laid down: 'Tis to be presumed that an interlining, if the contrary is not proved, was made at the time of making the deed.' This doctrine seems to us to rest upon principle. A deed cannot be altered after it is executed, without fraud or wrong; and the presumption is against fraud or wrong." This language was quoted with approval in Little v. Herndon, 10 Wall. 26, 19 L. ed. 878, and the court says, after citing Doe ex dem. Tatum v. Catomore, supra: "In the absence of any proof on the subject, the presumption is that the correction was made before the execution of the deed." And this last case was approved in Hanrick v. Patrick, 119 U. S. 156, 30 L. ed. 396, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 147, the court, after discussing the charge of the judge, saying: "At any rate, the presumption was that the erasure was made before the execution of the deed." In Wickes v. Caulk, 5 Harr. & J. 41, the court says: "It is incumbent on the party who wishes to avoid a deed by its erasure, to prove that the alteration was made after its execution and delivery." And in Hopkins on Real Property, 429, it is said: "Where alterations or interlineations are present in a deed, the presumption is that they were made before the deed was delivered, though there are cases holding the contrary." To the same effect, see Hagan v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 330, 25 Am. St. Rep. 493, 46 N. W. 1114; Neil v. J. I. Case & Co. 25 Kan. 510, 37 Am. Rep. 259; Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 4 L.R.A. 196, 12 Am. St. Rep. 761, 42 N. W. 467; 2 Cyc. 233, 235.

This presumption is greatly strengthened by the facts appearing in this record, that the deeds were registered in 1885, and until this day neither the grantor nor any one claiming under him has attacked their integrity; and the defendants have been in the actual occupation of parts of the land since 1879. The Supreme Court of the United States said in Malarin v. United States, 1 Wall. 282, 17 L. ed. 594, when speaking of an alteration in a deed, that the fact that no suspicion had been suggested for eighteen years was entitled to no little weight.

The jury will, of course, have the right, in determining when the erasure or interlineation was made, to consider any difference in ink and handwriting and other relevant circumstances, and, if the deed has been withheld from registration, this circumstance, in the absence of explanation, would be entitled to consideration, and should have more or less weight according to the length of time elapsing, and viewed in connection with any change in the condition of the parties to the deed.

If, however, the presumption was against the deed, it is doubtful if the plaintiff is in a position to take advantage of it, as it does not appear that he claims under the grantors in the deed. Judge Dillon says in 2 Cyc. p. 189: "If the parties affected by a change in an instrument do not complain thereof, others who are not parties to the instrument, or affected by the change, cannot ordinarily set up the change, unless there is evidence of fraud between the parties, to the injury of the creditors. The alteration must relate to the parties to the particular instrument altered." See also Hockmark v. Richler, 16 Colo. 263, 26 Pac. 818; Logue v. Smith, Wright (Ohio) 10; Central Kentucky Asylum v. Hauns, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1016, 64 S. W. 643.

The exceptions to evidence cannot be sustained. If it be conceded that the answers of the surveyor to questions asked him were incompetent, it appears that he afterwards testified, without objection, that the deeds of the defendant covered the land claimed by her, which is all that was elicited by the examination objected to.

In our opinion, the plat of the division of the lands of Elisha Wicker, father of the plaintiff, and the mortgage of the plaintiff to Elisha Watson, of date March 20, 1891, were properly admitted, but, if not, their introduction did not prejudice the plaintiff, as they were offered for the purpose of showing that Juniper branch was the western boundary claimed by the plaintiff, and he admitted on cross-examination that Juniper branch was one of his lines in the division of his father's land.

The objection to the form of the judgment is well taken. The finding of the jury establishes the fact that the plaintiff is not the owner of any part of the land in controversy, and the defendants allege, in their answer, that they are in possession of all the lands which they claim. The plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title, and, upon failure of proof by him, the jury may well find that he is not the owner of the land, although satisfied that the defendant has no title. There is no fact admitted by the pleadings or found by the jury which will support an affirmative judgment in favor of the defendants, and the judgment must be modified by striking out the clause, "but that the defendants are the owners and entitled to the possession of said lands," and, as thus modified, it is affirmed.

The judgment will, of course, operate as an estoppel on the plaintiff to prevent the further prosecution of an action on his behalf.

Modified and affirmed.

Clark, Ch. J., dissenting:

It is reasonably well settled, though contrary to the ancient decisions, that, when there is an immaterial alteration by erasure or interlineation in a deed or other instrument, it does not vitiate. It is also settled that whether an interlineation or erasure is material or not is a question of law for the court. When a material erasure or interlineation appears on the face of an instrument, as is shown by proof dehors, whether the burden is upon the party that produces it to account for it, or whether the burden is upon the other party to show that it took place after the execution of the instrument, is a matter as to which the decisions outside this state are in conflict. In many cases the rule is laid down that, "where a written instrument shows an interlineation or erasure upon its face, the presumption, in the absence of evidence, is that it was made after execution, and the burden is upon the party claiming under the instrument to account for the alteration." 3 Enc. L. & P. 478; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 276; 2 Cyc. 238, and many cases cited in those volumes. In this state we have but two decisions expressly in point, and they are in accord with the above citations. In Dum v. Clements, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 60, it is said: "Wherever the alteration is a material one, a presumption of fraud arises. But it is, as we conceive, a rebuttable presumption; but, where the alteration is not material, the instrument will not be affected thereby, unless it be shown the alteration was made with an intent to defraud." 2 Parsons, Contr. 226 (notes); Adams v. Frye, 3 Met. 103." In Norfleet v. Edwards, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 457, the court cites with approval the following from 2 Parsons, Contr. 228: "In the absence of explanation, evident alteration of any instrument is generally presumed to have been made after the execution of it, and, consequently, must be explained by the party who relies on the instrument, or seeks to take advantage from it. Such is the view taken by many authorities of great weight. But others of perhaps equal weight hold that there is no such presumption; or, at least, that the question whether the instrument was written as it now stands, before it was executed, or has since been altered, or whether as so altered it was done with or without the authority or consent of the other party, are questions which should go to a jury, to be determined according to all the evidence in the case." Our court then adds: "Very many cases are referred to in the note to that page which fully support the remarks of the learned author in the text." See also Dunn v. Clements, 20 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 58. The rule in Dunn v. Clements, thus cited and approved in Norfleet v. Edwards, is not only the precedent in this state, but it would seem to comport with reason. The natural and orderly condition of a paper is that it should not bear on its face, or be shown by proof to have, any material alteration or erasure. It is out of the ordinary course, that the party who produces the instrument should account for them. It will be almost impossible for the other party to show when or how the erasures were made. The party in possession has, or should have, knowledge and be able to show that the instrument when received by him already had such erasures or alterations. If prudent, he would not accept such instrument without a contemporaneous entry duly witnessed that they were on the instrument when it was delivered to him. This view has additional weight as to a deed now, since our registration laws require prompt registration. If the deed is promptly registered, notice of any alteration or erasure may be conveyed to anyone examining the record, whereas, if the instrument is withheld from registration, it is in the power of the grantee to make any alteration as to the boundaries, courses, and distances, or acreage as he may think proper, and it will be out of the power of the grantor when, after years have elapsed, the deed is produced in evidence upon a recent registration, to prove that the alterations and erasures were made after delivery. It is always in the power of the grantee to protect himself against the charge that a material erasure or interlineation was made after execution, by requiring a memorandum stating that they were in the instrument at the time of the execution thereof. But the grantor cannot thus protect himself against alterations and erasures made after the execution, except by requiring proof of the grantee when he produces the instrument in evidence. As to negotiable instruments, though they cannot be held back as a deed can be held from registration, yet as to them the law is well settled, and the burden is on the holder to show that any alterations were made in such instrument at or before its execution, and no prudent bank will accept such paper in the ordinary course of dealings without such proof. It has been the general understanding in this state that material alterations by erasure or interlineation in an instrument, especially in a deed, must be noted and witnessed at the time of the delivery. Dunn v. Clements, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 60, has been understood to be the rule in this state. But, if it is understood that this safe precedent is no longer the law, we may well apprehend that there will be a flood of cases in which instruments have been materially altered after delivery, and are withheld from registration till the grantor or other witnesses who can prove the fact have passed beyond the reach of the court, by death or otherwise. The grantee remains in possession. It should be in his power always either to refuse a conveyance containing material alterations, or require a contemporary note thereof on the instrument. If he does not do so, and especially if he withholds the deed from registration, it is but fair that the burden should be upon him to account for such alterations or erasures.

were considered great temptations to idleness, but also because they were apt to draw together great numbers of disorderly persons, which could not keep from being very inconvenient to the neighborhood. 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 75, § 6; Rex v. Hall, 2 Keble, 846.

And in several early cases in the United States, the law on this subject which obtained at common law was recognized as still the law. Tanner v. Albion, 5 Hill, 121, 40 Am. Dec. 337; State v. Haines, 30 Me. 65.

So, in Updike v. Campbell, 4 E. D. Smith, 570, the same view of bowling alleys was entertained as prevailed in Tanner v. Albion, supra, and a contract leasing certain premises for the purpose of conducting a bowling alley therein was held to be void, because the leasing was for an illegal purpose, although Woodruff, J. said that he was by no means satisfied with the correctness of the decision in the Tanner Case.

But the modern view is the one held in State v. Hall, 32 N. J. L. 158, that a bowling alley kept by the owner with a view to profit, for public amusement not in itself prohibited by law, cannot be held to be a nuisance, unless such consequences attach from the mode in which it is kept; the mere keeping of a ten-pin alley is not a nuisance per se. Mr. Chief Justice Beasley said: "If the purpose of the house be not necessarily injurious to society, the keeping of such house is never criminal, unless it be made so by the manner in which it is conducted. No example, I think, can be found in any adjudication which is authority in this court, which holds that the law forbids the citizen to use his house for any purpose which, in itself, is not necessarily hurtful to the community. That the particular business of the house may, by the neglect or design of APPEAL by the plaintiff city and interveners from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Caddo refusing an absolute injunction for the suppression of a bowling alley as a nuisance, but enjoining defendant from operating the alley between certain hours, and requiring certain changes to be made in the construction of the alleys. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. G. W. Jack and J. S. Atkinson, for appellants:

When certain authority is vested by the legislature in the discretion of a city council, the action of the latter must not be interfered with by the court, unless it is clearly arbitrary.

Naccari v. Rappelet, 119 La. 274, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 640, 44 So. 13; Coreil v. Welsh, 120 La. 558, 45 So. 438; Monroe v. Gerspach, 33 La. Ann. 1011; Kennedy v. Phelps, 10 La. Ann. 227.

the keeper, sometimes, or many times, be perverted to immoral or other noxious purposes, cannot take away from the generality the right to carry on such business. The only question is whether the business which the house promotes is, in itself, hurtful to the community; and if it is not a house or building appropriated to a business admittedly of such a character, it is not per se a nuisance."

To the same effect as the preceding case are Harrison v. People, 101 Ill. App. 224; Bloomhuff v. State, 8 Blackf. 205; Hackney v. State, 8 Ind. 494; State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279.

And in Re Jones, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 74, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 548, 140 Am. St. Rep. 655, 109 Pac. 570, it was merely said: "We do not desire to be understood, however, as holding that billiard halls and bowling alleys are nuisances per se. There are plenty of modern decisions to the effect that they are not, and with them we are in entire accord."

So, in Pape v. Pratt Institute, 127 App. Div. 147, 111 N. Y. Supp. 354, although the court recognized that a bowling alley is not in itself a nuisance, yet, since the one at bar was alleged to be located and conducted in such manner as to constitute one, and being of a continuing nature, an injunction was granted to restrain its maintenance.

But where bowling alleys have been licensed by the municipal authorities, their operation will not be enjoined as a nuisance, where they are built in the same manner that such alleys are usually constructed and contain certain pads or cushions designed to deaden the noise caused by the dropping or rolling of the balls, even though the operation of the alleys disturbs the neighbors. Levin v. Goodwin, 191 Mass. 341, 114 Am. St. Rep. 616, 77 N. E. 718.

Bowling alleys were, however, at common law, held to be nuisances per se.

A use which is not necessarily a nuisance is not to be treated as a nuisance, and a municipality is without power to suppress that which it may regulate.

State v. Owen, 50 La. Ann. 1181, 24 So. 187.

The fact that a particular use of property is declared a nuisance by a town ordinance does not make it such unless it is in fact so, and is embraced within the common law or statutory idea of a nuisance.

Only exceptional noise and disturbance are actionable. It must, however, be very serious.

Froelicher v. Oswald Ironworks, 111 La. 705, 64 L.R.A. 228, 35 So. 821.

Summerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Leiderkrantz Society is a German social organization, originally formed for the purpose of having a singing circle, as is suggested by the name. It bought property in the suburbs of Shreveport, where it might have a park, and whereon might be erected a hall, etc., for its purposes. Five years ago it added a bowling alley as one of its adjuncts. The council of Shreveport, declaring that much complaint had been made by citizens residing in the neighborhood of the Leiderkrantz hall, of noise and disturbance emanating from the bowling alley, recently caused defendant, through its proper officers, to be notified to appear before it, the council, and to show cause why such bowling alley should not be suppressed as a nuisance. After hearing, the council by resolution declared that the bowling alley appeared to constitute a public nuisance, and ordered the same suppressed. It caused notice to be sent to the society, and, on failing to abate the nuisance, the city attorney was instructed to take such legal action as might be proper or necessary to suppress it. Whereupon this suit was filed. In its petition, the city alleges that the said bowling alley and clubhouse are located in a residential district; that the noise emanating from said bowling alley greatly interferes with the peace and comfort of the citizens living in that neighborhood; that the alley was conducted in a rough and boisterous manner, and in such a way as to render it a public nuisance; that the city council, in due order, declared by resolution such bowling alley to be a public nuisance, and ordered same abated; and that the continued operation of said bowling alley will cause petitioner and citizens residing in the neighborhood great and irreparable injury. It then asked that a writ of injunction issue enjoining and restraining the said Leiderkrantz Society from operating said bowling alley. After trial there was judgment as follows, in part: "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the demands of plaintiff, city of Shreveport, for a perpetual injunction entirely restraining and enjoining the defendant, Leiderkrantz Society, from operating its bowling alley as claimed by plaintiff under a resolution of the city council of the city of Shreveport, of date October 27, 1911, declaring said bowling alley a public nuisance, and ordering same to be suppressed, annexed to plaintiff's petition, be and the same are hereby rejected and denied."

The record shows that two citizens residing in the neighborhood of the defendant intervened and filed a petition joining the plaintiff, adding a few allegations, and joining in the prayer of the plaintiff herein. The petition of the interveners is not disposed of in the judgment of the court. They (interveners) have nevertheless appealed devolutively from the judgment.

The portion of the judgment given above was in favor of the defendant society. The petition of plaintiff was rejected and denied. In contradiction of what had gone before, the court proceeded to decree as follows: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the noise from the operation by defendant's bowling alley complained of by plaintiff and interveners be abated, limited, reduced, confined, and minimized within the periods and limits of time and under the conditions and requirements as follows, to wit."

The court then proceeded to fix hours within which defendant might operate its bowling alley, and to further provide for the remodeling of the building, and to direct certain changes and appliances to be made in the alley. This was not responsive to the prayer of plaintiff's petition, or to anything in defendant's answer. The order of the court is in the nature of an ordinance by a city council. It is a piece of legislation, and the court is without power to make such an order. It has no means of compelling a compliance therewith. That part of the judgment will be reversed and set aside. Both plaintiff and defendant, as well as the interveners, complain of the judgment. The city and the interveners have appealed, and the defendant has filed an answer to that appeal, asking that the judgment appealed from be set aside in its entirety, and the suit dismissed.

The city attorney says in his printed argument in this court: "Either the city did or did not have the authority to order the suppression of the bowling alley. If it did not, the lower court should have dismissed the suit. If it did, and the action was not arbitrary, the court should have granted the injunction as prayed for." The city has the right, under its police power, to suppress nuisances. It had the right to declare the bowling alley in question to be a nuisance, if, after investigation, it found it to be one. But this finding is subject to review by the courts of justice. A bowling alley is not a nuisance per se. Such an alley may become a nuisance, and it would be the duty of the court to sustain the action of the council if, after trial, the evidence proved that the council acted properly, and not arbitrarily. The city attorney asks the court to decide whether, in this instance, the common council acted in an arbitrary manner or not. The court will be slow to find that the council acted in an arbitrary manner, and set aside any act which it is authorized by its charter to perform.

We have not the evidence before us which was presented to the common council before it took action and declared the bowling alley to be a nuisance. The council has not adopted a general ordinance declaring all bowling alleys to be nuisances. It has not defined limits within which public bowling alleys may be established. So far as the record shows, there is no evidence directing how bowling alleys might be operated. We have nothing to guide us in these matters. Bowling alleys are to be found in all communities generally. They are often connected with hotels and other places where people assemble, and they are not usually considered to be nuisances.

A member of the council, while on the witness stand, was asked:

You were present when a resolution was passed by your body in relation to the Leiderkrantz Society?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Fullilove, there was no formal hearing when that resolution was passed?

A. Well, there was a hearing. I do not know whether you would call it a formal hearing or not. We so considered it. We had notified the members and officers of the Leiderkrantz Society to appear before the council and show cause why the operation of the bowling alley should not be condemned, and three members appeared, Mr. Goedekin, Mr. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Martineaux, and I do not remember the name of the third gentleman. I know him very well, but I cannot call his name. They appeared, and each one made a statement regarding the operation of the Leiderkrantz, and statements were made by the complainants, and the council thought that there was sufficient showing made to pass the resolution instructing the city attorney to bring the matter before the court. We thought it too serious a proposition to decide without all the evidence, and the court was the proper place to decide it.

This is the only testimony in the record as to how the council proceeded in the matter. It would appear therefrom that the council was of the opinion that the matter was a very serious one, and that it would be best to place it before the court. We think that this is an insufficient reason and an improper motive for the council to have declared the bowling alley of the defendant to be a nuisance. It should have heard all of the parties in interest before it came to any conclusion, and then it should have decided for itself as to whether the complaints were good or not, and whether the bowling alley was really a nuisance or not. It does not appear to have done this. The action was therefore unwarranted, and we conclude that it acted arbitrarily in adopting the ordinance.

The record is a very voluminous one. It is unnecessarily so. The petition of the city contains only two allegations: First, that the bowling alley greatly interferes with the peace and comfort of the citizens living in that neighborhood; and, secondly, that it is conducted in a rough and boisterous manner, and in such a way as to render it a public nuisance. The record contains a great deal of testimony which does not support either one of these two allegations. Some testimony refers only to the hall of the association, which is not connected with the bowling alley; other parts to dances, to concerts, to public meetings, to political meetings, to beer drinking, and various amusements which were indulged in in the hall, which are not complained about in the petitions. The complaints were about the bowling alley. This testimony was timely objected to, but the objections were overruled. It was immaterial, it was not responsive to the issues, some of it was hearsay, and the objections should have therefore been sustained. It would be a waste of time to go over these many bills of exceptions reserved to the rulings of the court. They are too numerous to be reviewed in this opinion.

A careful review of the evidence convinces us that many of the witnesses examined on the trial on behalf of plaintiff and interveners were actuated by a feeling of resentment towards the defendant society. These witnesses complained principally of the use of the bowling alley on Sundays and Sunday nights. They deemed Sunday to be a day for rest and church going, and not one for recreation and pleasure; and they therefore wanted the bowling alley closed. We recognize the right of all persons to have their opinion on such matters as the one now before us. We cannot undertake to enforce the opinions and ideas of the one party over and against those on the other side of the question. If the conduct of members of the defendant organization materially interfered with their neighbors while the latter were at public worship it would be the duty of the council to suppress them as constituting a nuisance; and the court would uphold the council in such action. The Sabbath was made for man; it is a gift from God to man. A man is not responsible to his neighbor for the use to which he may put his Sabbath, unless the former violates some law, or becomes a nuisance to that neighbor. We will not undertake to enforce the views of the witnesses of the plaintiff, upon the members of the defendant society in this matter.

There is some evidence in the record going to show that the bowling alley was kept open until very late hours at night; but the preponderance of the testimony is to the effect that the alley is closed about 10 o'clock each night on the three nights of the week that the bowling is indulged in. Whether this hour is a proper one or not at which to stop bowling is a question which the council may determine. If the testimony in the record showed that the acts of defendant disturb the physical comfort of the neighbors to an injurious extent, it would become our duty to restrain this defendant; but, in our opinion, it does not.

We have held that an offensive occupation cannot be carried on to the very great annoyance of one dwelling immediately near. That no one has the right to use his property so as to render other property about him in any degree useless. The enjoyment of one must have reference to the right of others in the neighborhood. Froelicher v. Oswald Ironworks, 111 La. 705, 64 L.R.A. 228, 35 So. 821. But the fact that a particular use of property is declared a nuisance by a city ordinance does not make it such unless it is in fact so, and is embraced within the common-law or statutory idea of a nuisance. And the things or acts complained of must come within the legal notion of a nuisance; and where it does not, no authority to remove or abate 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) it is derived from an ordinance declaring it a nuisance. Opelousas v. Norman, 51 La. Ann. 736, 25 So. 401; De Blanc v. New Iberia, 106 La. 680, 56 L.R.A. 285, 31 So. 311; New Orleans v. Legasse, 114 La. 1055, 38 So. 828.

The bowling alley of defendant is used for the pleasure and pastime of its members. It is a private place. It may not be of the same importance in the community as a business enterprise is. Yet the members cannot be interfered with by assuming that it is a nuisance per se. The evidence in the record does not sustain the allegations in plaintiff's petition. The action of the council in singling out defendant's bowling alley and declaring it to be a nuisance was arbitrary. The judgment appealed from will be reversed.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be reversed; it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that this suit be dismissed at plaintiff's costs in both courts.

Petition for rehearing denied May 20. 1912.

(113 C. C. A. 499, 193 Fed. 631.)

Libel — employment agent — charging boycott.

1. A publication stating that the exclusive agency for securing talent for an opera house boycotts the best singers is not libelous, although boycotting is a crime by statute, since the word is not used in its statutory sense.

Note. — Libel and slander: charging one with exacting excessive compensation for goods or services.

This note does not include cases where the charge was generally of cheating, stealing, dishonesty, extortion, blackmail, embezzlement, bribery, swindling, or graft; accordingly, cases are excluded which deal simply with the charge of the foisting upon a customer of inferior goods or services at a standard rate; also cases where the charge was of beating down prices or underselling.

Appeal — instruction — failure of party to appear as witness.

3. It is error for the court to instruct the jury that they might consider the failure of plaintiff in a libel case to appear as a witness, as raising an inference against him, if he was beyond the seas and there was nothing in the pleadings or evidence which called for any explanation or contradiction on his part.

(February 1, 1912.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment in de-dan, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 497, as to charge of graft as libel per se.

Generally, to charge another falsely with exacting excessive or exorbitant prices or rates for goods or services, if spoken or published of him in respect of his business or profession, is actionable per se, without proof of special damages; such a charge imputes business or professional misconduct, tends to bring the object of it into disrepute, to degrade him in the estimation of the community, to deprive him of public confidence, and thus to injure him in his business or profession. This rule has been applied to the following charges, and they have been held to be libel or slander according as to whether they were published or oral:

—an article published of an attorney speaking in the heading of "the biggest kind of grist," and "rather slight services for a very large fee," and going on to charge him, among other wrongdoings, with making false charges for services and extorting excessive compensation. Atkinson v. Detroit Free Press Co. 46 Mich. 341, 9 N. W. 501;

—an article published of an attorney, charging him with exacting an excessive fee for merely nominal services, and sneeringly insinuating that he has outdone Pecksniff and Shylock. Reynolds v. Holland, 46 Wash. 537, 90 Pac. 648;

—a letter by an attorney concerning other attorneys, stating that it looked very much as if they put their heads together and each of them got as much out of an estate in settling it as possible, and going on to characterize certain amounts named as fees as outrageous and exorbitant. Mosnat v. Snyder, 105 Iowa, 500, 75 N. W. 356;

—the statement published concerning a lawyer who was a candidate for a public office, that he did a good thing in his sober moments in the way of collecting soldiers' claims against the government for a fearful percentage, and that the blood money he had got from the "Boys in Blue" in that way was supposed to be a big thing, and might elect him to the assembly on the "loyal" ticket, although the soldiers and sailors were out in full force against him. 40 L.R.A. fendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lacombe, Coxe, and Noyes, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Maurice Leon for plaintiff in error.

Lacombe, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff is a French citizen and a resident of the city of Paris, where—and elsewhere in Europe—he has been engaged in business as intermediary to secure engagements for operatic singers and similar artists.

He had a contract dated October 21, 1908, with the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, a private corporation,

Rose*, 128 Wis. 24, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 741, 110 Am. St. Rep. 894, 105 N. W. 225, 5 Ann. Cas. 549;

—an article published concerning a vendor of goods by a rival concern, that he charged exorbitant prices for his goods, and thereby practised an imposition on the public. Ontario Copper Lightning Rod Co. v. Hewitt, 30 U. C. C. P. 172;

—a statement in a letter concerning a lawyer, that he will milk the purse of a prospective client and fill his own large pockets. King v. Lake, 2 Vent. 28; Anonymous, 3 Salk. 328;

—a newspaper article reciting that one who had an exclusive contract to secure musical artists based his engagements on sheer favoritism, and specifying one case, as an example of many, where the artist's contract read for $1,000 a night, but who was said to have received $500. Astruc v. Star Co.;

—an article published of a railway general passenger agent, that he had grown rich by making his local ticket agents or some of them divide their commission with him. Shattuc v. McArthur, 25 Fed. 133, reaffirmed in 29 Fed. 136;

—a published article concerning a lawyer and chairman of a county political committee, although not a candidate for office, charging him, as an impudent impostor, with writing an article for pay out of a corruption fund, and with following his profession solely for the purpose of making money, stating that his opinions were molded by the extent of his client's means to pay. Barr v. Moore, 87 Pa. 385, 30 Am. Rep. 367;

—the published statement that there could be no doubt of the fact that there which was engaged in the business of giving operatic performances in this country. By this contract the Metropolitan Opera Company conferred upon him for a period of five years "the exclusive representation of its artistic and administrative interests in France, in Belgium, and in the principality of Monaco." During that period he was by the contract "solely charged to negotiate the engagements of artists, singers, female singers, dancers, etc." He was given no authority to sign final contracts with them, without special authority, but no final contracts were to be signed (within his territory) with any such persons whose names he did not himself propose. By this arrangement the company restricted itself to contracting with those persons only who had been approved and were recommended by the plaintiff. The contract recites that it was entered into "by reason of the services rendered by Mr. Gabriel Astruc since the year 1904 to the Metropolitan Opera Company."

The plaintiff by the contract "engages himself not to charge, upon the amount of the salaries of artists (and others) engaged or which may be engaged through his means, a commission exceeding 5 per cent." On March 21, 1909, defendant published in its newspaper an article which it is not necessary to set forth in full. It stated that Astruc had an absolute monopoly of the engagement of French artists for the Metropolitan Opera House; that nobody could be en-was something "wrong in Denmark," and that the commissioners of a graveling district charged their neighbors and fellow property owners a sum three times as much as that alleged to have been paid by said commissioners. Murray v. Galbraith, 86 Ark. 50, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1078, 109 S. W. 1011.

Likewise, a published article charging a cigar company with being a trust and pushing a price of its product up and forcing the public to pay it, not only accuses such company with violation of Federal and state statutes, but also charges that peculiar misconduct that naturally and directly brings down upon the offender's business the disapprobation of the public, and necessarily entails injurious consequences, and is therefore actionable per se. Sternberg Mfg. Co. v. Miller, DuB. & P. Mfg. Co. 95 C. C. A. 494, 170 Fed. 298, 18 Ann. Cas. 69.

And a published article charging one with having a direct pecuniary interest in the erection and heating of a school building in a district of which he is a school director, which, under the statute, is a misdemeanor, and reciting that he lets the contracts for the building and supplies materials therefor at the highest prices, accepting or rejecting the work at pleasure, thus compelling the contractor to submit to high prices for inferior wares, or invite trouble in having his work accepted, and charging him with getting a rake off, is libelous. Woolley v. Plaindealer Pub. Co. 47 Or. 619, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 498, 84 Pac. 473.

An article published of a widow of a suicide, that she sent the son to school, although the son was allowed a good salary by the company that had employed her husband, and that she had pocketed a large part of the son's wages, thus leading the husband into financial irregularities and bringing him into difficulties with his employers, and that these exactions of the wife were said to be prime factors in bringing about the self-destruction of her husband, is libelous. Bradley v. Cramer, 59 Wis. 309, 48 Am. Rep. 511, 18 N. W. 268. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where, upon the presentation of claims against an estate, an heir to the estate, in the presence of the commissioners, counsel, and others, states that a claim presented by a physician is false, and adds, "This isn't the first time he has made up an account, either. He made up one against me of between forty and fifty dollars for which he hadn't made a visit, and I paid it and I can prove it," such a charge is wholly disconnected with the claim presented, and with the interest of the one making it, and therefore, not being privileged, is actionable slander, because injurious to the physician in his profession. Clemmons v. Danforth, 67 Vt. 617, 48 Am. St. Rep. 836, 32 Atl. 626.

But stating that a superintendent or foreman, in hiring men for his employer, charged them a commission or fee on their wages, is not slander, for such an act is not a criminal offense, and in the absence of allegation to the contrary, it may be interpreted as innocent. Russell v. Barron, 111 App. Div. 382, 97 N. Y. Supp. 1061.

Neither does it import anything criminal or disgraceful to charge that a man has received money from a city treasury, or that his services as an expert witness were not worth what he was paid, and, therefore, to publish such a charge is not libelous. Rositer v. New York Press Co. 141 App. Div. 339, 126 N. Y. Supp. 325.

And a publication charging that an architect asked and received a commission for giving a contract for certain work upon a building to a certain party is not libelous per se, for, even if true, it does not impeach his skill, knowledge, or fitness for his profession, or his professional conduct, nor tend to expose him to public contempt, hatred, or ridicule, and in the absence of averment of extrinsic facts from which the libel results, the action must fail. Legg v. Dunleavy, 80 Mo. 558, 50 Am. Rep. 512.

To say of a carpenter: "He has charged Mr. A. for forty days' work, and received the money for the work that might have been done in ten days, and he is a rogue for his pains," is not actionable. Lancaster v. French, 2 Strange, 797. H. C. Sh.

gaged unless he acted as intermediary; that he was an autocrat, and held up opera house contracts and boycotted the best singers; that he boasted of his power, saying that he had a "little garden," and that every artist wishing to enter the Metropolitan Opera House must pass through his gate. The article commented unfavorably on such a method of doing business. Although this was expressed in a manner derogatory to the plaintiff, it was not libelous. "Boycotting" is made a crime in New York (N. Y. Penal Law, § 580 [Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 40]), but it is quite apparent that in the article the word "boycott" was used not as referring to the offense covered by that section, but as a mere synonym of "holding up,"—not submitting for engagement the names of any artists whom he did not approve.

The article, however, contained the following sentences: "What makes the situation more demoralizing in effect is the indication that the engagement of artists is based on sheer favoritism and a financial arrangement touching commissions. The case of the tenor Rousseliere, whose contract read for a thousand dollars a night, and who is said to have received five hundred, is an example. There are numerous other cases of the kind, but most of the artists are afraid of talking about them for fear of Astruc, whose sway is considered absolute."

About the meaning of this language there can be no possible doubt or uncertainty. It asserts positively and unambiguously that in the case of the tenor Rousseliere, and in numerous other cases, the plaintiff, having been intrusted by his principal with the power to accept or reject candidates for operatic engagements, used his power to extort from the applicants 50 per cent of their entire salaries before he would make a favorable report upon such application. It might well be that such a charge would lead those who read it to believe that plaintiff was a contemptible person; and certainly it tended to injure him in his business or occupation. Other persons wishing to secure an experienced person as their negotiator with foreign artists would certainly not select a man who had, when similarly employed by someone else, abused his position by such acts of extortion. That words are actionable if they directly tend to the prejudice or injury of a person in his profession or business is well settled by authority. 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 942; 25 Cyc. 326.

We cannot agree with defendant's contention that the quoted statements are ambiguous, that they "do not say whether the 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

plaintiff got the half salary from Rousseliere as a condition of getting him a contract, or whether he received it from the opera company for negotiating a contract esteemed by the opera company to be a very valuable one." On the contrary, we think that an intelligent person reading the whole article together would reach no other conclusion than that plaintiff procured an engagement for the tenor upon the basis of a financial arrangement touching plaintiff's commissions, whereby the singer had to yield up one half of his nightly payments.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury that the passage quoted was libelous per se, and in leaving it to the jury to say whether the article charged plaintiff with dishonest or improper conduct in his mode and manner of engaging and dealing with singers or others for the opera company. By the reservation of various exceptions, plaintiff is in position to present this assignment of error.

Inasmuch as there will be a new trial, we may call attention to another assignment of error. As to malice, damages, etc., the jury was correctly instructed. In the course of the charge, however, the court said: "I will call your attention to the fact right here, lest I forget it, that Astruc has not appeared as a witness, has not given any testimony to contradict the evidence that has been given here on the other side, and there is no reason given for his nonappearance. Now, where a witness who can appear, who is interested and who is a party and who could appear, when he fails to appear and give evidence as to the material facts, and contradict evidence that stands against him, that is a circumstance that may be considered by the jury, which may raise an inference in their minds and satisfy them that his evidence on that point, even if given, would not be favorable to him upon the issues framed in the case by the pleadings or by the evidence."

To this plaintiff reserved an exception. At the close of the proofs one of the defendant's attorneys took the stand, and was allowed to testify as to what steps he had taken towards obtaining the testimony of the plaintiff, who remained continuously abroad. This was objected to and exception reserved. It turned out that the testimony was not obtained because the Federal courts do not allow examination of the plaintiff before the trial, under the New York Code practice; and defendant did not undertake to secure the testimony on commission to examine absent witnesses, because he did not wish to make plaintiff defendant's witness. This testimony had no relevancy to any issues before the court and should have been excluded. We are satisfied that such testimony, coupled with the quotation from the charge supra, must have operated to plaintiff's prejudice with the jury. We think it was error thus to charge, in view of the situation of the case.

Plaintiff resided abroad, and there was no reason why he should attend to testify at the trial unless it was to be expected that his evidence might be important or material. In support of his own prima facie case, it is conceded that he need not appear, but defendant contends that the answer contained charges which he was called upon to refute. But this is not so. These "charges" deal merely with the non-libelous parts of the article,—the agency of plaintiff, the large powers conferred on him by his principal, his exercise of those powers so that only such artists as he approved could get engagements, his statement that on the salaries of those whom he did secure he received a commission, his boastful reference to his authority when referring to his "little garden." There was nothing in this which he need cross the seas to contradict. It was a substantially accurate statement of his contract with the opera house company, and the necessary results of such a contract, which made him an "autocrat" in the matter of negotiating engagements. Touching the only libelous passage in the article, the extortion of 50 per cent commissions from Rousseliere and others, the only "justification" pleaded in the answer is that every artist engaged by plaintiff was required to "pay to the plaintiff a large commission." If Astruc had never exacted from anyone a commission in excess of what the opera house contract provided for, he could safely remain absent from the trial, relying on the belief that no one competent to testify would commit perjury by swearing that he did so. There was nothing in the pleadings which called so imperatively for his presence at the trial as to warrant the instruction given to the jury. Nor was there anything in the testimony which called for it. No one testified to the exaction of a 50 per cent commission from Rousseliere or from anyone else. The defendant called the treasurer of the opera house and proved that Rousseliere was engaged at a salary of 5,000 francs a night,—120,000 francs in all,—from which there was deducted a commission to Astruc of 2½ per cent, $508.40 in all. Had plaintiff been present at the trial, there was nothing in defendant's case which it was necessary for him to rebut.

For these reasons, the judgment of the court should be reversed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN M. COOK, Appt.,

v.

IRENE J. COOK.

(— N. C. —, 74 S. E. 639.)

Pleadings — action pending — defense on merits.

1. A defendant cannot be required to withdraw an answer on the merits in order to plead a former suit pending.

Divorce — two actions pending.

2. The pendency of an action for absolute divorce in one county does not preclude defendant from instituting an action in the county of her residence, being another county in the same state, for a divorce from bed and board, where she has sought no affirmative relief in the former suit.

(Clark, Ch. J., and Walker, J., dissent.)

Note. — Pendency of suit for divorce or separation as bar to another suit in the same state.

For cases on the effect of the pendency of suit for divorce or separation in another state, see the note to Benton's Succession, 59 L.R.A. 187.

"It is a general principle of the law that the pendency of a prior suit for the same thing, or, as is commonly said, for the same cause of action, between the same parties, in a court of competent jurisdiction, will abate a later suit. . . . The rule, however, is not one of unbending rigor or universal application, nor is it a principle of absolute law. It is rather a rule of justice and equity generally applicable, and always so where the two suits are virtually alike and in the same jurisdiction." 1 Cyc. 21, 22.

It will be seen that it was held in Cook v. Cook, that, pending an action by the husband for divorce a vinculo on account of the separation of the parties for ten years, the wife might properly begin and carry through an action for divorce from bed and board on account of abandonment, although she had answered in the first suit alleging the abandonment by the husband, but did not demand therein any affirmative relief.

It has been held that an action by the husband for annulment on account of duress in entering into the marriage is not for the same cause as an action for divorce by the wife (Simpson v. Simpson, —

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County in plaintiff's favor in an action for a divorce. Affirmed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

The present action was instituted August 26, 1911, and summons therein was personally served on defendant September 1, 1911. Plaintiff filed her complaint to September term, 1911, for divorce from bed and board on account of abandonment "unlawfully and without just cause," the complaint being accompanied by the formal affidavit required by the statute. Defendant thereupon answered denying the alleged abandonment, and answered, further, in bar of plaintiff's right to maintain her action, that the defendant had theretofore commenced an action for divorce a vinculo for cause specified in subsection 5, Revisal, 1908, § 1561; that is, because the parties had lived separate and apart for ten successive years, had resided in the state for that period, and there were no children born of the marriage, etc. It appeared that defendant's action, returnable to superior court of Alamance county, had been commenced September 24, 1910. Summons personally served on plaintiff October 1, 1910, complaint filed November term, 1910, and defendant therein—that is, the present plaintiff—had appeared in that suit, and made formal denial of complaint, and, as a part of such denial, had averred a wrongful abandonment by her husband in Au-

Cal. —, 41 Pac. 804), where the action claimed to be pending was in another state; but the court did not refer to that feature.

In Cordier v. Cordier, 26 How. Pr. 187, it was held that, pending an action for divorce on account of the adultery of the defendant with a certain person, the plaintiff may begin another action for divorce on account of adulteries with the same person committed after the beginning of the first action, instead of setting up such later matters by supplemental complaint.

In DeHaley v. Haley, 74 Cal. 489, 5 Am. St. Rep. 460, 16 Pac. 248, where the court said that it was doubtful whether cross complaints in actions for divorce were provided for by the Code, it appeared that there were two actions for divorce, one brought by the wife and the other by the husband, and that, while these were both pending, the wife brought an additional action for divorce, alleging cruelty in making statements against her character in the husband's pleadings in the divorce suits. The court said: "The action is for divorce. The complaint avers the defendant was guilty of extreme cruelty, in that, in another action brought by her against him, he filed an affidavit containing statements of want of chastity on her part prior to their marriage; and in that, in an action brought by him against her, he filed a complaint charging that prior to the marriage of these parties, she was pregnant by another man. The complaint herein avers that the statements of defendant in the affidavit and complaint referred to were wholly false and malicious. . . . While the action brought by the wife for a divorce was pending, and the proceeding in such action, in which the affidavit of the husband was filed, was undetermined, could the wife bring the present action, charging, as an act of extreme cruelty, the making by her husband of the statements contained in the affidavit? While the action for divorce brought by the husband (defendant herein) against his wife (plaintiff herein) was still pending and undetermined, could the latter commence the present action, and rely, as ground for divorce, upon statements contained in the complaint of the husband showing fraud by the present plaintiff in the contracting of the marriage?" And it was held that it was error to overrule a demurrer to the complaint.

It has been held that the pendency of an action for separation is not a bar to an action for absolute divorce. Hall v. Hall, 135 N. Y. Supp. 741, where the court said: "This is an action for an absolute divorce. The defense demurred to for insufficiency is the pendency of another action between the same parties for separation on the ground of abandonment and nonsupport. It is not even alleged that the action for separation was pending when this action was brought. But even if it were, it would not constitute a bar. The two actions are brought on different grounds for different relief. Even a judgment in the separation action would not bar an action for absolute divorce. The learned justice at special term denied the motion on the authority of Conrad v. Conrad, 124 App. Div. 780, 109 N. Y. Supp. 387, in which it was held that it was not proper to unite in the same complaint a cause of action for absolute divorce and one for separation on the ground of abandonment,—a proposition entirely different from the one involved on this motion."

In Stevens v. Stevens, 1 Met. 279, a husband brought an action for a divorce a mensa et thoro on the ground of desertion. Pending this action a statute was passed permitting divorces for this cause a vinculo, after which the husband brought another action praying for a divorce a vinculo, to which the wife pleaded the pendency of the first action. Shaw, Ch. J., said: "Here is a formal plea in abatement to a libel for divorce a vinculo for desertion, filed during the pendency of a former libel for a divorce a mensa for the same cause. Whether a formal plea in abatement is proper or not, when the proceeding is by libel, we have not stopped to consider. It is a rule of justice, applicable to all legal proceedings, that no one shall be twice vexed for the same cause. The question then is whether it is for the same cause.

gust, 1900, and prayed judgment that plaintiff's suit be denied him. This answer was verified in ordinary form of answers in civil actions, but not in the form required in actions for divorce. When the present case was called for trial in Wake superior court, it was admitted by plaintiff that the action by defendant in Alamance was still pending, and, before the jury was impaneled, defendant moved to "abate the action and dismiss the same" by reason of the pending of the Alamance case, and the court held that on the facts the pendency of the action in Alamance county was not necessarily a bar to this, and that the answer to the merits destroyed the plea in abatement, and offered defendant opportunity to withdraw his plea in bar and file a plea in abatement, which was declined, and defendant excepted. The jury was then impaneled, and the following verdict was rendered:

"(1) Were the plaintiff and the defendant married on March 22, 1900?" Answer: "Yes."

"(2) Did the defendant abandon the plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint?" Answer: "Yes."

"(3) Has the plaintiff been a resident of the state of North Carolina for two years next preceding the filing of the complaint?" Answer: "Yes."

"(4) Is the defendant a resident of the state of North Carolina?" Answer: "Yes."

"(5) Was the plaintiff a resident of Wake

By a statute which took effect after the filing of the first libel, and before the second, a party might obtain a divorce from the bond of matrimony for desertion; whereas, as the law stood before, he could only obtain a divorce a mensa for that cause. Here then was a new, distinct, substantive right, not before existing. This was the right sought to be obtained by the second libel, and could not be obtained by the first. Had the first been amended so as to alter the prayer for judgment, still it would appear that, at the time of filing the libel, to which the judgment must refer, no such right existed. The reason why a second suit cannot be commenced for the same cause, pending a former, is that it is unnecessary, inasmuch as the party prosecuting may have the same remedy under the first as he could obtain by prosecuting another. In applying this test, it is apparent, that he could not obtain a decree for the same right under the first, which he seeks in this; that is, a divorce a vinculo. The facts are the same, and the parties are the same, but the right and the object of the prosecution are wholly distinct. The court are therefore of opinion that the plea cannot prevail."

It has been held that while a bill for divorce and alimony is pending, the court will not entertain a suit for separate maintenance. Dunnock v. Dunnock, 3 Md. Ch. 140, where the wife brought an action alleging that the husband, to defraud her of reasonable maintenance, made a fraudulent sale of certain negroes, and asking that their sale be set aside, the negroes placed in the hands of a receiver, and that she might, from the product of their labor, have a reasonable allowance for her maintenance and support, or that they be divided and she have a third thereof, while she and her husband were living apart. The court, in deciding against the plaintiff, said: "There is, moreover, another objection to the relief prayed by this bill, and to the interposition of this court in behalf of the complaint, for the purpose for which she has invoked its aid, and which is presented by the answer, and which appears to be insuperable. The answer alleges that prior to the filing of the bill in this court, the complainant filed her bill on the equity side of Dorchester county court, praying to be divorced from her husband, and for alimony, which bill is still depending in that court, and that, consequently, this court has no jurisdiction in the premises, and a copy of the bill so filed in Dorchester county court, duly authenticated, is filed as an exhibit with the answer. It thus appears that before the present bill was filed, a court of competent jurisdiction had possession of this subject of alimony. It is true Samuel Dunnock, the grantee in the bill of sale, was not a party to the bill filed in Dorchester county court, but he might, by an amended or supplemental bill, have been made a party, and the question now raised between him and the complainant have been litigated in that court. The question of the right of the complainant to alimony was distinctly presented by her bill in the county court, and constitutes a part of the relief specifically prayed for, and it is undoubtedly competent to that court to say whether she is entitled to that relief or not."

An action for divorce is not for the same cause as one to declare written evidence of the marriage forged and fraudulent. Sharon v. Hill, 10 Sawy. 394, 22 Fed. 28. Sharon's action in the United States circuit court was to have a certain instrument in writing, purporting to be a declaration of his marriage to the defendant, delivered up as forged and fraudulent, and to enjoin the defendant from using it. While this suit was pending, the defendant therein brought a suit in the state court for divorce against Sharon, based on the instrument in question and cohabitation, on the ground of adultery and desertion, and the woman pleaded in abatement to Sharon's suit in the United States court the pendency of her suit in the state court, and it was held not only that the plea was bad because the suits were pending in two jurisdictions, but also that the causes of action in the two suits were not identical. The court said: "It is true, the same principal county, North Carolina, at the time this action was commenced?" Answer: "Yes."

Judgment on the verdict, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

Messrs. Parker & Parker, Long & Long, Dameron & Long, and Holding & Snow for appellant.

Mr. R. N. Simms, for appellee:

The pendency of a former action between the same parties, wherein the defendant is the same person as the plaintiff in the later action, and the plaintiff in the former is the defendant in the later, does not constitute a defense to the later action.

Walsworth v. Johnson, 41 Cal. 61; Barr v. Chapman, 5 Ohio C. C. 69, 3 Ohio C. D. 36; Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. v. H. B.

issue will arise in both cases, but the bills of complaint in the respective suits call and pray for entirely different and inconsistent relief. They are therefore not the same cause of suit; nor is the relief sought in the two suits by the same party. . . . The whole effect sought in the second suit could not be had in the first, nor by the same party. A cross bill, at least, would be necessary, which would, in effect, be another suit. The suit in the state court for divorce and a division of the community property rests, for cause of suit, upon an alleged valid and subsisting contract. . . . The cause of suit in this court is a forgery in making, and fraud in setting up, a contract alleged to have never been entered into. It is sought to have the pretended contract decreed to be void ab initio, as a forgery and a fraud. An alleged valid and subsisting contract is therefore the basis and cause of one suit; and forgery and fraud, the basis and cause upon which the other rests. These, certainly, do not constitute the same causes of suit. The causes of suit are clearly not identical. It is also bad on another ground: That the suit set up is not pending in a court of the same jurisdiction. Id. It is well settled by the Supreme Court of the United States that a suit pending in another jurisdiction for the same cause cannot be pleaded in abatement of a suit in the United States courts, and that the courts of the states and of the United States are courts of different jurisdictions. Stanton v. Embrey, 93 U. S. 548, 550, 23 L. ed. 983; Gordon v. Gilfoil, 99 U. S. 169, 178, 25 L. ed. 383, 386. Here there are two jurisdictions,—jurisdictions of two distinct governments. One is state jurisdiction, and the other is the jurisdiction of a national court. If it were a fact that a suit is pending for the same cause in the state court,—a court of a different sovereign jurisdiction,—it would not abate the suit here." It is interesting to note in this connection the distinction made in the same case in 26 Fed. 337, between identity of issues to support the plea of another action pending and the finding of a judgment which will be res judicata. It then 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. H. E. Norris also for appellee.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under our present procedure, a defendant is allowed to demur when it appears on the face of the complaint that there is another action pending between the same parties for the same cause (Revisal, 1905, § 474, subsec. 3), and where this does appeared that, while the United States court case was still pending, the suit in the state court had been decided in favor of the woman, but that an appeal was then pending to the state supreme court, and the circuit court of the United States, while holding that the state suit was still pending so long as the appeal was undecided, and that therefore the judgment therein was not res judicata upon the matters in the circuit court, nevertheless said: "This suit and the action of Sharon v. Sharon are not brought on the same claim or demand. The subject-matter and the relief sought are not identical. This suit is brought to cancel and annul an alleged false and forged writing, and enjoin the use of it by the defendant to the prejudice and injury of the plaintiff, while the other is brought to establish the validity of said writing as a declaration of marriage, as well as the marriage itself, and also to procure a dissolution thereof, and for a division of the common property, and for alimony. But the validity and genuineness of this declaration of marriage were directly involved in the action of Sharon v. Sharon, and determined in favor of the same by the finding and judgment therein. The plaintiff is therefore estopped to show the contrary in this suit, unless the effect of that judgment, as an estoppel in this case, has been obviated by the appeal therefrom to the supreme court, and the pending motion for a new trial."

In some cases it is indicated that the court has considerable discretion. In Flanagan v. Flanagan, 28 N. Y. Week Dig. 88, 13 N. Y. S. R. 432, a husband brought an action against his wife for absolute divorce, and under a substituted order of service the summons was served upon her on the 10th day of May, but the papers were not filed to make the service complete until the following day. On the 10th of May, and after the service of such summons, a summons was served upon the husband in a suit brought by the wife against him for divorce. In the husband's suit the wife answered setting up adultery on his part, to which he replied. He did not answer the not appear from the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer (Revisal, § 477), and it has been held with us that an objection of this character may be joined with plea in bar or an answer on the merits. Blackwell v. Dibrell Bros. 103 N. C. 270, 9 S. E. 192, citing on this position Pomeroy's Remedies, § 721. The judge below, therefore, had no right to require defendant to withdraw his answer on the merits as a condition for having his plea in abatement considered and passed upon.

We hold, however, that the verdict and judgment should not be disturbed on this account, being of opinion that the pendency of defendant's suit in Alamance county, in which the husband is seeking to obtain a divorce a vinculo, is not necessarily a good plea against the present prosecution of plaintiff's suit for divorce from bed and board. As a general rule, this right to plead the pendency of another action between the same parties before judgment had is regarded to a large extent as a rule of convenience, resting on the principle embodied in the maxim, Nemo debet bis vexari, etc. The defect is one that can be waived, and it may also be cured by dismissing the prior action at any time before the hearing (1 Cyc. 25; Grubbs v. Ferguson, 136 N. C. 60, 48 S. E. 551), and the plea presenting it is usually confined to suits in which the same litigant is plaintiff, or is at least an actor seeking the same relief (Long v. Lackawanna Coal & I. Co. 233 Mo. 714, 136 S. W. 673; Rod- wife's suit or appear in it, but an order of reference having been made to take the proof in the wife's suit, the court, on the husband's application, stayed the wife's suit until the determination of the husband's, holding that all the facts alleged by one party against the other were embraced in the issues in the husband's suit, and could be properly tried and disposed of therein.

In Osborne v. Osborne, 10 Jur. N. S. 80, a husband brought an action for dissolution of marriage on account of his wife's adultery. She, in her answer, charged him with adultery, cruelty, and desertion, and prayed a judicial separation, and his answer contained the same charges against the wife as in his petition. These matters, it seems, under the English practice, constituted a cross suit. Upon applications for commissions to be taken in each suit, the court said: "In this case the motion was for two commissions in two suits, the one a suit by the husband against the wife, and the other a suit in retaliation by the wife against the husband. The wife's suit was not commenced until several months after that of the husband. I made an order in chambers, which incidentally came under discussion when the motion for commission was made, the purport of which was that the wife's suit should be stayed until that of the husband has been decided. It is a great hardship that a fresh suit should be necessary to enable a wife to obtain a decree. I shall adhere to the order I have made, that the wife's suit be stayed until that of the husband has been determined; because the husband's suit, if it is one way, may put an end to the wife's suit. The case of Hepworth v. Hepworth, 31 L. J. Prob. N. S. 18, 2 Swabey & T. 414, 5 L. T. N. S. 565, 10 Week. Rep. 195, shows to what an extravagant degree the principle might be pressed, of allowing two suits to proceed together. Whenever two suits are instituted in the court, in which the same questions are raised, I shall stay one of them."

and the husband sued the wife for a divorce a vinculo on the ground of adultery, and moved to stay the wife's proceedings in the first suit until the cause for adultery was at an end; his charges were fully denied by the wife's affidavit, and by the affidavit of one of the alleged persons with whom she was charged to have misconducted herself. The vice chancellor said: "Under the circumstances, I cannot interfere to arrest the prosecution of the wife's suit. The husband is bound to show a preponderance in his favor upon the merits in the respective suits, in order to entitle him to the order he asks for; and this he has not yet done. I must deny the husband's motion, with costs."

It may be noted that in Bancroft v. Bancroft, 3 Swabey & T. 597, 34 L. J. Prob. N. S. 31, where a husband sued for a dissolution of the marriage on account of adultery, the wife brought a cross suit for separation on account of cruelty, to which he answered charging the same adulteries as in his petition. In the wife's suit, the jury found cruelty of the husband and the innocence of the wife, she being a witness as to her innocence, and it was held that this verdict was not admissible in the husband's suit.

In Cupples v. Cupples, 33 Colo. 449, 80 Pac. 1039, the court said: "A suit was brought by Mrs. Cupples against her husband in the district court of Rio Grande county, praying for separate maintenance and the custody of the children. The defendant in the suit filed his answer and cross complaint, praying for a divorce and for the custody of the children. Upon motion, the cross complaint was stricken, and thirty days was allowed the defendant in which to answer or to take such action as he might deem advisable. Within the thirty days, the defendant in the suit mentioned brought his action in the county court of Rio Grande county, praying for a divorce. Within the time prescribed by the statute for answering, the defendant filed her answer and cross complaint, in which she denied the allegations of the complaint, set up the pendency of the ac-

C.] 22 Fed. 711; Walsworth v. Johnson, 41 Cal. 61; New England Screw Co. v. Bliven, 3 Blatchf. 240, Fed. Cas. No. 10,156). In the case before us, the present plaintiff is not the plaintiff in the action pending in Alamance county, nor is she an actor in that suit seeking affirmative relief. She asks for no judgment there, and has not filed the affidavit required by our law in divorce proceedings, and which we have often held is jurisdictional in its nature. Johnson v. Johnson, 142 N. C. 462, 55 S. E. 341; Hopkins v. Hopkins, 132 N. C. 22, 43 S. E. 508. In divorce proceedings a defendant sued is allowed with us to ask for and obtain a divorce on his own account, but he can only do so by cross action or petition, accompanied by this jurisdictional affidavit, and coming within the definition of the general term "counterclaim," as it is understood and used in the Code. Smith v. French, 141 N. C. 1, 53 S. E. 435, citing Green on Code Pleadings and Practice, § 815. It is well recognized here that a party sued is not required as a rule to set up a counterclaim existent in his favor, but is allowed to assert the same in a different or a subsequent action. Shakespeare v. Caldwell Land & Lumber Co. 144 N. C. p. 521, 57 S. E. 213; Mauney v. Hamilton, 132 N. C. 303, 43 S. E. 903; Blackwell Durham Tobacco Co. v. McElwee, 94 N. C. 425.

It is urged that, while this rule may hold in ordinary actions, it should not obtain in divorce proceedings, because the status of the parties is then necessarily involved. It would seem, however, to be especially insistent in such proceedings where a party may not desire to presently seek affirmative relief in the hope that a different course would more likely lead to a reconciliation, and assuredly we think the reluctance or failure to take such course from such a motive should not be held to defeat or prejudice the right of a defendant to bring his cause before the court at another time. This plea, upon which defendant now relies to defeat plaintiff's recovery, is referred to in 1 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 750, as available when there is a former suit pending in the same jurisdiction between the same parties for the same cause of action and for the same relief. Not only is present plaintiff not an actor in the suit in Alamance county, but the relief sought by her is not the same as that involved in the other issue, nor is it dependent altogether on the same state of facts. And authority seems to favor the position that the pendency of an action seeking one kind of divorce does not necessarily forbid the maintenance of a suit to secure a divorce of a different kind. Simpson v. Simpson (1895) — Cal. —, 41 Pac. 804; Stevens v. Stevens, 1 Met. 279; Monroy v. Monroy, 1 Edw. Ch. 382; Thornton v. Thornton (1886) L. R. 11 Prob. Div. p. 176, 55 L. J. Prob. N. S. 40, 54 L. T. N. S. 774, 34 Week. Rep. 509, 2 Bishop, Marr. & Div. § 565; 1 Cyc. 31; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 840. In this last citation the author says: "It is not a bar to a suit for separation that another suit is pending for an absolute divorce, and the courts will under some circumstances refuse to stay the former proceeding until the latter is determined." Pursuing this statement, if it should be made to appear that a prior suit was pending between the same parties, which embraced the same issue and involved to a large extent the same state of facts, a court would and tion in the district court. . . . The court held that there were not two actions pending, and permitted the defendant in the former suit to maintain his action for divorce. . . . No error was committed by the court in his ruling concerning the pendency of another action. The record shows that the cross complaint was stricken, and the defendant given thirty days in which to elect what action he would take. The filing of the complaint in this case must be regarded as an election; and, having filed the complaint in this case, the cross complaint, having been stricken, was of no force or effect. The court proceeded upon the theory that, under our statute concerning divorce and alimony, unless the defendant should file a cross complaint and pray for a divorce, the court could not hear testimony concerning acts which would entitle the defendant to a divorce. The statute is as follows: 'In all actions for divorce, the defendant may file a cross complaint, in which may be set forth any legal grounds for divorce against the plaintiff; and if, upon trial thereof, both parties shall be found guilty of injuries or offenses which would entitle the opposite party to decree of divorce, then no divorce shall be granted to either party. And in all cases where a cross complaint for a divorce shall be filed, the party filing the same shall be entitled to all the rights granted to a plaintiff by this act, and subjected to all the requirements of a plaintiff.' 3 Mills's Anno. Stat. § 1566a."

should, if right and justice would be thereby best promoted, stay the proceedings until the results of the former suit could be attained, but, as we have endeavored to show, there is nothing in this case that requires such a course as a matter of law, and nothing appears of record to justify it as a matter of discretion.

After a full and fair trial, in which defendant, having answered, was present in court, the plaintiff has established that she was abandoned by defendant wrongfully and without just cause, and we find nothing in the law or the facts of the case to justify the court in depriving the plaintiff of her verdict and the rights which flow from it under the law.

The judgment in plaintiff's favor is therefore affirmed.

Clark, Ch. J., dissenting:

The defendant brought an action against his wife, the plaintiff herein, for an absolute divorce, in Alamance county, which was the place of his residence, in September, 1910. The present plaintiff, the defendant in that action, appeared and filed an answer. Subsequently she instituted this action in Wake, in August, 1911. The defendant herein moved to abate this action by reason of the pendency of his prior action which had been brought in Alamance. This motion should have been granted. In Smith v. Morehead, 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 360, the court held that the domicile of the husband was the domicile of the wife, and that proceedings in divorce instituted by the wife against the husband must be brought in the county where the husband resided. But, independently of that, an action for divorce is sui generis, and is to determine the status of the parties. Hence there can be nothing in the nature of a counterclaim. In Bidwell v. Bidwell, 139 N. C. 409, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 324, 111 Am. St. Rep. 797, 52 S. E. 57, Hoke, J., says: "Actions for divorce deal with the status of the parties," and held that, there having been a decree of divorce between the parties, a subsequent action would be barred, though it might set up matters which would have affected the former decree, if pleaded in time.

In the present case, even if this action had been properly brought by the wife in Wake, the judgment decreeing her a divorce from bed and board was a determination that such was the legal status of the parties at the date of that judgment. Hence, in the further prosecution of plain-tiff's suit in Alamance, which he had a right to bring in that county, and which he did bring therein nearly a year prior to the institution of the present suit by his wife in Wake, he will be estopped by the judgment in this case from further prosecuting his action. He can only bring a new action, and only as to causes arising subsequent to the date of the judgment in this. He is estopped by the judgment in this case. As the husband instituted his action in Alamance prior to the beginning of this action, he had a right to prosecute it to judgment, and the action in this case in Wake should have been dismissed, for the wife could have had her full remedy by a defense to the action in Alamance, which was already pending for the purpose of determining the status of the parties.

In Haley v. Haley, 74 Cal. 489, 5 Am. St. Rep. 460, 16 Pac. 248, the point is expressly decided, the court holding that while an action for a divorce is pending, one of the parties thereto cannot maintain a subsequent action for divorce against the other, but that all matters affecting the status of the parties should be determined in the action first brought, and not by a new action setting up matters in recrimination or defense. In 2 Nelson, Separation and Divorce, § 745, it is said: "The term 'counterclaim' is not applicable to a cause for divorce, which is neither a tort or a breach of contract, but is cause of action unlike all other causes." The husband having brought his prior action in Alamance, the wife should have tried out her grounds of defense or her claim for relief in that action. The test of a counterclaim is that its decision is not necessarily involved in the pending action, and the claimant can bring his counteraction on it even after judgment. If the plaintiff in the Alamance case, which was first brought, had obtained judgment of absolute divorce, the defendant in that case could not have brought her action for divorce from bed and board. Bidwell v. Bidwell, supra. It follows that she could not bring such suit pending the Alamance action. Her demand is not a counterclaim, but a recrimination, and would be barred by a decision granting the demand in the plaintiff's action against her, for it is a matter necessarily involved in the decree in the action against her, which would determine her status. Tyler v. Capeheart, 125 N. C. 64, 34 S. E. 108.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS
v.
HENRY MEYER, Appt.

Contempt — punishment — wrongful arrest.

1. In a proceeding brought under § 4388, Gen. Stat. 1909, to punish a defendant for the violation of an injunction previously granted, wherein he appeared in the district court and defended against the accusation filed against him, the power of Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Note.— Power to amend commitment or sentence by increasing punishment.

The rule adopted with practical unanimity by the courts is that a court may alter its sentence by increasing the punishment during the same term, before any part of the sentence has been put into effect, but that it has no such power either after the term at which the sentence was rendered or after any part of the sentence has been carried out. State v. Dougherty, 70 Iowa, 439, 30 N. W. 685; State v. Hughes, 35 Kan. 626, 57 Am. Rep. 195, 12 Pac. 28; Com. v. Weymouth, 2 Allen, 144, 79 Am. Dec. 776; Com. ex rel. Nuber v. Keeper of Workhouse, 6 Pa. Super. Ct. 420; Brown v. Rice, 57 Me. 55, 2 Am. Rep. 11; People v. Sullivan, 54 Misc. 489, 106 N. Y. Supp. 143; State v. Cannon, 11 Or. 312, 2 Pac. 191.

In Rex v. Price, 6 East, 323, 2 Smith, 525, the sentence imposed was vacated and a greater one imposed on the last day of the term.

And in Reg. v. Fitzgerald, 1 Salk. 401, the punishment was increased during the same term, because defendant behaved himself impudently in court and justified his offense.

In Meaders v. State, 96 Ga. 299, 22 S. E. 527, it was held that, while a court may amend its sentence at any time before the end of the term and before execution has begun, it had no right to increase the sentence merely because counsel for accused gave notice of an intention to move for a new trial.

But in Nichols v. United States, 46 C. C. A. 405, 106 Fed. 672, it was held that a court which had sentenced a prisoner had power to call him again to the bar before any part of the sentence had been executed, and increase the punishment, and it would not be presumed that the reason the court increased the sentence was because defendant had declared his intention to appeal.

And in Com. v. Brown, 12 Phila. 600, the court says that the court has power during the term to reconsider a sentence and impose a greater one, but that such a power should be exercised with great caution. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the court to try the defendant, and to adjudge punishment for a contempt, is not affected by the fact that he was arrested under an unwarranted order issued by the probate court; nor was it material, under the circumstances, whether a preliminary order of arrest was issued or an arrest in fact made.

Same — violation of injunction — sufficiency of proof.

2. In a case where defendant was enjoined from keeping intoxicating liquors in a certain place for sale, and from selling them at that place, proof that large quantities of intoxicating liquors were subsequently purchased by defendant, some of which were kept at the place, and that he sold a pint of whisky to a purchaser, is sufficient to uphold a judgment finding defendant guilty of contempt.

When a court is under a misapprehension in passing sentence, it may, during the same term and before any part of the sentence has been executed, set it aside and impose a greater sentence; and in the absence of a showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that there are sufficient reasons for the action of the court. Lee v. State, 32 Ohio St. 113, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 376.

But although the judgment rendered is erroneous, the court has no power at a subsequent term to revise it and substitute an entirely new judgment, the original judgment having been partly complied with. Ex parte Cornwall, 223 Mo. 272, 135 Am. St. Rep. 507, 122 S. W. 666.

And a defendant who has been found guilty generally upon an indictment containing several counts for distinct offenses, and been sentenced on some of the counts and imprisoned, cannot, at a subsequent term, be brought up and sentenced anew upon another count in the same indictment. Com. v. Foster, 122 Mass. 317, 23 Am. Rep. 326, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 499.

In Bollinger v. Com. 16 Ky. L. Rep. 395, it is held that where judgment for a fine in accordance with the verdict against one convicted of maintaining a nuisance has been rendered, the court may, on a subsequent day during the same term, order an abatement of the nuisance, this being considered merely an addition to the judgment.

In Whitney v. State, 6 Lea, 247, where a court entered a judgment that the defendant should pay a fine of $10 and costs, but suspended judgment until the next term of court, it was held that the court could not, at the next term, change the sentence to embrace an alternative jail term, upon defendant appearing and informing the court that he was unable to procure the fine and costs.

And in Pifer v. Com. 14 Gratt. 710, it was held that a judgment upon conviction, of a fine and costs, was final, and the court could not at a later term alter the sentence by imposing a term of imprisonment.

And in Ex parte Friday, 43 Fed. 916, 8 Am. Crim. Rep. 351, the court says it is Same — amended sentence — validity.

3. The court found the defendant guilty of contempt and entered judgment that he be committed to the jail of the county for three months and pay a fine of $100. After he had been imprisoned under this judgment for twelve hours, he was recalled, and the court attempted to render a second or modified judgment sentencing the defendant to six months' imprisonment and the payment of a fine of $100. Held, that as the first sentence was one the court had authority to impose, and that as the defendant had suffered punishment under it, there was then no authority in the court to change and increase the punishment; and further held, that the first judgment is valid and still enforceable.

unquestioned that a valid sentence made at one term cannot be set aside and a different and more severe sentence pronounced at a subsequent term.

The larger group of cases supporting the general rule stated at the beginning of this note is to the effect that the sentence of a prisoner cannot be increased after execution of it has been commenced.

Thus, it was held in Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. ed. 872, where a court imposed a sentence of fine and imprisonment, when it had authority to impose only a fine or imprisonment, that it had no power, though at the same term, after the fine had been paid, to set aside the judgment and resentence the prisoner to a prison term.

In People ex rel. Manyx v. Whitson, 74 Ill. 20, where a court sentenced a defendant to ten days' imprisonment upon forty counts, and, because of the form of the sentence, it was held that it ran simultaneously on all the counts, the court could not, after defendant had served the ten days, amend its sentence to ten days for each count separately.

In State v. Warren, 92 N. C. 825, it is held that a court cannot, after commitment of defendant, remit the remainder of the sentence and place him on probation, and later resentence him for the term originally fixed.

In Grisham v. State, 19 Tex. App. 504, where defendant pleaded guilty to a charge of aggravated assault, and was fined and ordered to be committed until the fine was paid, it was held that the court had no power, during the same term but after commitment, to set aside the judgment and award a new trial without defendant's consent, at which he was convicted of assault with the intent to kill, and sentenced to a term of two years in the penitentiary.

In Com. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 41 Pa. Super. Co. 29, where a railroad convicted of maintaining a nuisance was sentenced to build a crossing in a particular way, and performed the sentence as specified, it was held that the court could not afterward amend the sentence by making additional

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Trego County convicting him of contempt of court. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James T. Burney for appellant.

Messrs. John S. Dawson, Attorney General, S. N. Hawkes, S. M. Brewster, and J. P. Coleman for the State.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decision of the district court of Trego county finding the appellant guilty of contempt of court. A judgment was rendered against the appellant on November 8, 1907, perpetually enjoining and restraining him from keeping requirements, upon it being shown that the crossing was inadequate and improper.

And where a fine has been imposed and the prisoner taken to prison, the sentence is then in execution and the court has no power to recall him and impose a larger fine. Re Habeas Corpus, 5 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 571, 7 Ohio N. P. 604.

In People v. Meservey, 76 Mich. 223, 42 N. W. 1133, and People v. Kelley, 79 Mich. 320, 44 N. W. 615, it is held that a judge cannot vacate a sentence of imprisonment in the state prison after the prisoner has been remanded to jail to await its execution, and increase the term imposed, because the prisoner attempted to escape from jail.

But in Bradford v. People, 22 Colo. 157, 43 Pac. 1013, it is held that a sentence to the penitentiary commences to run upon actual confinement therein, so that the court could change the sentence three days after it was pronounced, though defendant during that time was confined in the county jail to prevent his escape.

When a prisoner has been sentenced to a reform institution as being under a certain age, and execution of the sentence has been commenced, the court has no jurisdiction to vacate its judgment and resentence the prisoner to the penitentiary upon it appearing that he was over the age at which he could be sentenced to the reform institution. Re Jones, 35 Neb. 499, 53 N. W. 468; Re Mason, 8 Mich. 70.

In State v. Addy, 43 N. J. L. 113, 39 Am. Rep. 547, which was a conviction for nuisance by obstructing a culvert, where the court ordered that sentence be suspended on payment of costs "so long as defendant shall keep the culvert complained of clear and unobstructed, and shall do whatever else may be necessary to abate the nuisance," and defendant did pay the costs and abate the nuisance under direction of the sheriff, and was discharged, it was held that this did substantially amount to a rendition of and compliance with a judgment on conviction, and the declaration that sentence was suspended was contrary-or maintaining a liquor nuisance upon certain premises, and "from ever again engaging in the keeping or selling or in any way maintaining" such nuisance, or from "ever keeping at said place or on said premises any intoxicating liquors for sale." An accusation was filed in the district court of Trego county charging defendant with having violated the terms of the injunction. The charge appears to have been presented to the probate court of Trego county, and on August 15th the judge of that court ordered the arrest of the defendant, and that he should be held subject to the further order of that court. The clerk of the district court issued a writ of attachment, and the appellant was accordingly arrested. Later, he came into the district court with his counsel, and a trial was had upon the accusation filed in that court, which resulted in a finding that he was guilty of violating the order of injunction and of contempt of the court. At first the court announced and entered a judgment that he be committed to the jail of the county for three months and pay a fine of $100, together with the costs of the proceeding. In pursuance of this judgment he was imprisoned for about twelve hours, and, on a late hour of the same day, he was brought back into court by its order and another judgment was rendered, sentencing him to imprisonment in the county jail for a period of six months, instead of three months, as first adjudged.

On this appeal it is contended that the district court had no jurisdiction to try appellant, because he was arrested on an order of the probate court. Why the application for an order of arrest was made to the probate court is not explained, and it is certain that that court had no authority to order the arrest or to make any order in the proceeding. The act of the probate court in making the invalid order, and the unwarranted arrest of appellant under it, did not deprive the district court, in which the accusation was filed, of jurisdiction to determine whether appellant had violated the terms of the injunction previously granted. While an arrest of one charged with being guilty of contempt of court is provided for, it is not an essential step in the proceeding. It is important that the accusation shall, on its face, show facts sufficient to constitute a contempt; that the accused shall have reasonable notice of the proceeding, and a hearing in which he has an opportunity to make any explanation or defense that he may have. Here there was an accusation which fully stated the facts constituting the contempt; there was notice of the hearing, and an opportunity for appellant to defend, of which he availed himself. Besides, there was no challenge of the authority of the district court to try the case. No complaint was there made that appellant was not properly brought into that court, nor did he make any objections there as to the initiatory steps in the proceedings. After submitting to a trial without objection to any of the preliminary steps in the case, it is a little late to complain that he was not brought into court in the ordinary way. Neither an improper arrest nor the absence of any arrest would be ground for overthrowing a judgment rendered upon due noto the fact, and reserved no power in the court afterward to order that defendant be confined in the county jail on the ground that he did not keep the culvert clear.

State v. Addy is, however, distinguished in State v. Crook, 115 N. C. 760, 29 L.R.A. 260, 20 S. E. 513, in which it was held that, where judgment was suspended on condition that defendant pay costs, neither the payment of part of the costs nor confinement for failure to pay the balance constituted performance of part of the suspended sentence, and defendant might thereafter be sentenced to imprisonment.

However, in Smithey v. State, 93 Miss. 257, 46 So. 410, it was held that a justice of the peace who imposed a fine only, when the law required both fine and imprisonment, might and should issue an alias capias for defendant, and impose a proper sentence, although the fine and costs had been paid.

In Ex parte Sizelove, 158 Cal. 493, 111 Pac. 527, it was held that under a probation statute giving the court power to revoke or modify its order, the court had power to extend the probationary period before its expiration.

And Jobe v. State, 28 Ga. 235, sustains the right of a court to increase its oral sentence before its entry on the minutes of the court, from a fine and thirty days' imprisonment to the same fine and six months' imprisonment, after an escape of defendant, especially where the defendant had solicited the court to reconsider its sentence with a view to its modification.

As to the power of an appellate court to increase the commitment sentence of a prisoner, it was held in Gipson v. State, 58 Tex. Crim. Rep. 403, 126 S. W. 267, where a jury assessed defendant's punishment at a fine and imprisonment, but the judgment of the court embraced only a fine and costs, that it could be reformed by the appellate court on motion of the state to conform to the verdict.

But in Killman v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 512, 112 S. W. 90, where it appeared that defendant was convicted in two cases in the county court, but that in entering the judgment the clerk failed to make the punishment assessed cumulative, it was held that the appellate court could not, on motion of the state, amend the judgment in this respect.

tice and after a hearing wherein full opportunity was given the accused to explain and defend.

The contention that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the judgment is not good. Appellant was enjoined from keeping intoxicating liquors on the premises for sale and from selling such liquors there. There was testimony that two barrels of whisky were consigned to appellant, which were received by him at the railway station. Testimony was introduced that liquors were kept at the hotel, although appellant claimed that they were kept there for his own use. It was shown that a guest at the hotel purchased a pint of whisky from appellant for which 75 cents was paid. There was conflicting testimony offered by appellant; but the trial court accepted as true that which was produced by the state, and it is sufficient to sustain the judgment. When appellant kept liquor for sale in the hotel and made a single sale of it in that place, he violated the injunction and was guilty of contempt.

The remaining question raised on the appeal is the validity of the action of the court in modifying the judgment. The modification was made during the term in which the original judgment was entered and on the same day. The reasons which led the judge to change and increase the period of imprisonment are not shown. The statute provides that "any person violating the terms of any injunction granted in proceedings shall be punished for contempt by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment in the county jail not less than thirty days nor more than six months, in the discretion of the court or judge thereof." Gen. Stat. 1909, § 4388.

It is competent for the court to modify a judgment in either a civil or a criminal case, during the term at which the judgment was rendered. State v. Hughes, 35 Kan. 626, 57 Am. Rep. 195, 12 Pac. 28; State ex rel. Minard v. Sowders, 42 Kan. 312, 22 Pac. 425; Re Beck, 63 Kan. 57, 64 Pac. 971; Johnson v. Jones, 58 Kan. 745, 51 Pac. 224; Chapman v. Western Irrig. Co. 75 Kan. 765, 90 Pac. 284.

In State v. Hughes, supra, it was decided that "the district court may, until the term ends, revise, correct, or increase a sentence which it has imposed upon a prisoner, where the original sentence has not been executed or put into operation." Syl. ¶ 4. Here the judgment first rendered had been executed in part before the attempted modification was made. Appellant had been imprisoned under the judgment, and had undergone twelve hours of the punishment imposed by the court, before the judgment was changed and the term of imprisonment doubled. Was it competent for the court to change the judgment and increase the penalty at that time? The trend of the authorities is that the power of the court to revise judgments of conviction extends to the end of the term if execution of the judgment has not been begun, but that the power is exhausted when the judgment is executed or is in process of execution.

In Brown v. Rice, 57 Me. 55, 57, 2 Am. Rep. 11, the defendant was found guilty and sentenced to serve six months in the jail. Nineteen days after he was imprisoned under the judgment, he was brought from the jail, and the court undertook to revoke the judgment and to sentence him to the state's prison for a term of three years. The last and longer sentence was within the limit fixed by law for offenses of which he was convicted. It was held that the court could not, at that time, revise and increase the sentence, and that the first sentence was legal and binding, notwithstanding the attempt of the court to revoke it. After citing certain cases which authorized amendments during the term so long as the judgments remained unexecuted, the court remarked: "These cases certainly are as strong for the respondent as any that can be found, and recognize the right of the court to go so far, at least, as we can find either reason or authority for going. But they stop at the point of execution, and clearly express or imply that after execution or warrant issued and executed, this power of summarily changing the record or judgment or sentence is at an end."

In Michigan a defendant was convicted of burglary and sentenced to imprisonment for five years. On the next day the court learned that he had made an unsuccessful attempt to escape from the prison to which he was committed. He was brought back into the court and resented to a term of ten years. It was held that the sentence having gone into effect, and that one day of the imprisonment under the sentence having been served, the court was without authority to make the change. The second sentence was set aside and the original one enforced. People v. Meservey, 76 Mich. 223, 42 N. W. 1133.

In People ex rel. Manyx v. Whitson, 74 Ill. 20, it was held that "where a defendant in a criminal case has suffered punishment according to a legal sentence, a second judgment in the same case, even if rendered at the same term of court, is void." Syl. ¶ 3.

In State v. Cannon, 11 Or. 312, 314, 2 Pac. 191, 192, it was held that "where a sentence has been passed upon a defendant, and the judgment has gone into effect by commitment of the defendant under it, the court has done all that it had the legal power to do under the proceedings in that case."

Other cases of similar import are: Re Jones, 35 Neb. 499, 53 N. W. 468; State v. Warren, 92 N. C. 825; Com. v. Weymouth, 2 Allen, 144, 79 Am. Dec. 776; Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. ed. 872; Lee v. State, 32 Ohio St. 113, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 376; State v. Dougherty, 70 Iowa, 439, 30 N. W. 685; Elsner v. Shrigley, 80 Iowa, 30, 45 N. W. 393; People v. Kelley, 79 Mich. 320, 44 N. W. 615. See also 12 Cyc. 783.

The decision of this case does not require that we extend the rule as far as is done in some of the cited cases. We need not determine the effect of a modification which remitted a part of the penalty or shortened the term of imprisonment at the instance of the defendant, nor where the first judgment was outside of the statute, or not within the power of the court to impose. In this case the court had the authority and discretion to impose the penalty first adjudged. The judgment was in process of execution, and the defendant had undergone a part of the punishment before the attempted change of the judgment. After punishment had been inflicted under that judgment, the court was powerless to recall the defendant and to resentence him to a longer term.

The second judgment, which is a nullity, is set aside. The first judgment was not affected by the subsequent action of the court, and it is affirmed and will be enforced.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Belmont County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in tripping and falling over a wire in the street. Affirmed.

Statement by Donahue, J.:

Josiah P. Ward brought a civil action against the village of Barnesville in the common pleas court of Belmont county, praying damages in the sum of $10,000 for personal injuries sustained by him in tripping and falling over a wire placed between the paved sidewalk and the curb on the east side of Arch street, south of Walnut street, in said village. In his petition he averred that this wire was supported upon posts or stakes about 2 feet high and 18 inches apart at each end, and about 30 feet from end to end; that the wire was stretched around these stakes and was permitted to eled portion of highway is discussed in the note to Blankenship v. King County, post, 182. The following notes may also be consulted with profit: Liability of municipality for injuries by trees. Dyer v. Danbury, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 405; Duty toward children as to obstructions or defects in street. Townley v. Huntington, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 118.

On the ground that a pedestrian had no right to cross a grass plot, and that the sag in the middle so that it was about 8 inches high at the place where he was injured; that this obstruction had been continued there for many weeks prior to December 10, 1908; that the same was dangerous and likely to injure pedestrians lawfully going upon said street, all of which the defendant village well knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known; that plaintiff had no notice or knowledge of such dangerous condition; and that in the night season of December 10, 1908, while he was carefully walking on said street, he was tripped by said wires, and violently thrown upon the curb and pavement, sustaining severe injuries, for which he asks damages.

The village for its answer admits it is a wire was strung around such a place for the very purpose of keeping people off from it, it was held in McCurdy v. Newark, 10 Ohio N. P. N. S. 526, that a municipality was not responsible to a pedestrian for injuries sustained while attempting to cross the space between sidewalk and curb, by falling over a wire stretched a few inches from the ground to protect the grass. This case, however, is overruled by BARNESVILLE v. WARD.

So, on the theory that when a city has rightfully set apart and improved a part of a street for a boulevard, it is not bound to use due care to keep such part free from all obvious obstructions which are necessarily incidental to its use as a boulevard, although they may endanger the safety of travelers thereon, where one, while attempting to cross the street diagonally at the corner of two streets, was thrown to the ground by a supporting wire stretched along the boulevard from a tree to a stake in the ground, whereby she was injured, the question of the city's negligence and that of the injured person was held rightfully submitted to the jury. McDonald v. St. Paul, 82 Minn. 308, 83 Am. St. Rep. 428, 84 N. W. 1022. In the above case the court said that if the accident had occurred on the boulevard between the block lines, instead of at the street corner, the case would not be so clearly one for the jury. And in a separate opinion Mr. Justice Collins observed that if this accident had occurred anywhere upon the boulevard except at the corner, there could have been no recovery.

So, in Dougherty v. Horseheads, 159 N. Y. 154, 53 N. E. 799, a city is held not liable for injury caused by a cutter colliding with a snow-covered stone used to protect a grass plot and a tree at a private driveway.

But, on the principle that the space between the sidewalk and curb is a portion of the street or sidewalk which a municipality is bound to keep in a reasonably safe condition for pedestrians and other travelers, a city was held liable for personal injuries caused by falling over a stone curb used as stepping-stone, placed within curb municipal corporation, admits that Arch street is a public street of said village frequently traveled and used as such by the public generally, and improved by paved sidewalks, curbing, and street paving, and denies every other allegation of the petition. For a second defense it denies plaintiff was injured in the manner alleged in the petition, and avers that if he was injured in any manner or form whatever, that his own negligence and want of care contributed to that injury. The defendant for a third defense avers that that portion of the street around which this wire was stretched was a grass plat between the paved sidewalk and the curb of the street; that the defendant village adopted, established, permitted, and maintained a plan and system of leavon the banquettes by paving contractors (McCormack v. Robin, 126 La. 594, 139 Am. St. Rep. 549, 52 So. 779); by falling over water box (Aston v. Newton, 134 Mass. 507, 45 Am. Rep. 347); by fall of one of pile of beer kegs negligently stacked at intersection of two streets by hotel keeper (Havre de Grace v. Fletcher, 112 Md. 562, 77 Atl. 114); by stepping upon grade stake left in curb long after its necessary use and purpose had been accomplished (Jones v. Deering, 94 Me. 165, 47 Atl. 140); by buggy striking post at intersection of two roads (Phelps v. Mankato, 23 Minn. 276); by falling over pile of stones placed between sidewalk and curb, such an obstacle being not one that a traveler would expect to encounter (Fockler v. Kansas City, 94 Mo. App. 464, 68 S. W. 363); by stepping upon a metal covering of a water meter negligently constructed by city, while looking for a lost article (Riley v. Kansas City, 161 Mo. App. 290, 143 S. W. 541); by defect in space between sidewalk and curb (Coffey v. Carthage, 200 Mo. 616, 98 S. W. 562); by stepping upon the cover of a catch-basin in the curbing, but extending into the sidewalk space (Colton v. Kansas City, 162 Mo. App. 429, 145 S. W. 494); by falling into an excavation in the margin of an alley (Niblett v. Nashville, 12 Heisk. 684, 27 Am. Rep. 755); by tripping over a water pipe projecting 4 inches above the surface between the flagstone and curb, which had existed in that condition for nine months (Archer v. Mt. Vernon, 57 App. Div. 32, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1040); by falling into trench dug in such space by lot owner (Townley v. Huntington, 68 W. Va. 574, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 118, 70 S. E. 368).

So, where a boy ran across the street against a wire about 4 feet from the ground, stretched along the outer edge of the sidewalk between two telegraph poles, and intended to serve no public purpose, whereby he was injured, the city was held liable. Augusta v. Tharpe, 113 Ga. 152, 38 S. E. 389. It seems, however, in the above case, that the sidewalk extended right up to the curb.

But, although towns and cities are bound ing a strip of ground between the outside of the paved portion of the sidewalks and the inside of the curb of said paved street, on which to maintain grass plats and shade trees, in order to beautify, ornament, and add to the cleanliness and healthfulness of said streets, and, in accordance with said plan and system, trees were permitted to be placed and grow upon said strip of ground, and grass was sown thereon, or the same was sodded; that passageways were made over and across said strip of ground leading from the paved part of the sidewalk to the curb, over which pedestrians could pass when wishing to cross to the opposite side of the street; and that said strip to exercise ordinary care to keep the part of the street between the carriage way and sidewalk in such a state of repair that pedestrians may cross any part thereof with a reasonable degree of safety, where a person attempted to cross the street and was injured by stumbling over the iron grating covering a drain near the sidewalk, it was held in Raymond v. Lowell, 6 Cush. 526, 53 Am. Dec. 57, that his negligence in crossing at this particular spot, when he could have crossed any other part of the street in that vicinity in safety, precluded recovery.

Generally, such things as stepping-stones, hitching posts, hydrants, and telegraph posts properly placed between the sidewalk and curb, are regarded not as unlawful obstructions, but, by immemorial custom and usage, as being necessary to the health, convenience, protection, and enjoyment of the inhabitants of the city.

So, whether a marble stepping-stone between the sidewalk and traveled part of the highway is such a nuisance within the limits of the highway, as to render its owner liable to a person injured by collision therewith, is a question of fact determinable by its character, location, and effect. Nutter v. Pearl, 71 N. H. 247, 51 Atl. 897.

Hitching posts or stepping blocks in public streets as unlawful obstructions or nuisances is the subject of a note to Lacey v. Oskaloosa, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 853.

So, where one driving along the street was injured by his buggy striking against a post 2 feet in height, surrounded by weeds and placed at the corner of two streets to prevent wagons running against shade trees, it was held a question of fact for the jury whether the city was guilty of negligence in maintaining the post, and it could not be affirmed that, as matter of law, the city was guilty of negligence in permitting such an obstruction. Wellington v. Gregson, 31 Kan. 99, 47 Am. Rep. 482, 1 Pac. 253.

And where a pedestrian was injured by stepping into a hitching post hole in the grass plot between the sidewalk and curb, the lot owner was held liable in Harrison v. New York Bay Cemetery, 77 N. J. L. 514, 73 Atl. 546, under the rule that if an abutting owner, for his own convenience, places an object in the public highway, his failure to use reasonable care that the highway be not thereby rendered unsafe makes him liable in damages to users of the highway, for injuries resulting from such neglect.

But where a person fell into a pit some distance from the sidewalk toward the road, which was left open and unguarded by a town, and which he knew existed, the town 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was held not liable, on the ground that his negligence contributed to the injury. Walker v. Reidsville, 96 N. C. 382, 2 S. E. 74. In the above case the court observed, however, that if the injured party, though not entirely free from fault, could not, by ordinary care and prudence, have avoided the danger, he might recover damages.

And where a telegraph company placed a telegraph post between the sidewalk and the traveled part of the way, a place prescribed by selectmen of the town under statute, the town, in Young v. Yarmouth, 9 Gray, 386, was held not liable to a traveler for damages occasioned by being thrown from his carriage against such post.

So, where a traveler whose horse became frightened and unmanageable was injured by colliding with an iron hydrant erected by the city in the curb, about 8 inches in diameter and 2½ feet high, with a nozzle about 6 inches from the top projecting over the gutter about 4 inches, it was held in Ring v. Cohoes, 77 N. Y. 83, 23 Am. Rep. 574, that the liability of the city rested not upon the hydrant, which was properly located, but upon an obstruction in the street caused by a heap of ashes.

But where a hydrant stands in the curbing so that a projecting nut strikes the wheel of a carriage passing close to the curb, it is, in St. Germain v. Fall River, 177 Mass. 550, 59 N. E. 447, held a defect for which the city is liable, where a person was injured thereby; and the fact that he knew of the hydrant will not preclude recovery.

So, where a horse shied, and the driver's leg was broken by coming in contact with a hydrant, the city was, in Burnes v. St. Joseph, 91 Mo. App. 489, held liable; and the fact that the driver knew of such obstacle was of no consequence when it was so dark that he could not see it.

Where lumber was piled between the sidewalk and traveled portion of a road, extending to but not projecting over the road, the city was held not liable in McArthur v. Saginaw, 58 Mich. 357, 55 Am. Rep. 687, 25 N. W. 313, where a horse ran the buggy against the pile, throwing out and killing the occupant. In the above case the court held that the statute for collection of damages sustained by reason of defective highways or streets was confined to such defects as arose from want of repair, but did not apply to objects or material, such as a lumber pile, forming no part of the streets, and not affecting their condition as ways properly kept in repair.

of ground, by reason of the grass and shade trees thereon growing, indicated to pedestrians that it was not to be used as a part of the sidewalk, and was not intended to be traveled or crossed by pedestrians. It is also averred that the plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, before, and at the time of his injury, that such strip of ground was not to be used for the purpose for which he attempted to use it; that there was no occasion or necessity for his attempting to so use it; and in doing so he assumed all risk and hazard of danger. Defendant denies that it was charged with any duty or obligation to keep that portion of the strip of ground occupied by trees and grass plats, and located between the regular passageways leading from the portion of the sidewalk to the curb of the street, open for travel, in repair, and free from obstructions. For a fourth defense defendant avers that the plaintiff attempted to pass from the paved portion of the sidewalk over and across said strip of ground and grass plat or lawn, to the curb of the street, without necessity, and for his own pleasure and convenience departed from said paved portion of the sidewalk, passageway, and street crossings, upon which he would have avoided injury.

The plaintiff replied denying the averments of the second, third, and fourth defense.

Upon the issue so joined, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. A motion for new trial was overruled and judgment rendered upon the verdict, which judgment was affirmed by the circuit court. The plaintiff in error now seeks the reversal of the judgment of the common pleas court and the reversal of the judgment of the circuit court affirming the same.

Messrs. Smith & Howard and J. C. Tallman, for plaintiff in error:

Donahue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by the record in this case is in some respects a novel one in Ohio. There seems to be neither a statute nor adjudicated case dispositive of some of the propositions urged by the plaintiff in error in its defense to plaintiff's suit.

It is undoubtedly the common practice in this state, and it would seem to be practically the universal interpretation of the law, that, where a street is sufficiently wide that enough will remain unobstructed to meet the needs of public travel, a municipality may maintain, or permit to be maintained, park strips between the curbing and the paved street and the pavement of the sidewalk, in which strip grass, flowers, and trees may be grown, for the purpose of beautifying and ornamenting the streets of the city and contributing to the pleasure and comfort of its citizens, and may, if it be deemed necessary, construct, or permit to be constructed, proper barriers around the same to prevent travel thereon, and such trees, grass, and flowers growing upon such park strip, and the proper barriers placed around the same to protect them, are not obstructions or nuisances within the meaning of the statute requiring the city council to keep the streets of a municipality in repair, open for travel, and free from nuisances.

This construction of the law would not authorize a municipality to maintain, or permit to be maintained, a fence, wire, or other barrier around such park strip in such condition as to become dangerous to the life or the safety of any traveler who undertakes to pass over the same, and, if a pedestrian in the exercise of due care for his own safety is injured by reason of the dangerous or defective condition of the barrier, the municipality is liable in damages for such injury, if it be shown that it knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, the dangerous condition thereof. The plaintiff in error contends that the trial court erred in refusing to give its first and second special requests. These requests were predicated upon the assumption that, no matter if the wires placed around this strip of ground were so placed as to be dangerous, the plaintiff, in going upon this strip, was negligent, and assumed all the risk of injury by reason thereof; and the court very properly refused to give the same.

That the plaintiff attempted to cross this park strip at a point other than where the passageways were provided was not negligence per se. Whether he was negligent in so doing under all the circumstances of the case was a proper question for the jury. It is claimed on behalf of this plaintiff that, in passing along the pavement, he saw directly ahead of him a quantity of ice that had accumulated there, and that, in order to avoid this ice, he attempted to cross to the other side of the street at a place where no passageway across this park strip had been provided for that purpose, but that he had no knowledge whatever of the existence of this wire at this point, and that the strip was so narrow, being only about 18 inches wide, that it could be easily covered by one step of a pedestrian, and therefore not likely to need such protection, and the pedestrian would not naturally expect to find such obstruction there; that two stakes were driven at each end of the strip 18 inches apart and 30 feet from end to end; that a small wire had been placed around the top of these stakes, and had been permitted to sag in the middle, so that at the point plaintiff attempted to cross it was not more than 10 or 12 inches high; that the place was not lighted by any street lamp, and the night was so dark that a pedestrian in the exercise of due care for his own safety could not see this wire or protect himself from injury therefrom, and that therefore this wire, so placed and permitted to remain, was a dangerous nuisance and likely to produce just such an injury to a pedestrian exercising due care for his own safety as the plaintiff sustained. There is evidence in this record in support of these facts, upon which plaintiff rests his right to recover in this action.

The fact that a municipality may maintain, or permit to be maintained, a barrier around such strips to prevent pedestrians from going thereon, does not authorize the maintenance of such a dangerous construction as would be a menace to the life or safety of a pedestrian exercising due care for his own safety, in an attempt to cross over the same.

If the jury found from the evidence that this wire was in the condition described by some of the witnesses, then it could rightly find that it was not a barrier to prevent, but rather a device to trip and punish, anyone who would attempt to cross this strip in the night season. That a pedestrian has not sufficient civic pride to refrain from going upon or passing over this strip does not justify the placing of a nuisance there that might probably cause his death or do him great bodily harm if he should attempt to do so, and the pedestrian could not be held to have assumed the risk of injury from such a device, if it be shown that he had no knowledge of its existence, and could not in the exercise of due care for his own safety see the same, or be required to anticipate its presence. True, if he had collided with a tree, or with a proper barrier placed there to prevent him from going upon the strip, or with a stepping-stone, or other obstruction that might reasonably be expected to be found there, then the contention of the plaintiff in error that he assumed the risk of injury from such obstruction would obtain. In the absence of knowledge of the fact, he could not be required to contemplate the existence of this wire placed so near the ground that it would not prevent his going upon the strip, but rather would more likely result in his injury, than in the accomplishment of the purposes for which it is now claimed it was so placed, and while it might be a proper and sufficient guard in the daytime, or even in the night season if properly lighted, yet it was a question for the jury to determine whether, under the circumstances of this case, it was a legitimate barrier, one that he ought to have expected to meet, and therefore assumed the risk of injury therefrom, or whether it was a dangerous and unlawful nuisance, the existence of which he would not be required to have in contemplation at the time he attempted to cross the same.

It is also claimed on behalf of the plaintiff in error that the court erred in the rejection of the testimony of S. S. Foreman. The defendant sought to show by this witness the plan of the improvement of the streets of this village with reference to the maintenance of park strips between the curbing of the paved street and the paved portion of the sidewalks, and it was permitted to show this plan as fully as the nature of this defense required. The objections to the questions appearing on pages 255, 256, and 257 of the record were properly sustained for the reason then stated by the court that they were leading questions.

From the whole record it appears that the issue was properly submitted to the jury and that its verdict is sustained by evidence.

The judgment of the Circuit Court affirming the judgment of the Common Pleas Court is affirmed.

ARIZONA SUPREME COURT.

E. K. SNEED

v.

J. S. SNEED, Plff. in Err.

(— Ariz. —, 123 Pac. 312.)

Divorce — bona fide residence — acquisition by woman.

A woman cannot, by leaving her husband and removing to another state because there had been a few quarrels between them over property, without violence or mental distress which would destroy her health, acquire "an actual bona fide residence" there, within the meaning of the statutes of the state conferring jurisdiction in divorce cases.

ERROR to the District Court for Cochise County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action for divorce. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pickett & Pickett and Morrow & Morrow for plaintiff in error.

Note. — The right of the wife to acquire separate domicile for the purposes of a divorce suit by her is considered in the notes in 59 L.R.A. 146, and 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 297. Mr. O. Gibson, for defendant in error:

The wife may acquire a separate domicile whenever it is necessary or proper that she should do so, and proceedings for a divorce may be instituted at that place where the wife has her domicile.

Ross, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for divorce based on the ground of desertion and failure to provide. The plaintiff and defendant were intermarried in the state of Georgia in 1868. They subsequently moved to Colorado, Texas, where they lived together for thirty-one years and until December 9, 1909. There were born to them three boys and three girls. The girls are dead, but the boys are living, two of them in Arizona and one in Texas. Prior to December 9th, one of the boys, who was in business in Cochise county, Arizona, wrote to an invalid brother, then in Colorado, Texas, asking him to come to Arizona and assist him in his business, and the invalid brother left Colorado, Texas, on December 9, 1909, for Arizona. His mother, the plaintiff, came with him. She and her invalid son arrived in Cochise county, Arizona, December 11, 1909. The invalid son needed the care and attention of his mother, and, as she testified, she came to Arizona to "keep house for him." Later in her testimony, in answer to a question as to her intention in coming to Arizona, she said:

has in fact acquired a separate domicile. Generally, as to the character of residence essential to give jurisdiction in divorce proceedings. see notes to Bechtel v. Bechtel, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1100, and Wipans v. Winans, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 992.

"I came with the intention of remaining, of making some portion of Arizona my home; but I did not know what portion."

The plaintiff and defendant owned a home in Colorado, Texas, of six or seven rooms, comfortably furnished, and with all necessary outhouses and fences, and were occupying it together with one of their sons and his wife on December 9, 1909, and had occupied it for some time prior thereto. The plaintiff left their home for Arizona without any complaint against her husband or declaration of intention to reside permanently in Arizona; but, on the contrary, her husband accompanied her to the depot, and their parting was one of good feeling, at least to all outward appearances. From that time on, a desultory correspondence was carried on between them, largely concerning their property rights; but no mention was made by plaintiff of her intention to abandon the defendant or to permanently locate in Arizona, until December, 1910, or shortly before that date, when she wrote to defendant of her suit for divorce. The defendant resided at their home in Texas during this time. Under date of August 24, 1910, he wrote the plaintiff asking her to come home and bring their invalid son, suggesting that plaintiff and their son could be much more pleasantly and comfortably situated in Colorado than in Tombstone.

The evidence shows that the defendant, conformable to his station in life, supplied the ordinary comforts and necessary food and clothing for his home and its inmates during all the years up to December 9, 1909, and the plaintiff stated that the defendant "took care of her reasonably well." The defendant is a man of good habits. The plaintiff said her husband was abusive in his language to her a couple of times, and in these family quarrels she "would give it back to him," but not as "heavy as he did." For about one year prior to plaintiff's coming to Arizona the plaintiff and defendant, although living under the same roof and in their residence, by mutual consent, had not cohabited as husband and wife.

The lower court, among other things, found the facts to be: "(2) The court finds that plaintiff came to Arizona December 11, 1909, with the bona fide intention of making Arizona her permanent home. That pursuant to such intention she actually took up her residence on that date in Cochise county, Arizona, and ever since said date to the hearing of this suit, she has continuously so resided in Cochise county and made her home with her invalid son, and kept house for him, and is now residing in this county. That for more than one year prior to plaintiff's coming to Arizona, plaintiff and defendant had not cohabited as husband and wife, but were living separate and apart, although they occupied the same residence. They had frequent quarrels and difficulties over money and property matters. . . .

(3) The court finds that the allegations in plaintiff's complaint of abandonment of plaintiff by the defendant have not been sustained by evidence." Then follows the judgment of the court dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the plaintiff and defendant.

While many errors are assigned by the plaintiff in error, but one will be considered by us. It is: "The court erred in entertaining jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, because the plaintiff was not a bona fide resident of Arizona at the time this suit was filed, but, having without just cause deserted her husband, whose domicile was in Texas, her domicile was in the state of Texas."

Paragraph 3114 of the Revised Statutes of Arizona, 1901, provides: "No suit for divorce from the bonds of matrimony shall be maintained in the courts unless the plaintiff shall, at the time of filing his or her complaint, have been in actual bona fide resident of the territory for one year, and shall have resided in the county where the suit is filed six months, next preceding the filing of the suit." The question as to whether the plaintiff had acquired, at the time of filing her suit, the requisite and sufficient residence under our laws to entitle her to maintain her action, is squarely before us for our decision. Ordinarily an appellate court will not disturb, but will adopt, the findings of the trial court, where there is a conflict in the evidence. The rule is otherwise where there is a substantial failure of the evidence to support the findings. Miller v. Miller, 7 Ariz. 316, 64 Pac. 415.

In this case there is no material dispute as to the facts in evidence bearing upon the question of the residence of plaintiff, and it is the legal effect of those facts and circumstances that we are to ascertain. The expression "actual bona fide" resident, as used in paragraph 3114, supra, is very much the same language as that used in the statutes of other states concerning divorce, and we are therefore not without a construction of the expression by the highest courts of such states. In Hamill v. Talbott, 81 Mo. App. 215, the court said: "The statutory terms 'resident or residence,' as used in divorce statutes, contemplate, as we think, an actual residence with substantially the same attributes as are intended when the term 'domicil' is used. They do not mean the place where the defendant in fact resides for the time being. They mean a residence of a permanent and fixed character,—a domicil,"—citing Bishop, on Marr. & Div. § 109; Pate v. Pate, 6 Mo. App. 49, and a number of cases from other states.

In Hendricks v. Hendricks, 72 Ala. 132, 133, the court said: "The statute, in express terms, prohibits the filing [of] a bill for divorce upon the ground of voluntary abandonment, unless it is alleged and proved that, for three years next before the filing of the bill, the complainant has been bona fide a resident of this state. Code of 1876, § 2691. The obvious purpose of the statute is the prohibition of divorces by the jurisdiction having authority to decree them, to those who, it is possible, may have transiently and temporarily transferred their residence to this state, or who, after the abandonment has occurred, may have transferred their actual domicil from this to another state,—the prevention of frauds upon the law by a temporary residence raised for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the court."

In Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 46 Iowa, 437-443, the court said: The statute "providing for six months' residence in the state in order to give jurisdiction in divorce proceedings means 'a legal residence, not an actual residing alone, but such a residence as that when a man leaves it temporarily, or on business, he has an intention of returning to, and which, when he has returned, becomes and is de facto and de jure his domicil, his residence. There must be a fixed habitation, with no intention of removing therefrom.'"

The same rule of construction has been adopted by the supreme courts of Massachusetts and Oklahoma. Hanson v. Hanson, 111 Mass. 158; Beach v. Beach, 4 Okla. 359, 46 Pac. 514.

We conclude that "an actual bona fide resident" means a person who is in Arizona to reside permanently, and who, at least for the time being, entertains no idea of having or seeking a permanent home elsewhere.

The general rule may be stated to be that "the law fixes the domicil of the wife by that of the husband, and denies to her during cohabitation the power of acquiring a domicil of her own, separate and apart from him." The later and better "cases, however, have broken away from the rule where the wife has been abandoned, or forced by brutal treatment [or, we add, for any cause sufficient in law as grounds for divorce] to leave the husband, when she is permitted to establish a domicil for herself." 14 Cyc. 846-848.

It remains for us to determine if, from the evidence, this case falls within the exceptions to the rule above stated. In this connection it may be noted that the trial court found that the allegations in plain-tiff's complaint of abandonment of the plaintiff by defendant had not been sustained, and our examination of the evidence in the case satisfies us that this finding of the lower court is correct. The only evidence of ill treatment of plaintiff by the defendant was the testimony of the plaintiff wherein she stated that she and her husband at different times had had quarrels with each other. She particularizes as to these quarrels and points out only two occasions, in one of which she states that her husband had driven her span of horses, and upon his return home, because of the fatigued look and condition of the animals, she had upbraided her husband; that he resented the censure and then stated he would leave home; that he would not stand to be talked to in that way; that he did go away from home, but returned the following day and continued to live in their residence. Another time there was some trouble and passing of unpleasant words over some property rights. Notwithstanding these family troubles, the plaintiff and defendant continued to live under the same roof, and at their parting at Colorado, Texas, December 9, 1909, they were on friendly terms.

Cruelty of a kind sufficient to authorize the granting of a divorce has been variously defined by the courts; but nowhere, so far as we are advised, has an occasional and isolated disturbance of the family relations participated in by both of the spouses been considered sufficient to authorize the dissolution of the marital relation. There is no evidence of physical violence actually applied or threatened. Nor is there any evidence pretending to show any mental distress that is likely to destroy the life or health of the plaintiff. In Beach v. Beach, 4 Okla. 359, 389, 46 Pac. 514, 524, the court said: "With reference to acts of physical violence, the rule has always been that a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt was sufficient; but where the conduct complained of operates primarily upon the mind, producing mental pain, it is not sufficient that there should be simply danger that such conduct, thus operating through the mental faculties, may produce injury to the physical system or bodily hurt, but it must be shown that such is in fact the effect, or, at least, that such effect may be reasonably apprehended as the result of the conduct."

Neither are sporadic quarrels or disagreements between the spouses, in which both of the parties are equally guilty, to be treated by the courts as constituting grounds for divorce. "The authorities are too numerous to require citation which hold that no single act operating mentally is sufficient to constitute cruelty justifying divorce, but that there must be a continuity of such conduct, and many, if not the great majority of, authorities, hold that such conduct must be shown to have been induced by malevolence, hatred, or spite." 4 Okla. 390.

The conduct complained of by the plaintiff on the part of the defendant is not such excessive cruelty as would have entitled her to a divorce under the laws of the state of Texas. In Scott v. Scott, 61 Tex. 119, it is said by the court that the wife may have a divorce for words spoken by her husband which impeach her chastity, but that same court added: "In no other cases have mere words alone, unaccompanied by other acts of cruelty, been held sufficient excesses to justify a separation from the bonds of matrimony."

We conclude that the conduct complained of by the plaintiff was not such cruelty as would justify her in abandoning her home; and in contemplation of law her residence or domicile was fixed by that of her husband, and she did not acquire an actual bona fide residence in the territory of Arizona by reason of her presence therein during the year previous to the institution of her suit for divorce. The marriage relation being the question involved in an action of this kind, the only court vested with jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter was the court of their matrimonial home.

We therefore hold that the District Court of Cochise County was without jurisdiction to try the case. The case is remanded to the Superior Court of Cochise County, with directions that the same be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Woodbury County sustaining motions of the several defendants for the separation of an action brought to recover damages from flood water alleged to have been caused by obstructions placed in a certain creek by defendants. Affirmed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

This is an action for damages against eighteen defendants for unlawfully obstructing a stream, and thereby causing plaintiff's premises to be flooded to his injury. Several defendants filed motions wherein each asked that the alleged cause of action as to him be separated from that charged against the other defendants, on the ground that the plaintiff had improperly joined causes of action, and had improperly joined such moving party as a joint defendant with the other defendants. These motions were sustained, and the plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. M. L. Sears and Edwin J. Stason, for appellant:

Where an injury is the direct result of the concurring or contributing acts of two or more persons, such persons are jointly and severally liable for the injury, and an action will lie against all or any one of them for the damages sustained.

Van Orsdol v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R.

Following the scope of the earlier note to Day v. Louisville Coal & Coke Co., this note relates to cases where the wrong of each person, independently of that of another tortfeasor, would have caused some injury, and it does not aim to include cases where, without the torts of two or more persons, no injury at all would have resulted; but some cases of this class are referred to in illustration.

Beyond its scope are cases where parties act in concert or are engaged in the same enterprise, or where, while not acting in concert, they purpose the same general result, as the manufacturer and seller of a noxious article, or the owner and the hirer of an unseaworthy vessel. Thus, the question of joining master and servant, landlord and tenant, principal and agent, etc., is in general excluded.

While the scope of this note does not permit of a general discussion upon the subject of the joinder of tortfeasors, it may be permitted here briefly to suggest to the reader one or two matters for his consideration.

By the weight of authority, and speaking of actions at law as distinguished from equity, independent tortfeasors, the act of each of whom alone would have caused some damage, are not liable jointly, but each is liable severally only for the proportion of the damage caused by him. As may be seen in the earlier note, a different view prevails in two or three jurisdictions.

But where the act of each independent tortfeasor would by itself have been harmless to the plaintiff, but from the total of these acts damage results to him, are the tortfeasors liable jointly or severally? All the authorities agree that in such case they are often liable both jointly and severally in certain cases of negligence. It will be seen that in WILLIAM TACKABERRY CO. v. SIOUX CITY SERVICE CO., we are left in doubt whether or not the court considered that the acts of all the tortfeasors were essential in producing the injury. Some of the courts have sought, in this connection, to separate wilful torts from negligence. Thus, it is stated in some of the cases that wilful torts are to be distinguished from negligence in that there must be co-operation to hold the perpetrators of a wilful tort jointly liable therefor, while co-operation is not necessarily requisite in negligence. See Schafer v. Ostmann, 148 Mo. App. 644, 129 S. W. 63 (assault and battery); Barton v. Barton, 119 Mo. App. 507, 94 S. W. 574 (alienation of spouse's affections), followed in Heisler v. Heisler, 151 Iowa, 503, 131 N. W. 676 (also a suit for alienation of spouse's affections). But no such distinction seems to have been in the mind of the court in the slander case of Green v. Davies, infra, nor indeed in the TACKABERRY CASE, the circumstances of which may be taken as an illustration of a preliminary difficulty which would arise in carrying out such a doctrine, to wit, the solving of the question whether the placing of obstructions to the stream, for example, was a wilful tort or a negligent one.

It would seem at least doubtful whether there is soundness in any such distinction. If we go to the negligence cases which hold independent tortfeasors jointly liable, it will be seen that in general they are cases in which, without the negligence of all the tortfeasors, there would have been no injury. Coming back to the cases of wilful torts, it is seen that in many, if not in most, of the cases where it has been held that independent tortfeasors without co-operation are not jointly liable, there would have been some injury from the tort of each. And while this may not have been so in the foregoing cases on assault and alienation of affections, and in a number of the cases cited below, they are not convincing upon the question. Nor is the possibility of contribution in negligence a sufficient reason for greater tenderness towards the wilful wrongdoer than towards the merely negligent.

Two independent polluters of a river, the acts of each of whom by themselves would be injurious to their lower neighbor, are by most courts held severally, but not jointly, liable. Suppose that each of two upper proprietors has a little brook on his land flowing into a river, and has dammed the brook and made a pond, and the dams are swept away by a storm, owing to negligence in their construction, and that the breaking of each dam alone would have been injurious to their neighbor below. It is conceived that here, as in the wilful tort, most of the courts would hold the tortfeasors liable severally, but not jointly. Perhaps the crux here in each case is that the torts of all were not required to effect damage. In Blair v. Deakin, infra, which was a suit in equity, so that the point was not decided, Kay, J., suggested a case which is particularly interesting in this connection. He supposed that one proprietor cast into a stream a chemical which by itself was harmless and caused no bad effect upon the water, and that another proprietor likewise cast in another chemical harmless in itself, but that the two chemicals in combination produced a third substance which poisoned the water. An important case in this connection is Boston & A. R. Co. v. Shanly, 107 Mass. 568, where, on orders of a certain third party, each of two independent manufacturers, each ignorant of the acts of the other, sent to a common carrier for transportation a different explosive, which two explosives, while to some extent dangerous in themselves, were it seems particularly so in combination, and an explosion of them occurred, and the manufacturers were held jointly liable to the carrier therefor.

Where parties severally place obstructions in a stream, whether they act in concert or not, and even though the act of each might alone cause no damage, yet when the acts unite in effect and cause an overflow and an injury to one not a riparian owner, they are jointly and severally liable for maintaining a nuisance, and for the damages they occasion private property.

There is another unsatisfactory doctrine that an act several when committed cannot be made joint because of consequences which follow it in connection with similar acts of others. If this doctrine is limited to cases of wilful tort, to the exclusion of cases of negligence, is it again because in negligence it is not so important to the defendant that he escape the total liability, as he may possibly have contribution? But it will be seen that in the TACKABERRY CASE this doctrine is referred to as if in force in negligence cases also; but the court does not make it clear why such a doctrine does not apply in its illustration of the passenger injured in a collision due to the negligence of his carrier and of another party. As heretofore stated, the matters just referred to relate to actions at law. In suits in equity there is greater liberality in the joinder of independent tortfeasors.

Actions for damages.

As heretofore stated, it is the rule in most jurisdictions that independent tortfeasors, the act of each of whom alone would have caused some damage, are liable only severally, and only for the proportion of the damage caused by him. And that the acts of all may be required to cause any damage seems to be considered as immaterial in the cases of Willard v. Red Bank Oil Co.; Equitable Powder Mfg. Co. v. Cleveland; Sun Co. v. Wyatt; and Hinds v. Barrie, — infra.

In Southern Salt Co. v. Roberson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 97 S. W. 107, where, by reason of odors, vapors, smoke, and dust, a landowner suffered damages from the operation of a salt works, and possibly also by reason of the operation of a railroad spur extending to the salt works, it was held that the liability of the owner of the salt works was limited to the damages caused by such works.

In McFadden v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 41 Tex. Civ. App. 350, 92 S. W. 989, where the plaintiff sued the defendant for creating ponds on its right of way, which were a nuisance, the court said: "We think the charge substantially correct wherein the jury are told, in effect, that if the damages suffered by appellant, if any, were caused by stagnant water or poisonous gases or odors, or that the mosquitoes complained of were caused proximately by ponds of water, if there were any, that they were not upon the right of way of the railway company, it would not be liable therefor. It does not appear, as we understand the evidence, that the railway company was in any way responsible for the existence of any such ponds. If, as a matter of fact, there were ponds of water near appellant's residence, not on the railway company's right of way, to the creation and existence of which no act of the company contributed, then the company would not be responsible for any injury resulting to appellant therefrom. Or, if such ponds existed and constituted a nuisance, emitting and diffusing over and about appellant's premises obnoxious and poisonous gases and smells, and a nuisance of like character existed at the same time through the act of the railway company on its right of way, and the two combined resulted in the injuries complained of, said company would not be relieved of liability, but would be liable only for the portion of the injuries which resulted from the nuisance created by it."

In Sadler v. Great Western R. Co. [1896] A. C. 450, affirming the decision cited in the TACKABERRY CASE, the plaintiff brought an action against two railway companies, alleging that his premises were between those of the respective defendants, which used their premises respectively as parcel offices; that in carrying on these businesses, each of the companies caused many carts and vans to assemble for long periods on the public highway in front of the appellant's premises, obstructing the highway and footway and causing inconvenience and peril to the public, and a special inconvenience and annoyance to the appellant as occupier of his premises, to which access was thus unreasonably obstructed, and that "further, each of the defendant companies frequently causes or permits access to the plaintiff's premises to be blocked by its vans and carts in manner aforesaid, at the same time while access to such premises is already blocked by vans and carts on the other side of his premises by the other defendant company, in manner aforesaid, and by their respective combined acts the defendants thus prevent all access to the plaintiff's premises by vehicle or cycle, and also cause special inconvenience and peril to the plaintiff and his servants and customers on the footway." The court held that the case could proceed against only one defendant, and that only separate torts were alleged. Halsbury, L. C., was of the opinion that if a joint tort were alleged in the second paragraph, a joint cause could not be joined with several causes of action.

[1899] 1 Q. B. 840, the lessees and occupiers of premises alleged that the defendants, in excavating the earth of the street adjoining the premises and pumping water out of the excavation, negligently abstracted subsoil water and subsoil supporting the premises, which thereby were damaged. The defendants denied the alleged negligence, and that the injuries to the premises were caused by the matters complained of. Their statement of defense alleged, among other things, that the defendants would, if necessary, contend that the injuries were caused wholly or in part by the Central London Railway, which was excavating a large shaft for one of its stations close to the premises, and by the negligence or default of the New River Company in leaving its water main at a point in front of the premises unstopped, or insufficiently and improperly stopped. The court, in reversing an order permitting the plaintiff to join the New River Company as an additional defendant, said: "The plaintiffs bring an action against the London county council for letting down their house. The London county council by their defense deny that they let down the house, and assert that the persons who let it down were the New River Company, by not looking after their main, so that the land underneath the house got into a moist state, which was the cause of the house falling down. The plaintiffs thereupon desire to join the New River Company as codefendants. . . . To allow that to be done would be to allow the joinder of a separate cause of action. It is all very well to say that whatever we do the plaintiffs get the same damages. That is not the question; the question is, who is the tortfeasor?"

In Millard v. Miller, 39 Colo. 103, 88 Pac. 845, where a landlord, having leased premises to a plaintiff, sold one part of the premises to one purchaser, and another part to another, it seems to be held that the tenant could not join the two purchasers for depriving him severally of the pasturage on the lands severally bought by them. The suit was against one purchaser and another person, probably the agent of the other purchaser, though the report is obscure on this point.

It may be noted that the authorities are not agreed as to whether there can be a joinder of more than one person in slander.

In Pope v. Hawtrey, 85 L. T. N. S. 263, 17 Times L. R. 717, where one of the defendants, who was a manager of a theater, said to one of the actors, concerning the plaintiff, who was another actor: "I won't have him in my theater at any price," and the other defendant said to the plaintiff afterwards in the hearing of a third person: "He (meaning the other defendant) won't have you in his theater at any price," it was held that actions for these two statements could not be joined in one action, although it was also charged that there was a conspiracy between the two defendants to dismiss the plaintiff from his employment as actor.

But in Green v. Davies, 182 N. Y. 499, 75 N. E. 536, 3 Ann. Cas. 310, the court, in holding that an action for slander could be maintained against more than one person, said: "As to the second objection to the complaint, that an action for slander can be maintained against one person only, we are of opinion that it is not well founded. There is no decision in this state on the point, and though dicta are to be found in the old text-books and in some of the English cases, which support the appellants' contention, the opinion of modern writers is against it. Odgers, Libel & Slander, p. 370. It is difficult to see on principle why there should be any such rule. The reason given by the old authorities, that a slander can be the utterance of but a single tongue, is not conclusive. Granting that only one person can speak the slander, still other persons may hire or procure him to utter it. In the case of other torts, such persons and the actual perpetrator of the act are joint tortfeasors. Thus, a principal and agent may be jointly sued for the negligence of the latter. Phelps v. Wait, 30 N. Y. 78. There is no reason for any different rule in a slander case. We do not mean to suggest that the repetition by one person of a slander uttered by Messrs. Fred W. Sargent, Shull, Farnsworth, & Sammis, F. E. Gill, James C. Davis, Wright & Sargent, Ferris & Iddings, Lewis S. Haslam, Henderson & Fribourg, E. A. Burgess, C. K. Williams, George H. Bliven, and George M. Pardoe also for appellees.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition is lengthy, and we will not set it out verbatim. The following statement from appellant's argument is a sufficient abstract thereof:

"The action is one at law, brought by the plaintiff to recover damages sustained by it on account of the flooding of the basement of its wholesale house, filled with perishable another is any part of the original slander. On the contrary, they give rise to two distinct causes of action. But if the two slanders were uttered in pursuance of a common agreement between the parties that such slanders should be uttered, then each is jointly liable with the other for their utterance, and separate causes of action for slander may be joined in the same complaint, under § 484 of the Code."

—floods, pollution, or obstruction of streams.

In Willard v. Red Bank Oil Co. 151 Ill. App. 433, the plaintiff sued thirteen defendants who had oil lands and oil wells from 1 to 4 miles from him on higher lands, alleging that when the rains came, oil which had escaped and flowed upon their lands was brought down into a creek, and from the creek, by the overflow of it, upon the plaintiff's lands, and injured them greatly. The court, in holding that a verdict was properly directed for the defendants, said: "A person polluting a water course is liable in damages only for his own act, and not for that of any others who may contribute to the injury. If others have contributed, his deposit must be separated by means of the best proof the nature of the case affords, and his liability ascertained accordingly." 2 Farnham, Waters, 1716; Seely v. Alden, 61 Pa. 302, 100 Am. Dec. 642; Chipman v. Palmer, 77 N. Y. 51, 33 Am. Rep. 566. We are of opinion that the acts of each of the defendants in allowing the escape of oil upon its own premises was separate and independent, and without any connection with the acts of others, and, being a several act when committed, it cannot be made joint because of the consequences which followed in connection with others who had done similar acts, and while it is true it is difficult or impracticable to separate the injury, that is no reason why one of the defendants should be liable as a joint tortfeasor (among whom there is no contribution), because of the consequences which followed the acts of goods, the flood water coming from Perry creek, which it is alleged overflowed its banks because of obstructions placed in it by the defendants. The plaintiff alleges in its petition that Perry creek is a natural water course which has its source a considerable distance north of Sioux City, and flows in a regular, well-defined channel through a thickly settled portion of the residence and business section of the city. The stream, as it passes through the city, has a channel of from 50 to 100 feet in width, with well-defined banks from 15 to 20 feet in height. The plaintiff's wholesale house is in the wholesale and retail business district of the city, and about 500 feet west of the creek, near where it empties into the Missouri river, and from 700 to 1,000 from and below the obstructions complained of.

"Prior to the 10th day of July, 1908, the defendant city constructed, and still maintains, a large iron bridge across Perry creek, at the junction of what is known as Fourth and West Third streets, constructed so low and short as to materially lessen the capacity of the stream, and materially prevent the waters from passing under the bridge, and in connection therewith constructed and maintains a closed cement apron to the south of the bridge, and joined with it in such manner as to prevent overflow water from flowing back into the channel of the stream; and prior to the said date the defendant Simmons Warehouse Company, without warrant or authority of others who have not acted in concert with it."

In Equitable Powder Mfg. Co. v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 155 Ill. App. 265, affirmed in 246 Ill. 582, 92 N. E. 979, without passing upon the question, the plaintiff sued several railroads, each of which had one or more embankments or structures on which they crossed a stream near his premises, some of them more than once, and he claimed that these embankments impeded the flow of the stream, whereby his lands were flooded and damaged. The court said: "It is argued this is a case where 'appellant's loss flowed not from the combined result of each appellee's act, but was the result of the combined acts of appellees.' We cannot agree to this conclusion. The evidence shows that each of the appellees, in performing the acts complained of, acted separately for itself and independently of the others and without concert of action. There could be no loss result to appellant except as a result not from the combined acts, but from the separate and independent acts of appellees, which caused the loss claimed by appellant."

... It will be found that most if not all the cases where they [tortfeasors] have been held liable have been cases where no injury, and no part of the injury, would have resulted but for the act of the several defendants held to be liable."

In Sun Co. v. Wyatt, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 349, 107 S. W. 934, the plaintiff claimed that the defendants, each acting for itself, laid their pipe lines in the ditch alongside of Highland avenue in the city of Beaumont, on which plaintiff had his residence, and immediately in front of his premises; that the combined result of these acts obstructed the flow of the surface water through the ditch; that by reason of leakage, oil which was being conveyed through the pipe lines ran into the ditch, and after a rainfall, by the overflow of this water caused by the obstruction aforesaid, was carried by the water and deposited upon plaintiff's premises, causing him the damages claimed. The court, in holding that the petition was demurrable, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

said: "It does not appear from the allegations of the petition, that there was any joint or concurrent action on the part of plaintiffs in error. On the contrary, it appears that each of the corporations joined as defendants acted independently of the others in the laying of the pipe lines and in maintaining and operating the same,—each defendant laying its own pipe line and maintaining and operating the same without regard to, or connection with, either of the others. It is not contended by plaintiff that the defendants acted jointly in the laying of their pipe lines in the ditch, but that the combined result of their separate and independent acts was to obstruct the flow of water through the ditch, causing the consequential injury of which he complains, and that this authorized the joinder of all of them in this suit. . . . In the present and similar actions where the parties act separately and independently, with no concert of action and no common purpose, it would be manifestly unjust to make each liable for the entire injury, without regard to the extent to which its acts contributed to the general result."

In Hinds v. Barrie, 6 Ont. L. Rep. 656, where the plaintiff joined the town and an individual in an action for damages, and such other relief as she might be entitled to, for obstructing a water course, whereby driftwood and rubbish were thrown upon her land, the court, in holding that an action against the two defendants together could not be maintained, said: "I am obliged, however, to say that no joint cause of action is disclosed. An unlawful act is alleged against each defendant. It is not charged that these acts were done in concert, or that the defendants were jointly concerned in their commission. The town is charged with having increased the volume of water flowing into the water course, at the same time obstructing the latter and diminishing its capacity for carrying it away. Webb is also charged with having contracted the water course where it passes through his land, and it is charged that the natural effect of the combined acts of the defendants is to cause the water law, and in violation of the statutes of Iowa, had constructed and was maintaining over the said Perry creek, and in the bed, bottom, and banks thereof, a solid piece of masonry known as a cement conduit, . . . of a size and capacity materially less than the size and capacity of the stream; that the said Simmons Warehouse Company, also in connection with the said conduit, and without warrant or authority of law, and in violation of the statutes of Iowa, constructed and was maintaining a solid cement apron from the top of the said conduit to the south edge of the bridge constructed by the city of Sioux City, and heretofore referred to; that the said cement apron was so constructed that water to the south of the said bridge could not again enter the bed of said Perry creek, but was forced out of and away from the bed of said stream, and upon public and private property; that the said bridge . . . and the apron and conduit aforesaid were constructed under the supervision and co-operation of the defendant Simmons Warehouse Company and the defendant city of Sioux City, and has been so maintained and kept to the present time. Prior to the said date, the defendants Sioux City Service Company, the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company, Great Northern Railway Company, and city of Sioux City had each built and were maintaining pile bridges in and over said creek at points both to the north and south of flowing through the water course to become obstructed and to be dammed back upon, and to overflow, the plaintiff's land. 'Combined,' in this connection, the wrongful acts being independent of each other, means no more than 'concurrent' (Sadler v. Great Western R. Co. [1895] 2 Q. B. 688, at p. 694), and does not charge a joint cause of action (p. 693). Each of these acts, being wrongful, gives rise to a separate cause of action against each defendant, though their injurious result may be increased, or even sensibly caused, by the concurrence of both."

It seems probable that the court took the view that there was a distinction between wilful torts and negligence in Goldstein v. Tunick, 59 Misc. 516, 110 N. Y. Supp. 905, where the court below gave judgment for the defendant in an action by a man against his next door neighbor for flooding the alley between them by water from his roof, whence the water came into his basement, and where it was claimed by the defendant that the plaintiff's landlord was also guilty of negligence which caused part of the damage. The court seemed to be of the opinion that the defendant might be sued for the entire damage, although the plaintiff's landlord had contributed to it, and quoted from the opinion in Slater v. Mersereau, 64 N. Y. 138, this proposition: "Where separate acts of negligence of two parties are the direct causes of a single injury to a third person, and it is impossible to determine in what proportion each contributed to the injury, either is responsible for the whole injury; and this although, without fault on his part, the damages would have resulted from the act of the other." But this it seems was not necessary to the reversal of the judgment.

The separation of joint action from several actions is often a matter of great difficulty. In Timms v. Vancouver, 15 B. C. 336, where the plaintiff sued the defendant corporations,—one being a city, the other a railway company,—for damages to his land, whereby a water course on his land was obstructed or its capacity diminished by the city by its arrangement of its drains, etc., and by the railroad by the erection of a building, the court, in declining to direct the plaintiff to elect which of the defendants he should proceed against, said: "If there was joint action by the two defendants in the laying out of a drainage system, and that system should prove to have been negligently devised or carried out (with, of course, resultant damage to riparian owners), the defendants would in my opinion be joint tortfeasors, in which case they would be properly joined in one action. That being a possible construction of this statement of claim, this motion must be dismissed."

In Pickerrill v. Louisville, 125 Ky. 213, 100 S. W. 873, it was alleged that the defendant city by its manner of drainage, and the two defendant railroad companies by their constructions, threw water and filth upon the plaintiff's lot, causing him injury by the joint and several negligence of the defendants; that the two railroad companies were jointly interested in certain of these constructions, and that their wrongful acts were committed and done with the knowledge and approval of the defendant city. The court said: "There was no misjoinder of parties or of actions. According to the allegations of the petition, and much of appellant's testimony, all the appellees were wrongdoers, as by their joint and several acts and conduct appellant's property was injured. If the averments of the petition are true, and appellant's testimony can be relied on, all contributed in some material measure to the injuries complained of. The injuries resulted from the diversion of the water from its natural course, and the accumulation of an unusual quantity of it upon appellant's lot. If this was caused in part by the acts of each of the appellees, and the entire volume of water produced by their joint and concurring negligence inflicted the injury, unquestionably it was inflicted by the combined or joint action of all three of them; therefore they are jointly, as well as severally, liable." See also, as to pollution of stream, cases cited in note in 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1185.

plaintiff's place of business, and in building and maintaining the said bridges they had driven several hundred large piles in the banks and bed of the stream, and had built piers therein, and each is still maintaining the said bridges, piles, and piers. Prior to the said date, the other defendants had each constructed buildings between Fourth and Fifth streets on the banks and bed of the creek, and in the construction thereof they had deposited large quantities of rock, stone, and cement adjacent to their buildings, thus lessening the carrying capacity of the stream.

"The plaintiff alleges that the said bridges, buildings, and other structures were so improperly, unskilfully, and negligently constructed and placed in the channel of the creek, that no adequate space was left for the free and unobstructed passage of the water, and, through the narrowing and restricting of the channel of the creek in this manner, and by the catching and lodgment of great quantities of débris and drift by the piles, piers, girders, walls, and projections of said bridges, conduit, buildings, and other structures, caused the overflow of the waters of the creek and the flooding of the plaintiff's premises. The plaintiff further alleges in its petition that, had the stream been kept free from obstructions, its waters would have remained in the channel of the stream, and would have flowed into the Missouri river without damage to the plaintiff; that the defendants knew or should have known of the obstruc—damages by animals of different owners.

In Nobre v. Wright, 98 Minn. 477, 108 N. W. 865, 8 Ann. Cas. 1071, where the plaintiff brought an action for sheep killed by defendants' dogs, the court said: "The complaint alleged that the two dogs 'were owned and in the possession of the defendants herein,' but the evidence very clearly showed that one dog belonged to the defendant George Wright, and the other to the defendant William Wright. The common-law rule is that, where domestic animals of different owners unite in committing an injury, the wrong is not the joint wrong of the owners, but each owner is liable separately for the damages done by his own animal. Separate owners of several animals are not jointly liable for damages done by them all at the same time."

Where two dogs attacked and killed sheep, in an action against the owner of one of the dogs, there was evidence that he killed one of the sheep, and the court gave judgment for the value of that sheep and for the value of one half of the other sheep killed; and this was affirmed by an evenly divided court. Williams v. Woodworth, 32 N. S. 271.

So, the owner of trespassing sheep may show that the cattle of the plaintiff and others were grazing on the land at the time of the alleged trespass, and did part of the damage complained of, as he is liable only for the mischief done by his sheep, and not for that done by the animals of others. Pacific Livestock Co. v. Murray, 45 Or. 103, 76 Pac. 1079.

In Wood v. Snider, 187 N. Y. 28, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 912, 79 N. E. 858, where a drove of cattle owned by several persons in severalty, and attended by their owners and others, trespassed on the plaintiff's lands, and the evidence justified a finding that they all did equal damage, it was held that the defendant, the owner of part of the cattle, was liable for such part of the whole damage as his cattle bore to all the cattle.

But where there is concert of action the rule is otherwise. In Martin v. Farrell, 66 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

App. Div. 177, 72 N. Y. Supp. 934, it appeared that the two defendants and two other persons coming back from horse riding found that the stable man of the defendants was away, and thereupon the horses of the Farrells and of one of the other riders were put in a lot where the plaintiff's horse was rightfully pasturing, the locked gate of which was opened by drawing the staple. Later the plaintiff's horse was found to be injured. The court said: "The three horses were heard in the lots with the plaintiff's horse during the night, and they were seen there during the early part of the following day. One of the three horses was seen to kick at the forward part of the plaintiff's horse, and the plaintiff's horse started away limping on the left foreleg. Subsequently, the plaintiff found his horse in the lot with an injury on the left foreleg. . . . This action is brought against the defendants for damages to the plaintiff's horse. It is an action for a wrong. The wrong consists in putting the horses into the field where plaintiff's horse was rightfully pasturing. It was a single wrongful act, although several were concerned therein. This case does not depend upon the ownership of the horses, nor as to whether they were known to be vicious. The rule that each person is liable only for damages done by his own animal does not apply. If the injury to the plaintiff's horse was one fairly to have been anticipated from the wrongful act of turning the three horses into the lots, then all persons participating in the wrong were joint wrongdoers." Judgment against one of the defendants was affirmed, but judgment against the other defendant was reversed by lack of evidence that he took part in turning the horses into the lot.

In an action for trespass on lands by the defendant's cattle, where the facts are not reported so that the exact nature of the situation can appear, the court said: "The defendants were in the joint, or at least common, occupation of an adjoining cattle range, and each of them owned animals going to make up a herd that pastured the range and that committed the trespass and tions which were being placed in the stream, and maintained there, and that they would render the carrying capacity of the creek insufficient; that they would divert the waters of the stream, and cause it to overflow, to the injury of the plaintiff and others; that the construction and maintenance of the said obstructions constituted an unlawful obstruction of the creek, and the obstructions united in their effect and results and caused the diversion of the waters of the creek, and constituted a public and common nuisance, in violation of both public and private rights; and that the defendants, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, should have known that the structures would combine and unite in obstructing the stream, and would constitute a public nuisance, in violation of both public and private rights. By the flooding of the plaintiff's premises, it was damaged, so it alleges, in the sum of $20,000, for which it demands judgment, and that the obstruction maintained by the defendants, and each of them, be adjudged to constitute nuisances, and an order be made directing the abatement thereof."

The principal question presented under the motions of the moving defendants is whether, upon the showing of the petition, a joint liability of the defendants is made to appear. If the facts pleaded show only a several liability, and not a joint liability, then the motions were properly sustained. The appellant contends for the application of the rule that, where an injury is caused inflicted the damage complained of, and for which the recovery was had." It was held that the defendants were jointly liable. Wilson v. White, 77 Neb. 351, 124 Am. St. Rep. 852, 109 N. W. 367.

Suits to restrain tortfeasors.

See also note in 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1149.

As heretofore stated, the courts show greater liberality in allowing the joining of tortfeasors in suits to restrain their wrongful acts, than in actions for damages.

In State ex rel. Federal Lead Co. v. Dearing, — Mo. —, 148 S. W. 618, it appears that an action was begun by the owner of land upon a river, to enjoin the relator and several other parties from polluting the waters of the stream by discharging into it certain substances from their various mines and mills, and that the relator brought a writ of prohibition to prevent the judge from going on with the case. In dismissing the writ, the court said: "It does not appear from the petition that whatever was done by the several defendants toward polluting the stream was done independently. In other words, each defendant has its own separate milling plant, and the refuse from them is placed into the stream by the several defendants in the ordinary and usual manner of doing their respective work. One defendant had nothing to do with the work and doings of the other. But, on the other hand, the petition charges that the combined wrongful doings of all defendants has produced the present condition of the river, and has therefore produced the nuisance sought to be abated."

There is a marked distinction between actions in equity and actions at law in cases of this character. If the plaintiff, Steinmetz, had sued these five defendants for damages resulting to his property by reason of their alleged separate acts, the cause of action stated would be a separable cause of action, because each defendant would only be liable for such proportionate part of the whole damage as it had done by reason of its individual wrongful act. Better stated, each defendant would only be liable to plaintiff for such damage as its individual wrongful acts had occasioned. But in equity where the purpose of the action is to abate the nuisance which produces the injury, and thereby restore the stream, the rule as to joinder of parties is different. In such cases each party contributing in any way to produce the pollution of the stream is a proper party defendant, and no separable cause of action stated. In a note to the case of Warren v. Parkhurst, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1149, the learned annotator has clearly drawn the distinction." (The court then quotes the note.)

In Madison v. Ducktown Sulphur, Copper & Iron Co. 113 Tenn. 331, 83 S. W. 658, where several plaintiffs sued two defendants for an injunction based on the ground of nuisance, in that, in the operation of their plant in the course of reducing copper ore, large volumes of smoke were emitted which descended upon the surrounding lands and injured trees and crops, and rendered the homes of the complainants less comfortable and their lands less profitable than before, the court said: "The rule is that two or more persons may unite in a bill to enjoin a nuisance, although their lands are separate and distinct from each other, where it appears that the lands of all are affected in substantially the same way by the nuisance complained of. . . . So, when several persons, acting independently, combine to produce a nuisance, such persons may be joined as defendants in a suit for injunctive relief. . . . But there can be joinder neither of complainants nor of defendants for the purpose of recovering damages for the injuries caused by such nuisance." But an injunction was denied conditionally.

In Wood v. Sutcliffe, 16 Jur. 75, 2 Sim. N. S. 163, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 253, the court was of the opinion that it would be no answer to a claim for an injunction for polluting the waters of a stream, that other parties also were polluting it.

So, in Crossley v. Lightowler, L. R. 3 Eq. 279, the court, while it is stated that the point was not necessary for the decito a third person by the concurring wrongful acts of others, each and all such wrongdoers are severally and jointly liable for the injury thus inflicted. As to the general statement of this rule, there is no difficulty. All authorities concur in it. But in the application of this rule to the concrete case difficulty has often been encountered, and diversity of opinion has arisen. Such is the form of the controversy here. It is not claimed in the petition that there was any concert of action in the erection of the alleged nuisances by the defendants, nor that there was any concurrence of action in either place or time. Some of the defendants built bridges across the stream at different points thereon. Others built structures upon its banks, and encroached upon its capacity. But each acted independently and for himself alone. Because of the lack of concert, appellees contend that each is liable only for his own wrong and the consequences thereof. The appellant contends that the rule referred to may apply even though there be no prior concert of action. A familiar illustration of such an application is a case wherein a collision may occur between trains owned and operated independently, and as a result of the independent and separate negligence of the persons in control of the respective trains. In such a case, both parties are held liable for the injuries resulting from the collision. Again, the application of the rule has been denied in many cases where concurring negligences have con-sion under the facts, was of the opinion that it was no answer to an application to enjoin a man from polluting a stream that others were also polluting the stream, and that an injunction against him would not make the water clear.

In Cowan v. Buccleuch, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 344, it was held that it was proper practice under the Scotch law to join in one action for an injunction independent polluters of a river.

In Blair v. Deakin, 57 L. T. N. S. 522, in granting an injunction against a manufacturer for polluting a stream, the court considered that it was shown that the defendants' acts alone were polluting the water, but discussed the question whether the action would lie if the pollution caused by the defendants was by itself not material, and said: "Given, first, the fact that the amount of pollution brought in by the defendants is such that by itself it would not sufficiently injure this water as to make it unfit for bleaching at the works or either of the plaintiffs; but given also the fact that the amount poured in by the defendants, together with the amount poured in by their father at his works, is enough to produce the condition of things which actually exists,—namely, that the water at the plaintiffs' works is unfit for bleaching,—now, is it the law that, supposing it is impossible to say that any one of those persons pours into this stream foul matter enough by itself to create a nuisance, but that what they all pour in together does create a nuisance, that the plaintiffs cannot sue any one of them? If that were so, I suppose a plaintiff who lost that which is his natural right—namely, to have the water of the stream pass in its original pure condition—might lose that right entirely by the combined action of a number of manufactures above him. They might all laugh at him and say, 'You cannot sue any one of us because you cannot prove that what each one of us does would of itself be enough to cause you damage.' All I can observe is that, in my opinion, it would be a most unjust law if there were such a law." He said, further, if the riparian owner finds that the bad condition "was produced by the combined acts of a number of riparian proprietors above him, is he without remedy? Has he no remedy because each one of them can say: 'It was not my doing. I only contributed a part, and the part I did contribute was not enough to do you damage?' I put another illustration during the course of the argument which has not been answered to my satisfaction. Suppose that there were only two polluting sources; suppose that one of two manufacturers sent in a particular chemical which of itself would do no kind of harm, and then that the other below him sent in another chemical which of itself would do no kind of harm; suppose that the combined effect of those two chemicals—and the thing is quite possible—would be such that the stream would become poisoned and quite unusable for any domestic or manufacturing use, would neither of those manufacturers be liable? I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion a man so injured has distinctly a right to take the several persons who injure him in detail and to say, 'I am suffering from the combined acts of all of you; if I can prove that each one of you contributes to that result which is damaging me, I have a right to sue, and a right to ask the court to prevent each of you from sending in his contribution to that which in the aggregate does me damage.'"

In Sammons v. Gloversville, decided in 1901, 34 Misc. 459, 70 N. Y. Supp. 284, affirmed in 67 App. Div. 628, 74 N. Y. Supp. 1145, 175 N. Y. 346, 67 N. E. 622, it was held that where a city had injured the plaintiff by throwing its sewer into a stream, he was entitled to injunctive relief against the city, although there were tanneries and another city which also contributed to the pollution of the water, as he was not required to sue them all at once; but the judgment was framed in such a way as to give the city an opportunity to apply to the legislature for leave to condemn the land before it became operative. Compare Whalen v. Union Bag & Paper Co. infra.

tributed to an injury without concert of action on the part of the wrongdoers. The most frequent illustration of this holding is to be found in cases of nuisance wherein different parties have independently contributed to the pollution of the atmosphere, or to the pollution of a stream by sewage or otherwise, or to the obstruction of a stream.

Appellant introduces the discussion at this point with the following quotation from Cooley on Torts, *153: "Where several persons unite in an act which constitutes a wrong to another, intending at the time to commit it, or doing it under circumstances which fairly charge them with intending the consequences which follow, it is a very reasonable and just rule of law which compels each to assume and bear the responsibility of the misconduct of all. To require the party injured to ascertain and point out how much of the injury was done by one person and how much by another, or what share of responsibility is fairly attributable to each as between themselves, and to leave this to be apportioned among them by the jury according to the mischief found to have been done by each, would, in many cases, be equivalent to a practical denial of justice. The law does not require this, but, on the other hand, permits the party injured to treat all concerned in the injury as constituting together one party, by their joint co-operation accomplishing certain injurious results, and liable to respond to him in a gross sum as damages."

As against this, the appellees quote the same authority, 3d ed. *166: "But where different proprietors on a stream, each acting independently and for his own purposes, conduct filth or refuse into the stream from their respective estates, they are held not to be jointly liable. So, where several proprietors drain their premises into the same ditch or water way, and the combined waters flood or otherwise damage a lower proprietor. But it would be otherwise, if there was some concert of action, as if they joined in constructing or maintaining the ditch. The same rule applies to the pollution of the atmosphere as to the pollution of a stream. And where different factories or works owned and carried on by different proprietors each discharge volumes of smoke and gases into the atmosphere, which mingle and spread over the surrounding territory, injuring vegetation and affecting the health and comfort of those who live in the vicinity, each proprietor is liable only for the proportion of the damage caused by him, and not jointly and severally for the entire damage."

Our own cases are committed to the doctrine that a party who wrongfully pollutes the atmosphere, or who so pollutes a stream, is liable for the extent of the injury caused by his wrongful act, and that he is not jointly liable with other parties who, acting independently, may also be guilty at the same time of the same kind of pollution. Loughran v. Des Moines, 72 Iowa, 382, 34 N. W. 172; Harley v. Merrill Brick Co. 83 Iowa, 73, 48 N. W. 1000; Bowman v. Humphrey, 124 Iowa, 744, 100 N. W. 854, Id., 132 Iowa, 234, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1111, 109 N. W. 714, 11 Ann. Cas. 131.

In the Bowman Case last cited, it is said: "Now, while the doctrine here stated is undoubtedly correct as applied to an appropriate state of facts, it is not difficult to see that it is misapplied under circumstances such as are here presented. Joint liability of wrongdoers, each for all and all for each, exists only where the wrong itself is joint. If the separate wrongful acts of two or more persons acting inde-

But in Whalen v. Union Bag & Paper Co. 145 App. Div. 1, 129 N. Y. Supp. 391, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff in an action to restrain the defendant from polluting a stream by its pulp mill, and for damages, the court stated that the damages sustained by the plaintiff were insignificant in comparison with the damage that the defendant would suffer if obliged to discontinue its mill; that the stream was also polluted by other mills, one in particular, and that the injunction would not clear the stream; and that the damages had not been apportioned so as to charge the defendant merely with the damage which it had caused, and said: "The judgment should be modified by eliminating that part granting an injunction and providing that the plaintiff may at any time apply at the foot of the judgment for an injunction, upon showing that otherwise the creek is reasonably pure, or that the other parties illegally contaminating it are properly enjoined or have ceased to pollute the same, and that upon showing such facts and making it appear that the ends of justice so require, an injunction substantially as mentioned in the judgment, or such as the court may direct, shall issue, or, at the plaintiff's election, that he may take such action for such other or further relief as he may be advised, on account of any injury to his property hereafter occurring; and the judgment is reversed upon the law and facts and new trial granted, with costs to appellant to abide event, unless plaintiff stipulates to reduce the damages to $100 per year, in which case the judgment is so modified, and as modified hereby affirmed, without costs to either party." The damages awarded in the trial court were about $312 per year; Betts, J., dissented and cited, among other cases, Sammons v. Gloversville, supra.

pendently, without concert, plan, or agreement, unite to cause injury to another, such persons are not joint wrongdoers within the meaning of the law, and each is liable to the injured party for only so much of said injury as is chargeable to his own separate individual act. Bonte v. Postel, 109 Ky. 64, 51 L.R.A. 187, 58 S. W. 536; Sparkman v. Swift, 81 Ala. 231, 8 So. 160; Bard v. Yohn, 26 Pa. 482; La France v. Krayner, 42 Iowa, 143; Harley v. Merrill Brick Co. 83 Iowa, 79, 48 N. W. 1000; De Donato v. Morrison, 160 Mo. 581, 61 S. W. 641; Little Schuykill Nav. R. & Coal Co. v. Richards, 57 Pa. 142, 98 Am. Dec. 209; Wiest v. Electric Traction Co. (Wiest v. Philadelphia) 200 Pa. 148, 58 L.R.A. 666, 49 Atl. 891; Lull v. Fox & W. Improv. Co. 19 Wis. 101. As suggested by the Pennsylvania court, if the tort of the parties was several when committed, it did not become joint because of the union of the consequences of the several torts in producing an injury. Wiest v. Electric Traction Co. supra; Gallagher v. Kemmerer, 144 Pa. 509, 27 Am. St. Rep. 673, 22 Atl. 970.

In the Harley Case, 83 Iowa, 73, 48 N. W. 1000, it is said: "It is well settled that each person who acts in maintaining a nuisance is liable for the resulting damage. If he act independently, and not in concert with others, he is liable for the damages which result from his own act only. Loughran v. Des Moines, 72 Iowa, 386, 34 N. W. 172; Ferguson v. Firmenich Mfg. Co. 77 Iowa, 578, 14 Am. St. Rep. 319, 42 N. W. 448; Sloggy v. Dilworth, 38 Minn. 179, 8 Am. St. Rep. 656, 36 N. W. 451; Sellick v. Hall, 47 Conn. 273; Evans v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 96 N. C. 45, 1 S. E. 529; 3 Sutherland, Damages, 425; 1 Addison, Torts, 364; Gould, Waters, §§ 222, 398; Wood, Nuisances, § 831. And the fact that it is difficult to measure accurately the damage which was caused by the wrongful act of each contributor to the aggregate result does not affect the rule, nor make any one liable for the acts of others. Chipman v. Palmer, 77 N. Y. 53, 33 Am. Rep. 566; Lull v. Fox & W. Improv. Co. 19 Wis. 101. It is said that a different rule applies to smoke than to other nuisances, for the reason that it is much more common, and in many cities not to be avoided. We know of no reason why the rule under consideration should not be applied to all nuisances, whether due to smoke, smell, water, gas, noise, or other of the common sources of nuisance. See 2 Thomp. Trials, § 1899; Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. 412, 15 Week. Rep. 417."

In the Loughran Case, 72 Iowa, 386, 34 N. W. 172, it was said: "It was surely the right of the defendant to show that the 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

damages to the plaintiff resulted from other causes than that upon which he founded his action; and it was competent for the city to show that the sewer was not the cause of all the damages complained of, and thus mitigate the damages complained of in the action. If several persons drain their premises into the same ditch, the waters of which are discharged near the premises of another, and produce an injury either to his estate or to its comfortable enjoyment, each of the persons so using the drain is liable for the damage occasioned by his act; but he is not liable for the damage caused by others. Chipman v. Palmer, 9 Hun, 517, 77 N. Y. 51, 33 Am. Rep. 566; Keyes v. Little York Gold Washing & Water Co. 53 Cal. 724, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 95."

No cases are cited to us which run counter to the above, except certain Indiana cases and one case from West Virginia, viz., South Bend Mfg. Co. v. Liphart, 12 Ind. App. 185, 39 N. E. 908; Valparaiso v. Moffitt, 12 Ind. App. 250, 54 Am. St. Rep. 522, 39 N. E. 909; West Muncie Strawboard Co. v. Slack, 164 Ind. 21, 72 N. E. 879; Day v. Louisville Coal & Coke Co. 60 W. Va. 27, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, 53 S. E. 776. Reference will be made to these cases later herein. Other cases are cited by appellant, but they bear only remotely upon the precise question here involved.

In Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 Am. Rep. 603, the action was for damages for injuries which resulted to plaintiff from falling into a coal hole in the sidewalk. It was held that both the landlord and the tenant in possession were responsible for the nuisance, and were jointly liable to the plaintiff for his injuries.

In Slater v. Mersereau, 64 N. Y. 138, the contractor and his subcontractor, while at work upon a building, each separately allowed water to run in such a way as to injure a neighboring building. In a suit against the contractor alone, he was held liable for the entire damage.

In Simmons v. Everson, 124 N. Y. 319, 21 Am. St. Rep. 676, 26 N. E. 911, three defendants were held jointly liable for damages for the killing of a pedestrian upon the sidewalk, by reason of the falling of a wall upon him. The defendants, Lloyd Pierce, and Everson, were the several owners of three adjoining and parallel lots upon which a building was constructed, constituting three separate storerooms, each being 22 feet wide. One continuous front wall was made for the three stores, and the partition walls were joined thereto. After a fire which destroyed the rest of the structure, this front wall was left standing. It was in a damaged condition, and was leaning toward the street. Its construction and condition were such that the falling of a part thereof would naturally carry down the rest of it. At the time of its final collapse, it first gave way at the partition line between Lloyd and Pierce, and the whole wall thereupon fell. That part of the wall opposite the lots of Pierce and Everson fell upon the decedent. No part of the material of Lloyd's part of the wall fell upon the decedent. It was held that the relations of the three defendants to the wall in question were such as to render them each and all responsible for its condition as a nuisance, and that they were jointly liable for the injury.

In Bryant v. Bigelow Carpet Co. 131 Mass. 491, there was a claim of concert of action between the two defendants. There was no claim of joint liability independent of such alleged concert of action. The same is true of Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Keifer, 134 Ill. 481, 10 L.R.A. 698, 23 Am. St. Rep. 688, 25 N. E. 799.

In Coleman v. Bennett, 111 Tenn. 705, 69 S. W. 734, there was only one defendant in the case. He was charged in the petition to have collected surface water and cast the same upon plaintiff's land. It was held that he was liable for damages, even though a levee built by a third person was instrumental in preventing the escape of the water from plaintiff's land. Cases are also cited by appellant, wherein parties were held jointly liable for damages caused by their racing of horses in the street.

Cuddy v. Horn, 46 Mich. 596, 41 Am. Rep. 178, 10 N. W. 32, was an action for damages resulting from a collision between two steamboats. The collision occurred as a result of negligence in the management of each boat. It was held that there was a joint liability.

McClellan v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 58 Minn. 104, 59 N. W. 978, was a fire case. There was but one defendant, and it was held liable. The origin of the fire was in dispute as to whether it resulted from a fire set out by the defendant, or from one set out by a third party. In the discussion of the case, it was said, in effect, that the commingling of the defendant's fire, if any, with that set out by another, did not relieve the defendant from liability. This we understand to be the general holding on the question of commingling fires.

Kansas City v. Slangstrom, 53 Kan. 431, 36 Pac. 706, was an action against the city alone, wherein the question of joint liability was not directly involved. The defense was that the damage was caused by a third party. This defense was overruled. It was said in the opinion that, upon the facts shown both parties would be liable.

Dec. 329, was an action for damages for injuries resulting from the falling of a party wall. Both owners were held to be jointly liable.

The foregoing indicates the general nature of the authorities relied upon by appellant in support of its contention. As against this, the following authorities outside of our own are directly in point, and clearly adverse to appellant's contention: Little Schuylkill Nav. R. & Coal Co. v. Richards, 57 Pa. 142, 98 Am. Dec. 209, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 661; Gallagher v. Kemmerer, 144 Pa. 509, 27 Am. St. Rep. 673, 22 Atl. 970; Ames v. Dorset Marble Co. 64 Vt. 10, 23 Atl. 857; Chipman v. Palmer, 77 N. Y. 51, 33 Am. Rep. 566; Swain v. Tennessee Copper Co. 111 Tenn. 430, 78 S. W. 93; Watson v. Colusa-Parrot Min. & Smelting Co. 31 Mont. 513, 79 Pac. 14; Miller v. Highland Ditch Co. 87 Cal. 430, 22 Am. St. Rep. 254, 25 Pac. 550; Mansfield v. Bristol, 76 Ohio St. 270, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 806, 118 Am. St. Rep. 852, 81 N. E. 631, 10 Ann. Cas. 787; Martinowsky v. Hannibal, 35 Mo. App. 70; Sloggy v. Dilworth, 38 Minn. 179, 8 Am. St. Rep. 656, 36 N. W. 451; Lull v. Fox & W. Improv. Co. 19 Wis. 100.

The general reason which underlies the holding in these various cases is indicated in the following excerpts:

Chipman v. Palmer, 77 N. Y. 51, 33 Am. Rep. 566, involved the pollutions of a stream. From the opinion, we quote the following: "The defendant's act, being several when it was committed, cannot be made joint because of the consequences which followed in connection with others who had done the same or a similar act. It is true that it is difficult to separate the injury, but that furnishes no reason why one tortfeasor should be liable for the act of others who have no association, and do not act in concert, with him. If the law was otherwise, the one who did the least might be made liable for the damages of others far exceeding the amount for which he really was chargeable, without any means to enforce contribution, or to adjust the amount among the different parties; so, also, proof of an act by one person would entitle plaintiff to recover for all the damages sustained by the acts of others who severally and independently may have contributed to the injury. Such a rule cannot be upheld upon any sound principle of law. . . . The authorities relied upon to sustain such a doctrine come far short of establishing any such rule, and have no application. [Citing cases.] Each of the cases cited was disposed of upon a different principle. They merely hold that, where a direct personal injury is occasioned by the separate and concurring negligence of two parties at one and the same time, an action against one or all of them will lie. The distinction is plain." The case of Slater v. Mersereau, 64 N. Y. 138, "in no way upholds the doctrine contended for by plaintiff's counsel, and is not in point. . . . While, as we have seen, an equitable action will lie to restrain parties who severally contributed to a nuisance, the general rule is well settled that, where different parties are engaged in polluting or obstructing a stream at different times and places, the whole damages . . . cannot be collected of one of the parties."

The Ames Case, 64 Vt. 10, 23 Atl. 857, was an action for damages for obstructing a stream, which resulted in the flooding of plaintiff's meadow. We quote the following from the opinion: "Each defendant is liable in damages in proportion only as its wrongful acts have contributed to obstructing the flow of water and setting it back upon the orator's meadow. The defendants are not joint wrongdoers in the sense that they join in doing the same wrongful act, but only in the sense that their several wrongful acts combine in causing damage to the orator's meadow. This does not make them jointly tortfeasors in the sense that each is liable for all the damages occasioned to the orator's meadow."

Lull v. Fox & W. Improv. Co. 19 Wis. 100, was a case of obstructing a stream. We quote the following from the opinion: "Here are two distinct causes of action set out; one against the corporation defendant; the other against the other defendants. There is no allegation that all the defendants acted together in erecting or maintaining either or both of these dams; on the contrary, it is alleged they acted separately; each dam was erected and has been maintained by a part of the defendants without the aid or even approval of the others. We are at a loss to perceive how, by the well-established rules of pleading, these causes of action can be united. It is argued that the result of the separate acts of the defendants in erecting and maintaining the dams is a joint result, the same as if all the defendants had been engaged in erecting and maintaining both dams. If it were so, it does not follow that the defendant or defendants who alone erected and maintained one dam, without any concert of action or connection with the defendant or defendants erecting and maintaining the other dam, should be held liable to pay the damages occasioned by erecting and maintaining both. The argument that there is difficulty in ascertaining the damage done or caused by the erection of each dam, or that it is impossible, is certainly 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) no reason why one defendant should pay for the damages caused by another with whom he is in no way connected. In fact, if this action can be maintained jointly against all the defendants, then each defendant is separately liable in a separate action for all the damages occasioned by the erection of both dams."

From Little Schuylkill Nav. R. & Coal Co. v. Richards, 57 Pa. 142, 98 Am. Dec. 209, supra, we quote the following from the opinion: "The substance of the charge and answers to points was that, if, at the time the defendants were engaged in throwing the coal dirt into the river, about 10 miles above the dam, the same thing was being done at other collieries, and the defendants knew of this, they were liable for the combined result of all the series of deposits of dirt from the mines above from 1851 till 1858. . . . But the fallacy lies in the assumption that the deposit of the dirt by the stream in the basin is of the foundation of liability. It is the immediate cause of the injury; but the ground of the action is the negligent act above. The right of action arises upon the act of throwing the dirt into the stream; this is the tort, while the deposit below is only a consequence. The liability, therefore, began above with the defendant's act upon his own land, and this act was wholly separate and independent of all concert with others. His tort was several when it was committed, and it is difficult to see how it afterwards became joint because its consequences united with other consequences. The union of consequences did not increase his injury. If the dirt were deposited mountain high by the stream, his dirt filled only its own space, and it was made neither more nor less by the accretions. . . . But the difficulty of separating the injury of each from the others would be no reason that one man should be held to be liable for the torts of others without concert. It would be simply to say, because the plaintiff fails to prove the injury one man does him, he may therefore recover from that one all the injury that others do. This is bad logic and hard law. Without concert of action, no joint suit could be brought against the owners of all the collieries, and clearly this must be the test; for, if the defendants can be held liable for the acts of all the others, so each and every owner can be made liable for all the rest, and the action must be joint and several. But the moment we should find them jointly sued, then the want of concert and the several liability of each would be apparent."

Reference has already been made to the cases in Indiana and West Virginia. The first cited of the Indiana cases, supra, involved damages for a washout caused by the alleged negligence of two adjoining owners of flumes connected to the same mill race. The other two cases involved the pollution of streams by the independent acts of various parties, not acting in concert. The holding in all these cases is very sweeping in favor of the theory of joint liability in all such cases. The only authorities relied upon for such holdings are the cases of Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 Am. Rep. 603, and Simmons v. Everson, 124 N. Y. 319, 21 Am. St. Rep. 676, 26 N. E. 911, both of which cases we have already stated. Neither of such cited cases involved the question of polluting or obstructing a stream.

The following quotation from the West Muncie Case, 164 Ind. 21, 72 N. E. 879, being the latest of the cited Indiana cases, is illustrative of the real state of the authorities on the question now under consideration: "Objection is made by the appellants that the acts alleged, if done at all, were performed severally and independently by them, and hence there can be no joint liability therefor. It is probably true that an action at law for the recovery of money damages, as distinguished from a suit in equity, cannot be maintained jointly against various tort feors among whom there is no concert or unity of action and no common design, but whose independent acts unite in their consequence to produce the damage in question. Miller v. Highland Ditch Co. 87 Cal. 430, 22 Am. St. Rep. 254, 25 Pac. 550; Lockwood Co. v. Lawrence, 77 Me. 297, 52 Am. Rep. 763; Sloggy v. Dilworth, 38 Minn. 179, 8 Am. St. Rep. 656, 36 N. W. 451; Martinowsky v. Hannibal, 35 Mo. App. 70; Chipman v. Palmer, 77 N. Y. 51, 33 Am. Rep. 566; Blaisdell v. Stephens, 14 Nev. 17, 33 Am. Rep. 523, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 599; Long v. Swindell, 77 N. C. 176; Little Schuykill Nav. R. & Coal Co. v. Richards, 57 Pa. 142, 98 Am. Dec. 209; Draper v. Brown (1902) 115 Wis. 361, 91 N. W. 1001; Débris Case (C. C.) 16 Fed. 25. And see Sellick v. Hall, 47 Conn. 260. A distinction, however, is recognized between such acts which are wrongful only because injurious to individual rights, and those which combine and constitute a public nuisance. Simmons v. Everson, 124 N. Y. 319, 21 Am. St. Rep. 676, 26 N. E. 911; Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 Am. Rep. 603; Valparaiso v. Moffitt, 12 Ind. App. 250, 255, 54 Am. St. Rep. 522, 39 N. E. 909. In the former class of cases, each separate wrongdoer is chargeable with his own acts alone, in the absence of a joint purpose among the participants; in the latter, each may be answerable in a joint and several action, not 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) only for what he himself does, but likewise for the acts of those who, with him, violate public, as well as private, rights."

More confusion has been put into this question by passing dictum of the courts in cases where the question was not directly involved, than by actual conflict of decision. The text-books, too, have been responsible for some inaccuracies of statement, and have been criticized by the courts in some adjudicated cases already cited. It is to be noticed that the Indiana court cites no authorities in support of the doctrine which it announces, except its own previous holdings and the two New York cases referred to.

The supreme court of Ohio, in the recent case of Mansfield v. Bristol, 76 Chio St. 270, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 806, 118 Am. St. Rep. 852, 81 N. E. 631, 10 Ann. Cas. 767, commenting upon this case, said: "The distinction suggested in West Muncie Strawboard Co. v. Slack, 164 Ind. 21, 72 N. E. 879, has no foundation in precedent, and is not believed to be maintainable on principle. The distinction assumes that several torts have been committed, but holds the perpetrator of one liable for the damage from all, on the sole ground that his act is a public wrong."

Some stress is laid by appellant upon the Slater Case, 64 N. Y. 138, to which we have already referred. That case bears some analogy to the case at bar, and is properly urged upon us by the appellant. Nevertheless the opinion in that case was written by the same judge who wrote the opinion in the later case of Chipman v. Palmer, 77 N. Y. 51, 33 Am. Rep. 566, from which we have already quoted. It will appear from the latter case that the New York court refused to construe the Slater Case as authority to the proposition to which it is now urged by appellant. At this point, the appellant is in the position of relying upon New York precedents to establish, by analogy, a proposition which runs counter to the pronouncement of that court in the Chipman Case.

Appellant's brief contains a suggestion that there is a distinction between pollution cases and those cases which involve the obstruction of streams. This suggestion was accompanied by the concession in oral argument that practically all the pollution cases were against the theory of joint liability in the absence of concerted action. No authority is cited to us, wherein any distinction has ever been recognized between the nature of the liability for polluting a stream and that for obstructing it. We have already quoted herein from our own cases, wherein it is distinctly stated that there is no distinction in such cases; and such seems to be the holding, either expressly or by impli-eration, in all the cases which have been cited for our attention. In this respect, the Indiana cases are in harmony with our own. The first two cases cited from the Indiana court, supra, were both decided at the same term; the opinions therein being written by the same judge. The first was an action for damages resulting from a washout, and the second was an action for damages for polluting a stream by sewage. That court applied to both cases the same rule of joint liability. The ground of the holding in the Indiana cases was not that there was any distinction between polluting a stream and obstructing it; it was that the act complained of was a public nuisance, and that such fact alone rendered all persons contributing thereto jointly liable for all damages, regardless of whether they were joint tortfeasors or not. This is the doctrine upon which the Indiana court seems to stand alone up to this point. This doctrine would overrule practically all the holdings of other courts in the pollution cases. Practically all such cases involved public nuisances. We agree with the Ohio court that the doctrine thus announced is not tenable. (It may be noted here parenthetically that the Indiana court had adopted a rule counter to that obtaining in this state as to damages done by trespassing animals. In this state it is the rule that the separate owners of trespassing cattle are not jointly liable for the damages done by all. Cogswell v. Murphy, 46 Iowa, 44. In Indiana the contrary rule prevails. Brady v. Ball, 14 Ind. 317.)

In a recent English case (Sadler v. Great Western R. Co. [1895] 2 Q. B. 688), a question was involved which bears some analogy to the question before us. The plaintiff was a dealer in cycles, and had a place of business between the separate offices of two railroad companies. He brought an action against both companies, alleging a joint liability against them for obstructing the highway in front of his office, in that each company caused carts to stand upon the highway for an unreasonable length of time, and that by their combined acts they prevented access to the plaintiff's shop. We quote as follows from the opinion of the court: "He is trying to sue as codefendants two independent, separate alleged tortfeasors, neither of whom has any control or power over the acts of the other tortfeasor. He is trying to sue them jointly in one action. . . . In my opinion, these two torts, if they are torts, are independent torts by the different companies, although, as I have already stated, the acts of each company can be taken into account in considering the acts of one company and deciding whether they amount to a nuisance or not. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The acts of the other company must be taken into account, because it may be that the one company ought not to be doing what it was when the other company was doing what it did. But that does not make these two causes of action a joint cause of action, or give any right to join one company with the other in one action."

We quote from Pollock on Torts, 2d ed. p. 406, as follows: "A cause of action for nuisance may be created by independent acts of different persons, though the acts of one only of those persons would not amount to a nuisance. Suppose one person leaves a wheelbarrow standing on a way; that may cause no appreciable inconvenience; but, if one hundred do so, that may cause a serious inconvenience, which a person entitled to the use of the way has a right to prevent; and it is no defense to any one person among the one hundred to say that what he does causes of itself no damage to the complainant. But this does not mean that a plaintiff may make two or more independent wrongdoers codefendants in a single action for damages, whatever may be the rule where only an injunction is claimed."

The case of Day v. Louisville Coal & Coke Co. 60 W. Va. 27, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, 53 S. E. 776, being the West Virginia case to which we have already referred, was one wherein a hydraulic mining company cast into a stream the débris or tailings from its mill, and such débris was cast upon plaintiff's land further down the stream. A similar course was followed by other mining companies at different points of the stream. There was no claim of concert of action. The defendant was held liable for all the damages as a joint tortfeasor. This case stands alone on this particular question, and is contrary to the holding in other states. The authorities cited in the opinion consist principally of general statements quoted from the text books and encyclopedias. To our minds, the reasoning of the learned court in that opinion is not persuasive, nor do the authorities cited therein justify the conclusion reached. The text-book quotations therein simply consist of a statement of the general rule concerning liability for concurring negligence, to which general rule we have already adverted herein.

We think that it must be said, therefore, that the greater weight of the authorities is against the appellants in the case at bar. The question involved is one upon which it is difficult to formulate a general rule which shall govern all cases. None of the courts have attempted to formulate such general rule, as far as we can discover. (Perhaps it can safely be said that, where the nuisance which is contributed to by independent wrongdoers is such that such contribution will tend to increase the extent or magnitude of the injury naturally resulting therefrom, then the liability of the independent contributor should be deemed several, and not joint, and each wrongdoer should be held to pay such proportionate part of the damages as was caused by his own contribution.)

The rule of joint liability has been contended for in some cases, on the ground that it would be impossible for plaintiff to prove the precise damage caused by each separate contributor to his injury, and that the rule of several liability would therefore result in a denial of justice to plaintiff. On the other hand, such rule of joint liability has been resisted on the ground that it makes it possible for a plaintiff to overwhelm a defendant with a claim for damages out of all proportion to his wrongdoing; and that, even though such defendant may have contributed only slightly to the nuisance, he might be held liable for the greater wrongs committed by others, over which he had no control. In those jurisdictions where the rule of several liability in such cases is adhered to, the rule of measure of damages is tempered to the circumstances. The plaintiff is not required to prove the precise damage inflicted upon him by the single defendant. He may prove the proportionate extent to which the defendant contributed to his injury, and the jury may award such proportion of the damage as is commensurate with the defendant's contribution thereto. This results in practical justice, both to the plaintiff and to the defendant; whereas the other rule may be highly penal in its result; and the most innocent of the wrongdoers may, at the mere will of the plaintiff, be held for all of the damage, without right of contribution against the principal perpetrators of the injury. The foregoing disposes of the principal and most persuasive points in appellant's argument. Other points are made which do not seem to us well taken.

It is our conclusion that the ruling of the lower court was right, and it is accordingly affirmed.

Weaver, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the conclusion above announced and from the argument by which it is supported. In my judgment, there is a marked distinction to be observed between rights of action which involve the conflicting rights and interests of riparian owners, and rights of action by a nonriparian owner against those who interfere with the natural flow of the stream, and, by union of the forces thus wrongfully set in motion, inflict injury upon nonriparian property. Moreover, as a matter of general principle, parties who obstruct the stream should be held to intend the natural consequences of their acts, and if A obstructs it at one place, B at another, and C at still another, each knowing, as he is bound to know, that the united effect of their several acts will work to the material injury of property exposed to overflow, it is certainly a somewhat surprising illustration of the inefficiency of the law if there be no union of liability on the part of the wrongdoers, and he whose property is thus flooded must assume the burden of showing what particular fraction of his loss is traceable to each obstruction, even though, but for the existence of all, no damage would have been done. In so holding, it seems to me we are sacrificing substantial right to empty forms.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Evans, J., on March 14, 1912, handed down the following additional opinion (— Iowa, —, 134 N. W. 1064):

Plaintiff urges upon our attention paragraph 29 of the petition, and contends that a joint liability is charged therein as against the two defendants, Simmons Warehouse Company and the city of Sioux City. Such paragraph is as follows: "(29) That the said iron bridge at the junction of Fourth and West Third streets across Perry creek, and the apron and conduit aforesaid, were constructed under the supervision and co-operation of the defendant Simmons Warehouse Company, and the defendant city of Sioux City, and has been so maintained and kept to the present time."

At the original submission of the case, it did not appear from the printed record before us that this paragraph was involved in the appeal. All the parties have now stipulated that this omission was an inadvertence, and they join in a proposed correction and ask that the appellant's exception at this point be considered. We think that this paragraph does in terms charge somewhat imperfectly a joint liability against the two defendants. The difficulty with appellant's position, however, is that this alleged joint cause of action is improperly joined with other alleged causes of action against the same defendants, which are not joint, but several. For instance, paragraph 26 charges a several liability against the city of Sioux City for the construction of various bridges at different points on the stream. Other allegations charge a several liability against the defendant Simmons Warehouse Company.

If a plaintiff chooses to declare upon a cause of action upon which a defendant is only severally liable, he cannot join another defendant by merely alleging a further joint cause of action against both such defendants. He must reduce his allegations either to a cause or causes of action against one defendant, or else to a wholly joint cause of action against both. If the plaintiff herein chooses to confine his petition against the Simmons Warehouse Company and the city of Sioux City to an alleged cause of action wholly joint, and to eliminate therefrom all allegations upon which only several liability can be predicated, there is nothing in our holding to forbid such course.

The petition for rehearing is accordingly overruled.

MOREY ENGINEERING & CONSTRUCTION COMPANY, Resp't.,

v.

ST. LOUIS ARTIFICIAL ICE RINK COMPANY et al., Appts.

(— Mo. —, 146 S. W. 1142.)

Tax — special assessment — priority.

1. In the absence of statutory directions to the contrary, special assessments for street improvement have priority over existing encumbrances on the property.

Same — statutory priority.

2. Under a statute making tax bills for special improvements a lien on the property charged therewith, and permitting them to be collected of the owner of the land, and providing that the owner or any other person having an interest in the property may pay the tax within a specified time without interest, the lien takes priority over existing encumbrances upon the property.

Ferriss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis by the contractor to whom the city of St. Louis issued a special tax bill, for the improvement of Cook avenue, for the sum of $721.31 against a lot of ground on said Cook avenue, charged with said special tax bill. The defendants (appellants here) are the St. Louis Artificial Ice Rink Company, owner of the equity of redemption in said lot, and the owners and holders of certain notes secured by two deeds of trust upon the said lot, together with their trustees. The first deed of trust was dated November 1, 1898, and recorded on the 5th day of November, 1898, securing the payment of $15,000, with interest; and the second deed of trust was for $2,060, executed on the 14th day of July, 1900, and duly recorded on the same date. The ordinance for the improvement of Cook avenue, for which the tax bill in question was issued, was approved April 7, 1902, and the tax bill was issued May 7, 1903. Judgment below was for plaintiff.

The record presents a single question: Under the charter of the city of St. Louis, has the lien of a special tax bill, issued for street improvements, priority over a deed of trust which antedates the tax bill?

Defendants contend that tax liens, whether general or special, have no priority over earlier encumbrances, unless such priority is accorded by statute; and that this is certainly true as to special tax assessments for street improvements, which, it is claimed, are essentially different from general taxes. Defendants contend, further, that the charter under which the tax bill in controversy was issued does not give priority to the lien for the special tax; and that it is therefore inferior to the lien of their deeds of trust, which are earlier in point of time. On the other hand, respondent contends that in this state both general and special tax liens have priority, (a) in the absence of statutory direction to the contrary, and (b) such priority of the special tax lien is fairly inferable from the language of the statute (charter) creating the lien. We will discuss these propositions in order.

First, as to general taxes. From an early date, this state has maintained the policy of impressing upon real property a lien 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

for the taxes assessed thereon. In 1815 the territorial laws provided that the taxes on confirmed lands should be a perpetual lien. Territorial Laws, 1814-15, p. 59. In 1820, a perpetual lien was declared by statute upon all lands for the taxes thereon. Laws 1820, p. 97. To the same effect in 1835, Rev. Stat. 1835, p. 541. The revisions of 1845-55-65 contain no such express provision; but the revenue acts from 1835 to 1872 have been construed to recognize and reserve this lien of the state. The general revenue law enacted in March, 1872, reintroduced the express provision reserving to the state a lien upon real property for the taxes thereon. Wagner's Statutes 1872, p. 1170, § 60. From its earliest decisions on the question, this court has uniformly ruled that real estate taxes are a lien upon the property against which they are assessed; and, further, when the question has arisen, that they are prior to all other liens. In May, 1877, our legislature enacted a statute (now § 11,499, Rev. Stat. 1909) making the judgment for such taxes a first lien. The decisions, however, presently to be referred to, were upon taxes levied prior to the enactment of this statute, upon which they in no wise depend, and to which no reference is made in the cases.

In 1864, in the case of Blossom v. Van Court, 34 Mo. 390, 86 Am. Dec. 114, the taxes were said to be an encumbrance on the land, and covered by the covenant contained in the words "grant, bargain, and sell." McLaren v. Sheble, 45 Mo. 130, is to the same effect, and speaks of the "lien of the tax imposed by virtue of the assessment." Both cases hold that the lien of the tax takes effect from the initial point of the assessment, and by virtue of the assessment. We come next to the case of Stafford v. Fizer, 82 Mo. 393. As this case is discussed fully pro and con by appellants and respondent, we will examine it at length. This was an action in ejectment. James A. Clark, the common source of title, executed a deed of trust in 1863. In 1878 suit was filed by the state for the taxes for the years 1868 to 1878, inclusive. Sale under judgment for taxes and execution thereon October 30, 1878, to plaintiff. There was a sale under the trust deed in April, 1879, to the defendants. This suit filed in 1880. In the tax proceeding, Clark, the trustee, and one of the beneficiaries in the trust deed, were made defendants. One other beneficiary was not made a defendant. It was contended by the plaintiff that the tax sale gave a complete title as against both beneficiaries in the trust deed. The court states the question presented for adjudication thus: "Whether the deed of a purchaser at execution sale under a proceeding to enforce the state's lien for taxes is good against the beneficiary of a deed of trust, antedating the origin of the tax lien, who has not been made a party to the proceedings."

After stating, further, that the question was new in this court, the opinion proceeds: "But the principles of law, as well as the decisions of this court governing the enforcement of liens on real estate, ought to furnish a sufficient guide for us in determining it. It will be observed that we are dealing with two liens,—one created by law in favor of the state, which necessarily takes precedence of other prior as well as subsequent liens, on account of its peculiar character (Rev. Stat. 1879, §§ 6831, 6832; Blossom v. Van Court and McLaren v. Sheble, supra; Dunlap v. Gallatin County, 15 Ill. 7; Almy v. Hunt, 48 Ill. 45; Binkert v. Wabash R. Co. 98 Ill. 205); the other, in favor of creditors, created by the act of the debtor. These two liens have been foreclosed, and the purchasers stand opposed to each other with deeds under the proceedings respectively employed for enforcing them. The lien of the state is the superior one, although subsequent in time, a superiority invariably accorded to it, in absence of some legislative declaration to the contrary. (Cadmus v. Jackson, 52 Pa. 295; Doane v. Chittenden, 25 Ga. 103; Hopper v. Malleson, 16 N. J. Eq. 382; Cooper v. Corbin, 105 Ill. 224. No system of jurisprudence would command respect which failed to maintain and enforce the benefits of this priority by all necessary and reasonable proceedings to that end."

The holding of the court is that a beneficiary in a prior deed of trust, who is not a party to the tax suit, has still the right to redeem as a junior lienor by proper action in that regard. Speaking of the revenue law which required the collector to bring suit against the owner of the property, the court says: "I do not see how to escape the conclusion that a cestui que trust in a deed of trust is an owner, within the meaning of this act, if his interests are to be affected by the proceeding authorized." It was concluded in that case that, inasmuch as the right to redeem was not asserted, and as it was apparent that plaintiff had the superior title, she should recover.

It is suggested that what the court says in the first above extract from the opinion as to the priority of the lien, and upon the general rule of priority, is obiter. We think not. The plaintiff's right to recover depended upon the priority of the tax lien. It is further suggested that the cases cited in the opinion do not support the text. In this we think counsel errs. It must be 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) remembered that when the taxes involved in the case were assessed there was no statute making a judgment for taxes a first lien. Indeed, there was no express declaration in the statutes that the taxes were a lien. The court cites the Blossom and McLaren Cases, above referred to, which declare that such taxes were a lien; and that such lien was impressed by virtue of the assessment.

The next citation is Dunlap v. Gallatin County, 15 Ill. 7, which says: "A tax is not an ordinary debt. It is levied for the support of the government, and takes precedence of all other demands against the owner. It is a charge upon the property, without reference to the matter of ownership. The property itself may be seized and sold, although there may be prior liens or encumbrances upon it."

The next cited case, Almy v. Hunt, 48 Ill. 45, involved the question of liability for taxes as between seller and buyer. It was held that the lien attaches when the assessment is made; and that the property itself is liable therefor.

Binkert v. Wabash R. Co. 98 Ill. 205, the next cited case, holds that the tax suit is "a direct proceeding against the land itself, by which judgment may be had against it as if it were a person," and points out the distinction between real and personal taxes; the latter not authorizing a direct proceeding against personal property.

The cases of Cadmus v. Jackson, Doane v. Chittenden, and Hopper v. Malleson, cited in the opinion, hold the tax liens involved in these cases inferior to prior liens; but this upon the ground that they are made so by statute. In the Hopper (N. J.) Case, the ruling that the lien of the tax is inferior to that of the prior encumbrance is put upon the ground that the statute makes the tax on real estate a personal demand against the owner, to satisfy which his goods may be sold or his body arrested; and, further, that the mortgagee is taxed for his interest, and the mortgagor taxed separately for the value of his equity. The opinion says: "If the tax for the whole value of the land were assessed upon the land as an entire thing against the mortgagor or party in possession, there would seem to be more propriety in subjecting the entire estate, including both the interest of the mortgagee and mortgagor, to the operation of the tax sale."

The last case cited in the Stafford Case (Cooper v. Corbin, 105 Ill. 224) holds taxes on personality an inferior lien, but that taxes on real estate "become a charge upon the land itself, and if they are not paid the land may be sold for the taxes thereon, and the title will pass, regardless of any encumbrance resting on the land. Taxes on personal property rest on a different principle,—they are not a charge on any specific property.”

The foregoing cases sustain the proposition laid down in the Stafford Case, namely, that real estate taxes are accorded a prior lien by virtue of their peculiar character, unless there is a legislative declaration to the contrary. The Stafford Case has not been criticized, but has often been approved in our later decisions. It is followed in Gitchell v. Kreidler, 84 Mo. 472, which gives priority to the lien for the taxes of 1877 (assessed August 1, 1876), but holds, as the Stafford Case did, that the beneficiary in the prior deed of trust, not being a party to the suit, did not lose his right to redeem. The case holds that all parties in interest must be made defendants, in order to bind their interests. Construing the statutory requirement that suit shall be brought against the owner, the court says the word “owner” has no precise legal signification, and may be applied to any well-defined interest in the estate; and, further: “The lien of the state thus enforced is the superior. The mortgagee certainly had the right to pay off the taxes, and under the former method of making tax sales could have redeemed within the time prescribed by the law. He has not been made a party to the tax suit, and his rights in that respect have not been foreclosed.”

Williams v. Hudson, 93 Mo. 524, 6 S. W. 261, involved similar questions regarding the taxes for 1869 to 1879, and followed the above cases. In the course of the opinion, the court says, “Tax liens, whether prior in point of time or not, are superior to the lien of the deed of trust.” To the same effect is Allen v. McCabe, 93 Mo. 138, 6 S. W. 62, involving taxes for 1876, 1877, and 1878, wherein the court says: “It must be remembered that, although the statute makes it necessary that the owner of the property should be made a party, and this is necessary to call into activity the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter; yet, when this is done, the proceeding is in rem against the property to enforce the lien of the state on that property, subordinate to which the owner holds his title; the judgment is in rem. The execution goes against, and the sheriff sells, the property and not the interest of any particular person in it.”

In Neenan v. St. Joseph, 126 Mo. 96, 28 S. W. 963, the contest was between owners of the fee, and did not involve encumbrances. The court, however, uses this significant language: “The policy of the revenue law is to charge the land and every interest therein with the delinquent taxes, and not to look to the owners personally for its payment.”

This doctrine is quoted with approval by Graves, J., in Walker v. Mills, 210 Mo. loc. cit. 694, 109 S. W. 44, a case involving both owner of the equity and the encumbrancers. In Meriwether v. Overly, 228 Mo. 218, 129 S. W. 1, the decree ordered the successful plaintiff, in an action to quiet title, to refund to the defendant taxes paid by the latter, on the theory that same were a burden upon the land. The court says: “A tax against real estate is a tax against the property, and not against the owner. If the taxes have been legally assessed, they became a lien on the property prior to all other liens.”

It will be perceived from the foregoing review of the cases that, under all the varying revenue laws of the state, this court has held that real estate taxes constitute ex proprio vigore a prior lien against the property on which they are assessed, not depending upon any express declaration of the statute to that effect, and not depending, as it is now claimed they do, upon the provision in the statute first enacted in April, 1877 (Acts 1877, p. 387), which gives the judgment for taxes a first lien. The foregoing cases further establish the proposition that the word “owner,” in a statute which provides that suits for delinquent taxes shall be brought against the owner of the land, includes the holders of encumbrances on the land.

Our conclusion on this point rests as well upon sound reason. It is uniformly recognized that the claim of the state for the taxes necessary for its support is superior to demands created by private contract. In Minnesota v. Central Trust Co. 36 C. C. A. 214, 94 Fed. 244, Judge Thayer discusses this subject fully upon authority and reason. He cites numerous cases to sustain the proposition, which he enunciates thus: “It has been held frequently that a tax lawfully imposed by the state on its citizens is not an ordinary debt, but is an obligation which, by its very nature, should be regarded as paramount to all other demands against the taxpayer, although the law imposing the tax does not in express terms declare such priority.” And then he says: “These decisions also express a thought which is generally prevalent in the public mind, that taxes levied by the state for its own support are founded upon a higher obligation than other demands. The fact has also been recognized from time immemorial that every sovereignty ought to be armed with the requisite power to enforce the collection of taxes without fail, and to compel the prompt payment of whatever imposts it sees fit to levy for its own support. In view of that neces-city, it has been a common practice to provide summary remedies for enforcing such demands, which have been upheld by the courts whenever assailed, although it is quite probable that some of the remedies so provided could not have been sustained as affording due process of law, if the proceedings had related to the collection of purely private debts." This thought is in line with what is said by the supreme court of Illinois in Dennis v. Maynard, 15 Ill. 477: "All the principles applicable to the prerogative priority of the Crown in this respect equally apply to public dues for taxes."

It is said that, even if the foregoing views as to general taxes are correct, they cannot be made to apply to special taxes or assessments for improvements of the character in question in this case. The question, then, is whether the principles enunciated above apply to special as well as general taxes. Both are created by the sovereign power of the state. The distinction between them has been often discussed on our former opinions. Some of these opinions say that, while created by the taxing power of the state, they are not taxes. Morrison v. Morey, 146 Mo. 564, 48 S. W. 629; Independence v. Gates, 110 Mo. 374, 19 S. W. 728. These cases, however, have in mind the general taxes referred to in certain constitutional limitations, which limitations, however, do not refer to these special taxes for local improvements. Speaking in the above case of Independence v. Gates of the power to levy local assessments, we say: "It is settled in Missouri, and generally elsewhere, that it is referable to the taxing power, though such assessments are not taxes in the sense that word is usually employed." Again, in Meier v. St. Louis, 180 Mo. 408, 79 S. W. 957: "It is now settled law in this court that special assessments for local improvements are referable to the taxing power."

In Heman Constr. Co. v. Wabash R. Co. 206 Mo. loc. cit. 177, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 112, 121 Am. St. Rep. 649, 104 S. W. 68, 12 Ann. Cas. 630, we say: "While a distinction is made between local assessments and taxes levied for general revenue purposes, in that an assessment for a local improvement is not a tax, within the meaning of the constitutional provision regarding uniformity of taxation, it is in a sense a tax, not, however, for the purpose of sustaining the government, but imposed upon individual property upon the theory that such property receives a special benefit different from the general one which the owner enjoys in common with others; in other words, an assessment for benefits."

As long ago as Garrett v. St. Louis, 25 Mo. 505, 69 Am. Dec. 475, this court said: "That this assessment upon the lot owners fronting on the street is an exercise of the taxing power seems too plain to admit of argument."

This special tax is assessed because of special benefit to property, and yet there is also a public benefit. Indeed, it is this public benefit that justifies the exercise of the state's sovereign power. As said by Woodson, J., in St. Louis v. G. W. Wright Contracting Co. 202 Mo. loc. cit. 463, 119 Am. St. Rep. 810, 101 S. W. 8: "The tax is imposed for public purposes in the payment of street improvements, and not for private use. As an incident only to the public improvement, the adjoining property is benefited, and because of that benefit the tax is assessed against the property, and not against its owner."

So we are dealing with a tax, not a general tax to support the government, but a special tax imposed by the same general power, and for the same general purpose,—the public good. General taxes are exacted for the public good. True it is quite common to speak of them as being levied for the support of the government. This, however, is a too narrow limitation. Taxes are used for the public good in many ways other than government support; as, for instance, public improvements and schools. Government exists for the public good; and it is for the public good that streets are improved and sewers constructed. The state could not compel a man to improve a street in front of his lot for the sole purpose of benefiting his lot. There is in such improvement a special benefit to the abutting lot. Therefore the tax for such improvement may be greater upon that lot than it is upon the general property in the city; and hence we speak of this special tax as a benefit assessment. The abutting property is not taxed for the entire cost of the improvement. Section 18, art. 6, of the St. Louis Charter, provides: "The cost of construction of all the foregoing improvements within the city shall be apportioned as follows: The grading of new streets, alleys, and the making of cross walks, and the repairs of all streets and highways and cleaning of the same, and of all alleys and cross walks, shall be paid out of the general revenue of the city; and the paving, curbing, guttering, sidewalks, and the materials for the roadways, the repairs of all alleys and sidewalks, shall be charged upon the adjoining property as a special tax, and collected and paid as hereinafter provided."

Here we have both general and special taxes levied by the same power, and both used for the same purpose; namely, making and maintaining a public street. There is no essential difference between them, so far as concerns the questions under discuss...

These special taxes are, by § 18, above set out, charged upon the property,—not against the owner. By § 25, art. 6, of the charter, the tax bill is a lien upon the property charged, to be enforced by suit against the "owner of the land."

We have ruled above that, as to general taxes, a similar provision gives the lien priority over earlier encumbrances. We have also ruled that, as to general taxes, the word "owner," in a similar provision for suit against the owner of the land, must be construed to include encumbrances. On principle, it would seem that the same ruling should be applied to these special taxes. The exigencies of government are as great as to the necessity for the tax and for its prompt and certain collection. The application of the rule of priority bears less hardly on the encumbrancer. The general tax benefits the property taxed, but remotely and indirectly. The special tax is of direct benefit to the property, enhancing its value in proportion to the tax, and benefits the encumbrancer by adding to the value of his security. On this point, the supreme court of Minnesota, in Morey v. Duluth, 75 Minn. 221, 77 N. W. 829, says: "The improvement is for the benefit of all interests in the land, for that of the lien holder as well as that of the fee owner, and necessarily the lien of the assessment for the improvement must be coextensive with the estate benefited and assessed." And further: "It is apparent, however, from the provisions of the charter that the word 'owner' is not used therein in a strict sense, but that it means persons interested in the land, which includes mortgagees."

We have decided that a judgment for special taxes must be and can only be one enforcing the lien against the particular property. In Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. St. Joseph, 183 Mo. 451, 82 S. W. 64, we say: "Proceedings to enforce special tax bills are in the nature of proceedings in rem, and compulsory payment of the judgment can only be made by a sale of the assessed property."

The law governing the tax in this case is found in the charter of the city of St. Louis, which provides: "Said tax bills shall be and become a lien on the property charged therewith, and may be collected of the owner of the land and in the name of and by the contractor as any other claim in any court of competent jurisdiction." Section 25, art. 6.

Construed in the light of the case last cited, this means that the tax is a lien on the property, to be enforced by a proceeding in rem against the property. And, as ruled above, the word "owner" includes encumbrancers. So far as concerns the method of procedure provided in the charter,—namely, to sue as upon any other claim in any court of competent jurisdiction,—this must mean such suit "as is adapted to the enforcement of the lien." Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. St. Joseph, supra. That this tax is given priority inferentially by the charter is shown by the further provision in said § 25: "That the owner or any other person having an interest in the property charged with the tax bill may pay the same in full at any time within thirty days after notice of the tax bill, without interest."

The clause "any other person having an interest in the property" certainly includes encumbrancers. This provision is meaningless, without it is designed to enable encumbrancers to protect their interests by paying, without penalty, taxes to which their interests are subordinate. If their interests are not liable for the tax, why should they be referred to in connection with its payment?

The charter contains no provision making either the tax itself or the judgment a first lien; and yet we have seen that, without anything more in the general law than is found in the charter provision, general taxes have been held by this court to constitute a first lien.

These views are sustained by the case of Keating v. Craig, 73 Mo. 507. That case involved a special tax bill, issued under the charter of Kansas City, § 3 of article 9 of which provides that in suits to enforce the lien of a special tax bill all or any of the owners of the land charged, or of any interest or estate therein, may be made defendants, and that a judgment in such suit shall bind all the right, title, interest, and estate in the land the defendants and each of them owned at the time the lien of the tax bill commenced, or acquired thereafter; and, further, that parties interested in the land, not made defendants, shall not be affected thereby; and, if they claim through or under any parties defendant prior to suit brought, they may redeem from the purchaser. It was held in the Keating Case that the tax lien was prior to an earlier deed of trust. It is true that reference is made in the opinion to the foregoing charter provisions as indicating the intention of the framers to give it priority; but, under the law as we have construed it in this opinion, and in the light of the former rulings of this court, cited herein, this provision of the Kansas City charter is simply declaratory of the law, and is no more indicative of the intent of the lawmakers than is the provision in the St. Louis charter allowing parties owning interests in the property to pay the tax without penalty. The Keating Case says: "The lien of the special tax bill, like the lien for general taxes, is superior to any encumbrance with which the owner may charge his land." The opinion adds: "This is the evident meaning of that portion of § 3, above referred to, which declares the effect of a judgment on a special tax bill."

No doubt, § 3 does mean that, and no doubt, under our decisions, the meaning of the law would be the same without § 3. Such evidently was the construction put upon the Keating Case by Norton, J., in his dissenting opinion in the case of State v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. loc. cit. 220. (In this there was no conflict with the majority opinion.) He quotes the above statement of the law from the Keating Case in a discussion upon general taxes, and without any reference to the charter provision. In our judgment, there is as much warrant in the St. Louis charter for the rule declared in the Keating Case as can be found in the Kansas City charter. That rule we approve.

It is urged by respondent that we should consider the exigencies of the case; that it is essential to the proper improvement of the city streets and sewers that special tax bills shall be first liens, in order to insure their prompt and certain collection; further, that we should consider the fact that under the charter adopted in 1876 special tax bills have been always enforced as first liens, without question of their priority until now. The appellants object that such considerations ought not affect our conclusions as to the law. We appreciate the force of this objection; and yet in construing the charter, in order to arrive at the intent of the framers, it is proper to consider the objects which they sought to accomplish, and the practical situation they were attempting to provide for. It was doubtless obvious to them that, unless tax bills became first liens on property, the improvement of the city would be seriously hampered. It is also proper to consider that, while the fact that a certain construction of the law has been usually recognized by the city authorities, the bar, and the people at large, does not establish its validity, still such fact is not without some persuasive force in favor of such construction.

This case has been ably and exhaustively briefed and argued on both sides. Counsel have cited the decisions in other jurisdictions on the question involved, both as to general and special taxes. We have examined the cases in detail. To discuss them would extend this opinion to unreasonable length. The cases will be found in the digest of the briefs. They hold diverse views; but, in our judgment, the weight of authority as found in the decided cases supports the views herein expressed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Brown, Woodson, and Graves, JJ., concur.

Kennish, J., dissents in opinion filed, in which Valliant, Ch. J., and Lamm, J., concur.

Kennish, J., dissenting:

The principles of law announced in the foregoing opinion, and upon which the case is decided, are so at variance with the conclusions arrived at by the writer after a thorough examination of the subject, as to require that I give expression to my views.

There is but one question in the case, and that is, as stated in the opinion: "Under the charter of the city of St. Louis, has the lien of a special tax bill, issued for street improvements, priority over a deed of trust which antedates the bill?" Notwithstanding the singleness of the issue thus in judgment, the majority opinion, in deciding the case, states and affirms the following proposition: "In this state, both general and special tax liens have priority, (a) in the absence of statutory direction to the contrary, and (b) such priority of the special tax lien is fairly inferable from the language of the statute (charter) creating the lien." In this case, the litigants are private persons, one claiming under a trust deed taken as security for a loan when the property was clear and unencumbered, and the other claiming under a special tax bill for street improvements subsequently made. Neither the state nor any subdivision thereof is seeking to enforce a lien for general taxes levied for the support of the government, nor is even a party to the proceeding. It follows that no question as to the lien for general taxes is before us, and any pronouncement as to the law applicable thereto cannot be authoritatively decided in this case. The two kinds of taxes, general and special, differ in many respects; and, as there is an abundance of authority upon the one question in this case—priority as between the special tax and the prior encumbrance—it is difficult to understand wherein the issue to be decided is simplified by combining it with a proposition as to taxes not in any wise involved in this suit.

As to the two propositions "a" and "b," above referred to, it should be stated at the outset that if the special tax lien has priority, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, that ends the controversy; for it is not pretended that such a statute exists under the facts of this case. If that contention is sound law, it is unnecessary, as it is inconsistent, to invoke the doctrine that such priority is fairly inferable from the provisions of the charter. On the other hand, if the priority of the special tax lien is fairly to be inferred from the charter, no issue of law remains, because appellants concede that if such priority is expressed in the charter, or can be deduced therefrom by fair inference, then the lien of the special tax must prevail. The questions before us, therefore, are two: (1) Is the special tax bill a superior lien over a pre-existing encumbrance, in the absence of statutory direction to the contrary, and, if not, (2) does the charter fairly imply an intent to give such priority? I say fairly imply such intent, because there is no claim that it does so expressly.

Taking up these two propositions in their order, it should be observed that the first stated is not a question of first impression, to be reasoned out without the aid of adjudications and of those writers who have made a specialty of this branch of the law. Although there is an abundance of such authority in the books, as will be shown presently, it is noticeable that not a single textbook or writer upon the subject is cited (or can be cited) in support of the opinion of the court herein. The following excerpts will show the views of the great jurists who have written upon the subject:

"The general rule is that taxes are not a lien, unless expressly made so; and when liens are expressly created they are not to be enlarged by construction. . . . Not only is it competent for the state to charge land with a lien for the taxes imposed thereupon, but the legislature may, if it shall deem it proper or necessary to do so, make the lien a first claim on the property, with precedence of all other claims and liens whatsoever, whether created by judgment, mortgage, execution, or otherwise, and whether arising before or after the execution of the tax. When that is done, the lien does not stand on the same footing with an ordinary encumbrance, but attaches itself to the res, without regard to individual ownership, and, if enforced by sale of the land, the purchaser will take a valid and unimpeachable title." 2 Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. pp. 865, 866.

"The provisions of the statute determine the question of the priority between the lien of an assessment and other liens upon realty, if both liens are created after the enactment of such statute. . . . If it is so provided by statute, the lien of an assessment may have priority over a lien which is earlier in point of time; such as a mortgage lien. In some cases, the right of a mortgagee as against an assessment lien has been discussed, but not decided. A statute may 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

make the lien of an assessment superior to the liens of existing encumbrances, since all property owners hold in subordination to the taxing power. In the absence of a statute giving an assessment priority over an earlier mortgage lien, an assessment has no such priority." 2 Page & J. Taxation by Assessments, § 1068.

"A lien for public taxes and assessments is upon the property, and is paramount to all liens acquired by personal contract, when so provided by statute. . . . Although the lien of a prior recorded mortgage is superior to that of a special assessment, it is within the power of the legislature to change the rule, and make the mortgage lien secondary to that of the assessment." Hamilton, Special Assessments, § 708.

"There is no common-law rule which makes a levy and assessment of taxes eo proprio vigore a lien on the property of the taxpayer. Such liens owe their existence wholly to statute; and their duration, limitation, and priorities, together with the property to which they attach, must be determined by the statutes creating them." 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 735.

"Taxes and assessments levied upon land which is already subject to a mortgage do not displace or outrank the lien of the mortgage, in the absence of an express legislative declaration that they shall constitute a paramount lien." 27 Cyc. 1176.

"It is, for these reasons, often proper to deduce from the general language of the statute giving a lien the conclusion that it gives a paramount lien to which mortgage estates or judgment liens must yield. But this conclusion cannot, perhaps, be inferred where no provision is made for giving those who hold such interests a hearing, and where there are no words declaring the superiority of the lien." 2 Elliott, Roads & Streets, 3d ed. § 749.

The learned author last cited, writing the opinion in the case of State ex rel. Ely v. Aetna Ins. Co. 117 Ind. 251, 20 N. E. 144, and discussing the subject of the lien of a special tax created by statute, said: "The statute does not declare that the assessment shall be a prior lien, but simply provides that the assessment shall be a lien from the date of filing the report of the commissioners." Acts of 1883, p. 179, § 5. We do not doubt that it would have been within the power of the legislature to provide by express words that the lien should have priority over pre-existing mortgages. Provident Inst. for Savings v. Jersey City, 113 U. S. 506, 28 L. ed. 1102, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612. But there is no such provision in our statute, and the question is whether the courts can put one there. We appreciate the force of the appellant's argument, but think it one that should be addressed to the legislature, rather than the courts. We can readily perceive that there are cases in which the adjudication in favor of the priority of a mortgage lien would seriously interfere with the prosecution of a work for the promotion of the public welfare; but the creation of liens and their incidents is a legislative matter, and the courts cannot create such liens. 1 Jones, Liens, §§ 97-112. The statute must determine the character and extent of the lien. 1 Jones, Liens, § 105. It is not necessary that it should in express terms declare that the lien shall be a paramount one; for, if the intention can be gathered from the general words and purposes of the statute, the courts will give it effect. The statute under consideration does not contain any provision indicating an intention to make the lien paramount to that of a pre-existing mortgage."

These authorities, as might reasonably be expected from the fact that they so state the law, are supported by the weight of adjudications of the courts of last resort. We shall not encumber this opinion by citing the cases. They will be found in the footnotes of the foregoing works.

In the case of Everett v. Marston, 186 Mo. loc. cit. 599, 85 S. W. 542, discussing tax liens, this court, quoting with approval from one of the above authorities, said: "There is no common-law rule which makes a levy and assessment of taxes ex proprio vigore a lien on the property of the taxpayer. Such liens owe their existence wholly to statute; and their duration, limitation, and priorities, together with the property to which they attach, must be determined by the statutes creating them."

Without admitting that a general tax due the state and a special tax due a private citizen stand upon the same footing as to priority, some reference should be made to the law of this state as to the liens for general and special taxes. It is provided by § 11,499, Revised Statutes 1909, that the judgment for general taxes shall be a prior lien. Many other statutes expressly provide for the priority of a lien for special assessments and other taxes. See §§ 11,517, 11,588, 9347, 9049, 9296, 9297, 5523, 5524, 5599, 5722, and 9618, Revised Statutes 1909. If the tax lien has priority of its own force and without the aid of any statute, it is plain that the legislature did not so understand it. But it is said that the act making a judgment for general taxes a prior lien was passed in the year 1877, and that until then such taxes were uniformly given priority by the courts, without a statute so providing. The limits of this dissent preclude a discussion of all the various statutory provisions as to the lien for taxes during the history of this state; but an examination of them has left no doubt that the law, by necessary inference, has at all times recognized the priority and dominant character of the statutory lien for general taxes. In the several revisions of the statutes, the following appear:

Missouri Territorial Laws, 1804-24, vol. 1, p. 738, § 22, provide that a deed under a sale for taxes "shall vest in the purchaser, his heirs and assigns, all the right, title, claim, and interest of the said lands (the right of the United States only excepted) to the part so sold." Revised Statutes 1835, pp. 542 and 543, provide that the lands upon which the taxes are not paid within the time prescribed "shall be forfeited to the state," and that a sale of such lands for taxes shall "convey to the purchaser all the right, title, and interest of the state in and to the land sold." Revised Statutes 1845, p. 948, speak of lands on which taxes shall not be paid within the time prescribed, as "forfeited to the state," and at page 952 provide that the register of lands shall "execute good and sufficient deeds of conveyance" to the persons purchasing lands at tax sales. Revised Statutes 1855, p. 1360, § 34, provide that the deed delivered to the purchaser at a tax sale "shall be prima facie evidence of title in fee simple." In the General Statutes of 1865, p. 127, it is provided that the tax deed "shall vest in the grantee, his heirs, and assigns the title to the real estate herein described." And at page 128, after providing that when lands offered for sale by the collector shall not be sold for want of bidders, the same shall be forfeited to the state of Missouri, "and thenceforth all right, title, and interest of every person whomsoever in and to such land or lot shall be considered as transferred to and vested absolutely in the state." In Wagner's Statutes of 1872, vol. 2, p. 1197, it is provided that the collector shall give notice of an application to the court to sell lands upon which there are delinquent taxes. The form of notice is prescribed in the statute, and begins as follows: "Notice is hereby given to all persons interested that the undersigned collector . . . will make application to the county court . . . for a judgment to enforce the lien of the state of Missouri against the tracts of land . . . described in the foregoing list, and for an order to sell so much of said real property," etc. And at page 1199 it is provided that "any person interested in any of said lands or lots may make a defense to the proceeding." The form of the judgment is also set out in the statutes, and concludes as follows: "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the several tracts of land . . .

severally be condemned and be sold to satisfy the same as the law directs."

From the foregoing, it is clear that the law of this state always has recognized the priority of the state's lien for taxes; and it follows that the cases cited in the opinion of the court herein as holding the priority of the lien of general taxes are merely in accord with the statutory law, and are not in point as supporting the doctrine that the lien of a special tax is a prior lien, in the absence of a statute.

The case of Stafford v. Fizer, 82 Mo. 393, written by Commissioner Martin, is discussed at length in the opinion of the court herein, and announces the law (as to general taxes) that the tax lien is prior, in the absence of a statute. The cases it cites do not warrant that conclusion. One of those cases is Hopper v. Malleeson, 16 N. J. Eq. 382. The contest in that case was between a prior mortgagee and the owner of a tax title acquired under a sale of taxes levied after the execution of the mortgage. The court held in favor of the mortgagee, saying in the course of the opinion (loc. cit. 386): "The power of the legislature, by virtue of its sovereignty, to make the tax a charge upon the estate of all parties interested in the land, and to make the tax title paramount to all other and prior claims and encumbrances, is not questioned. But has that power been exercised in the act under consideration? Was it the intention of the legislature that the tax deed should operate to destroy all prior interests in the estate, vested or contingent, executed or executory, in possession or in expectancy?"

Before passing from this branch of the case, reference should be made to the case of Dressman v. Farmers' & T. Nat. Bank, 100 Ky. 571, 36 L.R.A. 121, 38 S. W. 1052, the leading authority relied upon by respondent. That a mistake was made in that case is placed beyond a doubt by the fact that, although the sole question involved was priority as between the lien of a special assessment and that of an antecedent encumbrance, the court said, "The attention of the court has not been directed to an adjudicated case where the precise question involved in this appeal has been passed upon,"—and cited in the opinion the very section of Elliott on Roads & Streets, supra, which states the law directly to the contrary.

The question remains: Does the charter, by fair inference, make the lien of the tax bill prior to that of an existing mortgage?

The language of the charter is: "Said tax bill shall be and become a lien on the property charged therewith, and may be collected of the owner of the land in the name of and by the contractor as any other 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

claim in any court of competent jurisdiction," etc. It cannot fairly be said that this language indicates an intention to give priority to a special tax bill; but it is said that the word "owner," as used therein, was intended to include prior encumbrancers. That the word was not intended to have such meaning is evident. In the last sentence of the section, it is provided that, "in case the owner of the ground is a nonresident of the state, suit may be brought by attachment, which shall be equivalent to notice and demand of payment." The next section of the charter provides that "such certified tax bill shall in all cases be prima facie evidence . . . of the liability of the person therein named as the owner of the land." If the mortgagee is an owner, why the necessity of an attachment, simply because the owner of the equity happens to be a nonresident? Why not bring the suit in such case against the mortgagee? And, as the foreclosure of the mortgage lien would carry full title, why make the owner of the equity a party at all? Again, if "owner" means "mortgagee," it follows that in all cases where the mortgage was held by a nonresident an attachment would lie against the property, even though the owner of the equity lived upon it. The charter provides in detail the procedure for the collection of the tax bill by suit, but nowhere recognizes the right of the holder of the tax bill to make a prior encumbrancer a party to the proceeding. It is also said that the provision of the charter that "the owner or any person having an interest in the property charged with the tax bill may pay the same in full at any time within thirty days after notice of the tax bill, without interest," was intended to include prior encumbrancers; and that by such language an intent is disclosed to give priority to the special tax. It is a matter of common knowledge that the building and improvement of property liable for the tax frequently goes on concurrently with the street improvement. In making such improvements, encumbrances may be placed upon the property by the owner, and liens of contractors or others, later in point of time than the tax bill, may exist. Such persons would be directly interested in the payment of the special tax, and the charter language would clearly be applicable to them. In view of the law as heretofore quoted from Cooley, that "when liens are expressly created they are not to be enlarged by construction," it seems most unreasonable to hold that the language of the charter which is directly applicable to a class holding subject to the special tax was intended to subordinate the lien of a prior mortgage to that of a later special tax bill,

The case of Keating v. Craig, 73 Mo. 507, we are unable to understand in any other light than as authority against respondent. The case was almost identical in its facts with the case now before us, and the question for decision, as stated by this court, was: "Was the lien of the tax bill superior to the lien of the trust deeds?" This court then answered the question affirmatively and held in favor of the superiority of the lien of the tax bill; but the charter provision there construed, and under which such ruling was made, was stated by the court as follows: "It is provided in § 3, art. 9, of the city charter, that in suits to enforce the lien of a special tax bill all or any of the owners of the land charged, or of any interest or estate therein, may be made defendants, and that a judgment in such suit shall bind all the right, title, interest, and estate in the land that the defendants and each of them owned at the time the lien of the tax bill commenced, or acquired afterward." That provision expressly authorized the joining of a mortgagee as a defendant and by so doing gave priority to the lien of the tax bill. But no such provision, or one remotely kindred to it, can be found in the charter under consideration.

In the course of the opinion in the Keating Case, the court said: "The lien of the special tax bill, like the lien for general taxes, is superior to any encumbrance with which the owner may charge his land. This is the evident meaning of that portion of § 3, above referred to, which declares the effect of a judgment on a special tax bill." The court thus recognizes the priority of the lien for general taxes, which lien, as heretofore shown, was made prior by statute, and for a like reason holds the special tax a prior lien, because made so by the charter.

The foregoing review of the law, it is submitted, shows an array of authority in favor of the position maintained by appellants, which should be controlling in the decision of this case. And on reason why should it not be so, where the legislative body has not acted, when by acting it would have served notice on the public of the priority of such taxes? A person residing in a distant part of this state, or in another state, may loan his money on property which, in his opinion, is adequate security for the loan. Without any notice to him, a special tax bill is issued against the property, and is held by the contractor who made the improvement. Does this improvement increase the amount of the mortgagee's loan or his rate of interest? All he can claim is what he could have gotten without the improvement. Wherein is he benefited that he should be postponed to the contractor? As to the latter, if the improvement benefits the property to the extent of the tax, he has the equity of the owner and the enhanced value to secure his tax bill. And, in any event, he knows when he undertakes the contract exactly what security he must rely upon. If the legislative body desires a different rule, it is always in its power to enact it. It has not done so under the facts of this case, and the judgment should be for the appellants.

Petition for rehearing denied April 9, 1912.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

LAURA J. NORTON, Appt.,

v.

RICHARD RANDOLPH.

(— Ala. —, 58 So. 283.)

Nuisance — high fence.

1. A fence 20 feet high is not a nuisance merely because it excludes the light and air from the rooms of the adjoining building of a neighbor, and is liable to be blown against the house, to its injury.

Injunction — spite fence.

2. Injunction lies against the maintenance of a spite fence erected merely to annoy a neighbor and injure his property.

Pleading — bill for injunction — spite fence.

3. To maintain a suit for injunction against a spite fence, the bill should allege not only that the structure is entirely useless to defendant and without value to his property, but that it was maliciously erected for the purpose of injuring complainant in the use and enjoyment of his property.

(April 4, 1912.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Jefferson County, overruling a demurrer to a bill filed to enjoin the maintenance of a fence which was alleged to constitute a nuisance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Generally, as to injunction to compel or prevent the erection, maintenance, or removal of a fence, see note to Miller v. Hoeschler, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49. As to liability for malicious erection of a fence, including the right to an injunction against such a fence, see note to Barger v. Barringer, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 831.

Somerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill is filed by the appellee, Randolph, against the appellant, Mrs. Norton, seeking to abate an alleged nuisance erected by her on a vacant lot adjoining his residence property in the city of Birmingham. The averments of the bill are substantially as follows: Complainant is the owner of a lot on which he has erected for selling or renting a valuable dwelling house, costing about $6,000. This dwelling is in a desirable part of the city, and many other dwellings of like character have been erected on the same street. Respondent owns a vacant lot, immediately adjoining complainant's lot, "which is vacant and unimproved property, and is not used by her for any purpose." She has nevertheless erected on said vacant lot, within 3 or 4 feet of complainant's house, "a large plank wall or structure about 20 feet high and 30 feet long, by means of which she has almost entirely excluded the air and light from the rooms on that side." This structure is alleged to be useless, and also unsafe, in that it endangers the adjoining dwelling by its liability to be blown over and thus cause damage thereto. It is further alleged that this structure "does not serve any useful purpose, nor add any value to the property of the said Laura J. Norton;" and that complainant "does not know for what purpose said structure was erected by the said Laura J. Norton, unless it was for the purpose of vexing, annoying, and injuring" him, "by preventing him from using his property, either by sale or rent; and that it has prevented his selling or renting said property, and its selling or renting value has been greatly diminished thereby." Respondent demurred to the bill as a whole, and assigned the following grounds: "(1) For that there is no equity in said bill. (2) For that complainant has an adequate remedy at law for the matters and things complained of therein. (3) For that it does not sufficiently appear therefrom that the said wall or structure alleged to have been erected by defendant is a nuisance. (4) For that it is not sufficiently shown that the said wall or structure erected by defendant is dangerous, unsafe, or defective, or was not erected with proper and necessary skill and care, nor that same is unsafe in such way or measure as to constitute same a nuisance. (5) For that it does not sufficiently appear from the bill that defendant's erection of said wall or structure on her lot was not lawful nor in the exercise of her subsisting legal rights, nor that she has thereby interfered with complainant or his property, or his legal rights or privileges." The chancellor overruled the demurrer, and the appeal is from that decree.

The jurisdiction of equity to abate nuisances by injunction is too well settled to require discussion. The main question, therefore, involved in this case, is whether the allegations of the bill, which are admitted to be true by the demurrer, establish such a nuisance as to justly invoke the intervention of a court of equity.

We think it clear that the averments of the bill are insufficient to show that the structure complained of is dangerous to the safety of complainant's premises in such sense as to constitute a nuisance, and the grounds of demurrer pointing out this defect should have been sustained had they been directed and limited to that aspect of the bill. But, being directed to the whole bill, they were properly overruled if the bill had equity in some other aspect.

We come, then, to the decisive questions raised by the fifth ground of demurrer: Is the structure described in the bill brought by appropriate averment within the class known in legal parlance as "spite fences;" that is, was it erected by respondent solely for the malicious purpose of vexing and injuring complainant in the lawful use and enjoyment of his dwelling house, and was it at the same time devoid of all benefit or value to respondent in the use or improvement of her property? And, if so, is it legally a nuisance?

It is of course true, as argued by appellant, that the old English doctrine of ancient lights is not, and never has been, in force in this state. Ward v. Neal, 37 Ala. 500. And the general rule is well settled that the owner of land has no right, as against adjoining owners, to the unobstructed access of light and air to his premises over adjoining premises, unless such right has been acquired by grant, express or implied.

Many of the cases dealing with the subject of malicious structures like the one here complained of are cited and reviewed in a case note to Koblegard v. Hale, 60 W. Va. 37, 116 Am. St. Rep. 868, 53 S. E. 793, 9 Ann. Cas. 732-734, and the great weight of authority, it must be conceded, is opposed to the equity of complainant's bill. Bordeaux v. Greene, 22 Mont. 254, 74 Am. St. Rep. 600, 56 Pac. 218; Metzger v. Hochrein, 107 Wis. 267, 50 L.R.A. 305, 81 Am. St. Rep. 841, 83 N. W. 308; Guethler v. Altman, 26 Ind. App. 587, 84 Am. St. Rep. 313, 60 N. E. 355; Fisher v. Feige, 137 Cal. 39, 59 L.R.A. 333, 92 Am. St. Rep. 77, 69 Pac. 618.

The doctrine of these cases, based on the alleged right of the owner of land to use it according to his malicious fancy, and without any advantage to himself or his land, for the sole purpose of injuring his neighbor in the lawful and beneficial use of his adjoining property, has been carried to such an extent as in many cases to be justly characterized as "odious." And hence statutes have been passed in a number of states abrogating the principle on account of the unjust and injurious effects resulting from its enforcement.

The authority of precedents, however, must often yield to the force of reason, and to the paramount demands of justice, as well as the decencies of civilized society, and the law ought to speak with a voice responsive to these demands.

We have examined the decisions and the reasoning of the various courts upon this question; and, unfettered by any precedents of our own, we are led to the deliberate conclusion that the majority view, as above stated, is founded upon a vicious fallacy, and is violative of sound legal principle as well as of common justice.

This conclusion has already found eloquent and forcible expression in decisions of the supreme courts of Michigan and North Carolina. Burke v. Smith, 69 Mich. 380, 8

As said by Parsons, Ch. J., in Horan v. Byrnes, supra: "The conclusion that a landowner's property right in real estate includes the right to use it solely for the injury and annoyance of his neighbor, without intending to subvert any useful purpose of his own, is 'based upon a narrow view of the effect of the land titles,' and is reached 'by the strict enforcement of a technical rule of ownership' briefly expressed in an ancient maxim, Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad caelum. . . . Because when employed for a useful purpose such use may rightfully injure another, it does not follow that the same use for a wrongful purpose may also rightfully injure another, except upon the theory of absolute dominion; for the character of the use is an element of the right. . . . As, therefore, the statute does not deprive the plaintiff of any right to a reasonable use of his land, but only prohibits an unnecessary, unreasonable use, it does not deprive him of any property right."

And as said by Holmes, J., in Rideout v. Knox, supra: "But it is plain that the right to use one's property for the sole purpose of injuring others is not one of the immediate rights of ownership; it is not a right for the sake of which property is recognized by the law, but is only a more or less necessary incident of rights which are established for very different ends."

We approve the judicial reasoning as well as the Christian ethics of the Michigan court as expressed in the language of Morse, J., in Burke v. Smith, 69 Mich. 380, 8 L.R.A. 184, 37 N. E. 838: "If a man has no right to dig a hole upon his premises, not for any benefit to himself or his premises, but for the express purpose of destroying his neighbor's spring, why can he be permitted to shut out light and air from his neighbor's windows maliciously and without profit or benefit to himself? By analogy, it seems to me that the same principle applies in both cases, and that the law will interpose and prevent the wanton injury in both cases. . . . It must be remembered that no man has a legal right to make a malicious use of his property, . . . for the avowed purpose of damaging his neighbor. To hold otherwise would be to make the law a convenient engine in cases like the present to injure and destroy the peace and comfort, and to damage the property of one's neighbor, for no other than a wicked purpose, which in itself is or ought to be unlawful. The right to do this cannot, in an enlightened country, exist either in the use of property or in any way or manner. . . . The right to breathe the air and to enjoy the sunshine is a natural one; and no man can pollute the atmosphere, or shut out the light of heaven, for no better reason than that the situation of his property is such that he is given the opportunity of so doing, and wishes to gratify his spite and malice toward his neighbor." "I do not think the common law permits a man to be deprived of water, air, or light for the mere gratification of malice."

We quote also the following language of Brown, J., in Barger v. Barringer, 151 N. C. 433, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 831, 66 S. E. 439, 19 Ann. Cas. 472, adopted by the North Carolina court: "There are many annoyances arising from legitimate improvement and businesses which those living near must endure, but no one should be compelled to submit to a nuisance created and continued for no useful end, but solely to inflict upon him humiliation as well as physical pain. The ancient maxim of the common law, Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non laedas, is not founded in any human statute, but in that sentiment expressed by Him who taught good will toward men, and said, 'Love thy neighbor as thyself.' Freely translated, it enjoins that every person, in the use of his own property, should avoid injury to his neighbor as much as possible. No one ought to have the legal right to make a malicious use of his property for no benefit to himself, but merely to injure his fellow man. . . . The doctrine of private nuisances is founded upon this humane and venerable maxim of the law. If it can be successfully invoked to prevent the keeping of stables and hogpens so near ones neighbor as to cause discomfort, why cannot he whom it is sought to needlessly and maliciously deprive of air and sunlight also seek the argis of its protection? The right thus to injure one's neighbor with impunity cannot long continue to exist anywhere in an enlightened country where God is acknowledged and the Golden Rule is taught. On this subject, if need be, we will do better to follow the pandects of the heathen Romans, whose jurists have inculcated a doctrine more consistent with the teachings of Him whom they permitted to be crucified, than to be governed by the principles of the common law as expounded by some Christian courts and text writers."

But little else remains to be said in support of the rule of reason and good morals. The rule of malice was, we think, conceived in error, and has indeed become a Caliban of the law,—the ugly and misshapen offspring of a decent and honorable parentage,—and we are unwilling to sanction in this jurisdiction its evil and odious sway. We therefore hold that there is equity in the bill of complaint.

As a matter of pleading, however, we think the averments of the bill are not sufficient to bring the case clearly within the rule above enunciated. It should be distinctly alleged, not only that the structure complained of is entirely useless to the respondent, and without value to her property, but also that it was maliciously erected for the purpose of injuring complainant in the use and enjoyment of his property. It may be conceded that the facts stated in the bill are sufficient to justify the inference of malice as a matter of evidence merely, but they may conceivably be consistent also with its absence; and, on demurrer, the averments of fact must, of course, be strictly construed against the pleader in so far as opposing conclusions may be drawn. Nor does the averment that complainant "does not know for what purpose said structure was erected, . . . unless it was for the purpose of vexing, annoying, and injuring" him, meet the requirements of good pleading as to the assumption of the burden of proof by complainant in this regard.

The fifth ground of demurrer should therefore have been sustained, and to that extent the decree of the chancellor will be reversed, and a decree here rendered to that effect.

Reversed and rendered.

All the Justices concur.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

v.

BOSTON ELEVATED RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

(212 Mass. 62, 98 N. E. 587.)

Street railway — injury by overhang of car on curve — liability.

1. A street car company which attempts 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to run a car around a curve at a time when a wagon is between the track and the curb, in a space so narrow that it will be hit by the overhang of the car as it rounds the curve, is liable for the resulting injury in case the car hits the wagon and forces it against a pedestrian on the sidewalk.

Highway — placing wagon where it will be hit by street car — liability.

2. The owner of a wagon, who, at a curve, drives into a space between a street car track and the curb, so narrow that the wagon will be hit by the overhang of a car attempting to round the curve at a time when a car must pass the wagon while there, is liable for the resulting injury in case the wagon is hit by a car and driven against a pedestrian on the sidewalk.

R EPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court, after verdict in favor of the defendant railway, of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. C. Cogswell and F. O. Gilpatrick, for plaintiff:

Each defendant owed to the plaintiff, as a traveler upon the highway, the ordinary care of a prudent person.

Driscoll v. West End Street R. Co. 159 Mass. 142, 34 N. E. 171.

As to each other, each defendant was bound to use due care to avoid coming in contact with the other, and neither is entitled to assume that the other will keep out of his way. A violation of this duty by either, and consequent injury to a third person, is a violation of the duty owed that person; and if each violates his duty, and thereby contributes to an injury, each is responsible for the entire consequences.

Scannell v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 176 Mass. 170, 57 N. E. 341.

The accident was of such nature, and occurred under such circumstances, that it was of itself evidence of negligence against both defendants.

James v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 204 Mass. 158, 90 N. E. 513; Rockwell v. McGovern, 202 Mass. 6, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1022, 88 N. E.

Note. — Liability of street railway company to one hit by swing of car at curve.

The earlier cases on this subject are collected in a note appended to South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Besse, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 890.

Following South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Besse, supra, it was held in Louis-

436; McNamara v. Boston & M. R. Co. 202 Mass. 492, 89 N. E. 131; Sullivan v. Rowe, 194 Mass. 500, 80 N. E. 459; Cassady v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 184 Mass. 156, 63 L.R.A. 285, 68 N. E. 10; Melvin v. Pennsylvania Steel Co. 180 Mass. 196, 62 N. E. 379; Manning v. West End Street R. Co. 166 Mass. 230, 44 N. E. 135; Ugla v. West End Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 351, 39 Am. St. Rep. 481, 35 N. E. 1126.

Messrs. M. J. Sughrue and Daniel M. Lyons for defendant railway company.

Messrs. Henry F. Hurlburt, Henry F. Hurlburt, Jr., and Carroll A. Wilson, for defendant express company:

The facts show that the accident was caused not by any negligent act on the part of its driver, but by the acts, or omission to act, on the part of the motorman and conductor of the car of the defendant elevated railway.

Lindenbaum v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 197 Mass. 314, 84 N. E. 129; Goldthwait v. Haverhill & G. Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 554, 36 N. E. 486; Eldredge v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 203 Mass. 582, 89 N. E. 1041; Lockwood v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 200 Mass. 537, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 488, 86 N. E. 934.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, while upon a public way as a pedestrian, without any reasonable cause to apprehend that his position might be unsafe, was struck, knocked down, and rendered ville R. Co. v. Ray, — Ky. —, 124 S. W. 313, that a street car company is not liable for injury to a person whose wagon is struck by the rear end of a car swinging away from the track in a natural manner when passing around a curve, since it is the duty of persons driving on the street to avoid such collisions. The court said that the rule imposing a duty upon those in charge of a street car to keep a lookout so as to avoid injuring those who may be crossing or upon the street in front of the moving car has never been so extended as to require the employees in charge of the car to keep a lookout at corners and curves, so as to prevent others using the street from colliding with the rear end of the car.

In the Besse Case, the car was in motion when it passed the wagon near the curve in the street, and in the Ray Case the car started just as the wagon passed it.

But in Pitton v. International R. Co. 121 N. Y. Supp. 637, where the plaintiff's wagon was struck by the rear end of a car as it rounded a curve, it was held that the question of the plaintiff's negligence was for the jury, where it appeared that the car was standing at the approach of the curve when the plaintiff's wagon, while running in the flange of an adjacent track, approached it in plain view of the motorman in charge, and it did not appear that unconscious by a wagon driven by a servant of the defendant express company. If the combination of circumstances which produced the injury may be infrequent, they are not extraordinary, and the issue of this defendant's negligence having been a question for the jury, the refusal to order a verdict in its favor was right. Powell v. Deveney, 3 Cush. 300, 50 Am. Dec. 738; Slattery v. Lawrence Ice Co. 190 Mass. 79, 76 N. E. 459; Hanley v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 201 Mass. 55, 59, 87 N. E. 197; Dulligan v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 201 Mass. 227, 231, 87 N. E. 567. But the ruling that the plaintiff could not recover against the defendant railway company should not have been given. The parties were concurrently using the public ways, and each defendant could not disregard the rights of other travelers, or escape the consequences if every reasonable precaution was not taken to avoid injury to them. O'Brien v. Blue Hill Street R. Co. 186 Mass. 446, 447, 71 N. E. 951. The jury would have been warranted in finding that for some distance below the place of the accident the car and wagon, while moving in the same direction, proceeded with equal speed, when, as they approached a sharp curve in the railway track where it turned into a cross street, the car passed the wagon, which then moved up until, as they entered the curve, the car and wagon were abreast, or the wagon might have been slightly in advance. As it approached the curve the car slackened speed, the plaintiff had knowledge of the extent of the overhang of such a car, swinging around a curve. The court said that the jury had a right to find that the plaintiff had the right to assume that the car would not start before the rear of plaintiff's wagon had passed the point of danger of a collision with the rear end of the car as it swung around the curve, especially when it must have been plain to be seen that the rear wheel of the wagon was running in the flange of the rail of the adjoining track.

A motorman in charge of a street car approaching a horse and buggy standing in the highway near the track at a point where it curves is bound to take into consideration the swing of the car as it rounds the curve, and the fact that he believed he could pass in safety does not relieve the railway company from liability if injury results from his attempt to pass. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Camp, 161 Ala. 456, 49 So. 846. To the same effect on subsequent appeal in 2 Ala. App. 649, 57 So. 50.

On the general question as to the duty of a motorman upon perceiving a vehicle standing near the track, unattended, or occupied only by a child, see Louisville R. Co. v. Flannery, and note appended thereto in 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 560. A. L. R.

while the wagon moved slowly, and the width of the street, with the sharp curvature of the track, plainly showed that the wagon, and the car could not simultaneously pass substantially abreast around the curve and the car turn to the left, without coming in contact. It also appeared that at this corner travel during the daytime became greatly congested, and because of the volume of traffic a police officer had been stationed for the protection of travelers. It was with this situation before them, that in broad daylight the motorman and the driver, after a signal from the officer that they could proceed, moved forward, and the car, going at greater speed, outstripped the wagon. The projecting rear end of the car in passing swung over the roadway, and coming into collision with the wagon forced it over the sidewalk, where it felled the plaintiff. It was the duty of the motorman to have stopped the car if he saw that the driver had determined to go on, and it was the duty of the driver not to have attempted to pass the car and turn to the left until the car had passed him; and if either the motorman or the driver had acted with ordinary prudence the collision would have been averted, and the injury to the plaintiff would not have happened. Carrabar v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 198 Mass. 549, 126 Am. St. Rep. 461, 85 N. E. 162; Wright v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 203 Mass. 569, 570, 571, 89 N. E. 1073. The plaintiff having offered abundant evidence that his injuries could be attributed to the concurrent misconduct of the defendants, he can recover judgment against both, although he can have but one satisfaction in damages. Feneff v. Boston & M. R. Co. 196 Mass. 575, 581, 82 N. E. 705. By the terms of the report, judgment is to be entered on the verdict for the plaintiff against both defendants. So ordered.

FREDERICK M. MORSE, Admr., etc., of Frank F. Morse, Appt.,
v.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELERS' EASTERN ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION.

(212 Mass. 140, 98 N. E. 599.)

Insurance — accident — voluntary exposure — drowning from canoe.

One who, while on a pleasure trip in a canoe, continues on his journey on a lake in a high wind when persons familiar with the location warn him of the danger, and no other canoes are out, voluntarily exposes himself to unnecessary danger, and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

is negligent, so that in case he is drowned by the overturning of the canoe, no recovery can be had on an accident insurance policy which exempts the insurer from liability in case of death from such exposure.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County confirming the master's report and dismissing a bill filed to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jesse W. Morton, for complainant:

The shipment of a pailful of water only in 10 miles does not show that going was dangerous, and the master was wrong in concluding that the morning trip was dangerous to the extent of being a warning to the insured that he embarked in the afternoon at his peril.

Messrs. William F. Merritt and N. Thomas Merritt, Jr., for respondent:

Upon the facts found by the master the morning trip was an act of negligence on the part of the deceased.

Union Casualty & Surety Co.* 108 Mo. App. 169, 83 S. W. 276.

Note. — Voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within meaning of accident insurance policy.

The early cases upon the question here under consideration are gathered in the notes to Fidelity & C. Co. v. Chambers, 40 L.R.A. 432; Diddle v. Continental Casualty Co. 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 779; and Da Rin v. Casualty Co. 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1164. And the present note includes only the cases which have dealt with the question since the writing of the last note referred to.

The expression "unnecessary exposure to danger" in an accident policy includes exposure attributable to negligence on the part of the insured, and is intended to hold him to the exercise of ordinary care, and exempt the insurer from liability in all

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity by the administrator of the estate of Frank F. Morse to compel the assessment by the defendant on its members surviving at the death of the intestate of the sum of $2 each, and from the sum so realized to compel the payment to the plaintiff, for the benefit of Elizabeth G. Morse, the beneficiary named in the certificate of membership in the defendant association which the deceased held at the time of his death, of the amount realized therefrom, not exceeding $5,000. There was a decree dismissing the bill and the plaintiff appealed.

The deceased came to his death by accidental drowning on Moosehead lake, on September 20, 1898. The certificate provided amongst other things that "no indemnity shall be paid to any member . . . for any injury caused wholly or in part, directly or indirectly, by . . . voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger; . . . nor for any injury which the member, by the exercise of ordinary care, prudence, and foresight, might have averted or prevented, or to which the member's own negligence shall have contributed. Nor shall any indemnity be paid to the beneficiary of any member for the death of said member resulting from an injury caused wholly or in part, directly or indirectly, by either of the foregoing causes."

The intestate and a companion had been cases of injury occurring in whole or in part through a failure on the part of the insured to exercise such care. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Adams, 27 Okla. 496, 112 Pac. 1026.

To defeat a recovery as a matter of law on an accident policy on the ground of voluntary or unnecessary exposure to danger, the voluntary exposure must have been with respect to a danger so obvious that no ordinarily prudent person would have encountered it. Powell v. Travelers' Protective Assn. 160 Mo. App. 571, 140 S. W. 939.

Where a given state of facts is such that reasonable men may fairly differ upon the question as to whether the insured died of injuries resulting from "unnecessary exposure to danger," the determination of the matter is for the jury; and it is only where the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion from them that such a question is ever considered one of law for the court. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Adams, supra.

In Powell v. Travelers' Protective Assn. supra, it was held that the question whether the insured, who was killed by a train, met his death by voluntary or unnecessary exposure to danger, within the meaning of an accident policy, was for the jury, where there was evidence that he was ejected from in the Moosehead lake region on a canoe trip for a vacation. On the morning of the day of the accident they were at a place called Socatean point, about 10 miles northwest of Mount Kineo, and paddled from there to Point Kineo, arriving about noon. There was a strong northwest wind, and the master found that over a part of the course, going one way, the water was as rough and dangerous as it was in any other part of the lake. There was another course which was much less dangerous. It did not appear which course the intestate and his companion took. But, as already stated, they arrived at Point Kineo safely about noon. They took in a pailful of water on the trip. They stayed at the hotel about two hours and later returned to the canoe and started to paddle to Moody island, about 2 miles down the lake in a southeasterly direction from the hotel. Between the time that they arrived at Point Kineo and the time when they started for Moody island they were spoken to by several guides and cautioned about going out, and were told that it would be dangerous, and that no canoes were out on the lake because the guides thought it dangerous. In spite of the warning thus given and of the condition of the weather, they started out. They were watched for about a mile and a half, the canoe and its occupants occasionally disappearing in the trough of the waves, when a flash was seen, after which the canoe disappeared and was not seen again.

a train at a considerable distance from a station, at about 10 o'clock on a clear evening, that the place in question was outside the city limits, and that there were no lights nearby, and that the track at that point was built on an 8 or 10-foot embankment; that he was struck by a fast train about fifteen minutes after he was ejected, and near the first street of the city connecting with the railroad track by which he could have gotten out of the railroad yards.

Where it was sought to avoid liability on an accident policy issued to one who had been ejected from one train and killed by another, on the ground that the insured had voluntarily exposed himself to danger, it was held that the testimony of the insured's wife as to his mental and physical condition could not be accepted as conclusive of his condition after leaving the train, where she had not seen her husband for some time prior to the accident, and her testimony did not cover the time elapsing between his being thrown off the train and the time when the accident occurred, since, assuming that he was violently thrown off the train, and fell, striking his head and shoulders, it was for the jury to draw its own inference as to the effect upon his mind and body. Ibid.

J. T. W.

There is no finding to that effect by the master, but it is probable that the flash referred to was caused by the wet bottom of the canoe as it capsized. The canoe was found on the shore of the island and the bodies were recovered about ten days later. The day was one of the worst of the season, the wind blowing from the northwest and gradually increasing in force till about 4 o'clock. When a northwest wind strikes the mountain, it is divided and a part deflected to one side and a part to the other side. These currents and the wind from over the top of the mountain unite from a half a mile to a mile from the shore, leaving the water protected for that distance, and causing a very rough, choppy sea where they unite. One standing on the shore would not realize this nor be able to determine just how rough the water was where the winds came together. A short distance from Moody island there was a submerged ledge, but the master finds that this had nothing to do with the accident and did not cause the drowning of Morse and his companion. The master finds that Morse and his companion did not know of this ledge and made no inquiries about the conditions which they would have to encounter, and not only failed to seek advice, but refused such advice as was given; that the general condition of the wind and water should have been a warning to them; that having made a 10-mile trip in the morning, they must have known that the trip would be a hard one, and that the fact that there were no guides out on the lake in canoes should also have been a warning to them. He concludes his report as follows: "Upon all the evidence it appears and I find as a fact that the deceased Frank F. Morse did not comply with the terms and conditions of his policy. That his death resulted from an act that he, by the exercise of ordinary care, prudence, and foresight, might have averted or prevented. Further, that his own negligence contributed to his death. Further, that the injury which caused the death was wholly or in part, directly or indirectly, due to this voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. That he did not use ordinary care, prudence, and foresight, and that his own negligence contributed to his death. I find that the notice of death was good, and complied with the requirements of the by-laws and conditions of policy. Upon all the evidence it appears and I find as a fact that the death of Frank F. Morse was not accidental under the terms of the policy issued to him, and that there can be no recovery under said policy."

It is hard to criticize the conduct of those who have paid for their imprudence, as these young men did, with their lives. But 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

upon the facts found by the master it is plain, we think, that there can be no recovery under the policy, and that the decree dismissing the bill was right and must be affirmed.

The deceased and his companion were warned of the danger by those whose experience and occupations should have caused their opinion concerning the conditions which existed in regard to wind and weather to be listened to and heeded. They knew that there were no canoes out on the lake because it was considered too dangerous for canoes to be out. They made no inquiries of anyone as to the conditions which they would meet. Apparently they relied on the fact that they had made the trip safely in the morning, and on the appearance of the lake as far as they could see it from the shore. But to start out as the deceased did could be found to be, as the master has found that it was, a lack of ordinary care and prudence on his part and a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, which contributed to and caused his death; and which, therefore, according to the express terms of the certificate, prevents any recovery. The case is not one of a catastrophe resulting from an overconfidence for which there were reasonable grounds, or from an error of judgment in regard to a matter concerning which prudent men might differ, but it involved a disregard of warnings which, under the circumstances, the master was warranted in finding the insured was bound, in the exercise of due care, to heed, and of a hazardous exposure to conditions of wind and weather which ordinary prudence and foresight forbade. See Tuttle v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 134 Mass. 175, 45 Am. Rep. 316; Smith v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 185 Mass. 74, 64 L.R.A. 117, 102 Am. St. Rep. 326, 69 N. E. 1059; Garcelon v. Commercial Travellers' Eastern Acci. Asso. 195 Mass. 531, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 961, 81 N. E. 201.

The result is that the decree must be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

CHARLES E. W. SMITH, Appt.,
v.

WESTERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Reapt.

(203 N. Y. 499, 96 N. E. 1106.)

Jury — separate issues — statutory right to trial — constitutional rights.

1. That a code provision in a section dealing with issues and the mode of trial thereof, which authorizes the court to order one or more issues to be separately tried prior to the trial of other issues, is in immediate juxtaposition to a section authorizing jury trials in the discretion of the court, does not indicate that such section was not intended to apply to cases where there was a constitutional right to jury trial.

Same — preliminary issues — right to separate.

2. A constitutional provision that the trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate does not prevent the allowance of the trial of preliminary issues in advance of other issues in the case.

(December 19, 1911.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for New York County, Part I., directing trial of certain issues prior to any trial of other issues in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due on a contract for services. Affirmed.

Statement by Hiscock, J.:

The appellant brought the action to recover a balance claimed to be due on a contract for services. Respondent served an answer containing a general denial, and also setting up as one amongst other affirmative defenses the statute of limitations, both of the state of New York and of the state of California, and it was of the issues arising under this defense that the court ordered a separate and preliminary trial.

The questions certified to us by the appellate division are:

First. "Are the provisions of § 973 of Note. — Constitutionality of provision for separate trial of different issues in same case.

The decision in SMITH v. WESTERN P. R. Co., to the effect that the constitutional provision that "the trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate forever," was not infringed by an act allowing the trial of preliminary issues in advance of other issues in a case, appears to be sustained by authority.

In 24 Cyc. 176, in the article relating to juries, it is said "the legislature may make any reasonable regulations as to the practice and procedure in civil cases so long as the right to a jury trial is not materially impaired."

It seems clear that an act providing for the separate trial of different issues in a case relates merely to practice and procedure, and that it in no way infringes the right to a jury trial.

The only other decision which appears to have considered a similar statute is in accord with the result reached by the court in SMITH v. WESTERN P. R. Co.

In the case referred to, Bennett v. State, 57 Wis. 69, 46 Am. Rep. 26, 14 N. W. 912, a statute provided that the defendant in a criminal action, who claimed that he was insane at the time of the commission of the alleged offense, should plead that matter separately as a special plea with the plea of not guilty, and that the issue on the plea of insanity should be first tried by the jury impaneled in the action; and provided further that the verdict of the jury upon that plea should be taken before the case was tried upon the plea of not guilty, and that if the verdict of the jury on such plea was that the defendant was not insane at the time of the commission of the offense, then his trial upon the plea of not guilty should at once proceed before the same jury, and that the finding of the jury upon such special plea should be final and conclusive upon the question of his insanity 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) at the time of the commission of the offense. It was contended that this statute was in conflict with the provision of the Constitution declaring that the accused in criminal prosecutions should "have the right to a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county or district wherein the offense shall have been committed," but it was held that this provision was not infringed. The court said: "The only other objection made to the act is that it requires the jury to dispose of this plea [of insanity] by a verdict thereon before the trial shall proceed upon the plea of not guilty. This, we think, is a matter which relates merely to the form of a jury trial, and not to the substance; and it is also commendable as being the most practical and convenient method of disposing of the whole case. If the jury find insanity, there will be no need of going through the trial upon the plea of not guilty; such finding disposes of the whole case. Suppose a former conviction or former acquittal was pleaded, together with the plea of not guilty,—certainly an orderly disposition of these issues would be to try the issue on such first-named plea before the issue upon the plea of not guilty; and in such case it is clear that if the verdict on such plea was against the accused, it would be conclusive upon the trial of the issue of not guilty.

"It may be said that the issue on the plea of insanity is not like the plea of a former conviction or acquittal, because the question of insanity is, and always was a fact which might be given in evidence under the plea of not guilty, and that the defendant cannot be required, against his consent, to make a special issue upon that fact, and proceed to try it separately, and be concluded by the verdict thereon when he is tried on the plea of not guilty; that if he can be compelled to be tried upon such issue separately, he may be compelled to plead separately, in all indictments or informations for murder or homicide, that the killing was in self-defense, or that it hapthe Code of Civil Procedure, if construed to apply to actions in which jury trial is guaranteed by § 2 of article 1 of the state Constitution, invalid, so far as thus applied, because in contravention of said section of the Constitution?"

Second. "Does § 973 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorize the court, in its discretion, upon compliance with said section, to order the trial of one or more issues in advance of the remaining issues in any action in which jury trial is guaranteed by § 2 of article 1 of the state Constitution?"

Messrs. Hardin & Hess, for appellant:

Section 973 of the Code is susceptible of two constructions,—by one of which it is constitutional and by the other it is unconstitutional. Of course the constitutional construction should be adopted and the unconstitutional construction rejected.

pened by misadventure or accident, and thus require the accused, in every case of homicide where he did not deny the killing, to plead specially his defense. Even if the support of this statute goes to that extent, we do not see how this takes away the defendant's right to a jury trial. Such a statute would simply regulate the pleadings and mode of procedure, and not go to the substance of a trial by jury. All the issues would still be tried by a jury, in the same way they are now tried. The only burden imposed upon the accused is that he shall be required to set out his several defenses in his pleadings instead of including them all together in the plea of not guilty. If the accused, under the plea of not guilty, relies upon insanity as a defense, the jury must necessarily determine that question when they render their general verdict; and if they acquit for that cause, the statutes of this state have always required the jury should so state in their verdict. No exception has ever been made to that requirement of the statute.

"In some respects the present law is advantageous to the accused, as it gives him the affirmative of the issue on the question of insanity, and so gives him the right to the close in the argument of that issue before the jury, which is always deemed an advantage in criminal prosecutions. The mere fact that the act requires the jury to announce their verdict upon this issue before the court proceeds to try the other issue cannot render the law unconstitutional. If it be unconstitutional at all, it must be upon the ground that the defendant is compelled to plead insanity specially as a defense to the information, or waive his right to give evidence of it as a defense upon the trial. It is clear, if the legislature have the power to compel the defendant to plead insanity as a defense, or waive it, then it has the power to prescribe the manner of disposing of that issue on the trial so long as it leaves the accused a trial by jury upon such issue.

The constitutional right of trial by jury cannot be infringed by either the court or the legislature.

"In Perry v. State, 9 Wis. 19, this court held 'that to preserve the right of trial by jury it is not necessary to continue the particular method of designating jurors in force at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. The mode is within the control of the legislature. All that the right of trial by jury includes is a fair and impartial jury, not the particular mode of designating it.' See also Randall v. Kehlor, 60 Me. 37, 11 Am. Rep. 169; Beers v. Beers, 4 Conn. 535, 10 Am. Rep. 186; Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329, Judge Cooley, speaking of the trial by jury guaranteed by the Constitution to the accused, says 'that in all those cases triable by a jury at common law,' the accused is entitled to such trial, 'with all the common-law incidents to a jury trial; so far, at least, as they can be regarded as tending to the protection of the accused.' The operation of this law is manifestly salutary in a case where a party is charged with a crime, who is apparently insane. In such case it would be in accordance with our idea of justice to first inquire as to the sanity of the accused before putting him on trial for the commission of a high crime. If the accused at the time of trial is, in fact, insane, he is not in a condition to answer the charge against him, and justice seems to demand that the question of his capacity to plead to the charge should be first ascertained before compelling him to a trial upon the issue of not guilty. And we see no impropriety in trying the sane issue first, where there are serious doubts as to the insanity of the accused, if such insanity be set up as a defense. It does not seem to us to deprive the accused of any of the incidents of a jury trial which can be regarded as tending to his protection. Without pursuing this argument further, we are of the opinion that the law in question is a salutary law, and does not deprive the defendant of any constitutional right or privilege."

People, 32 N. Y. 147.

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

court in its discretion may order one or more issues to be separately tried prior to any trial of the other issues in the case." This action is one in which the parties are constitutionally entitled to a trial by jury. Under the section above quoted, the court ordered a separate trial of the issues raised by an affirmative defense of the statute of limitations before trial of the other issues involving what are ordinarily defined as the merits of the action. There is no question but that this separate and prior trial was to be before and by a common-law jury of twelve men, regularly impaneled, but, nevertheless, the appellant objects to the order as unauthorized and improper. His objections are, first, that the section quoted does not relate to an action where a party is entitled to a jury trial under the Constitution, but only to those cases where trials by jury are allowed by legislative action or judicial discretion; and, second, that if the section does relate to a case where there is a constitutional right to a jury trial it impairs that right and is therefore unconstitutional.

The first objection is almost wholly based on the fact that this section is found in juxtaposition to two sections dealing with trials by jury in the discretion of the court, and not as matter of right, with the argument added that if the application of the section is not so restricted it will be unconstitutional. This contention may be very briefly dismissed. It has no basis to rest on. The section is found in an article which deals with "Issues and the Mode of Trial Thereof," and which contains sections relating to trials by jury where the right thereto is constitutional, as well as those where it is allowed as a matter of discretion; and, under the circumstances, the location of the section is a matter of no significance. Moreover, while the argument that statutory provisions are in pari materia may at times be of use in solving doubts concerning the application or meaning of a particular provision, it cannot be made the basis for thwarting the undoubted application and overturning the clear meaning of a statute. The language of the provision in question is so plain and comprehensive that this is what we should do if we adopted the interpretation urged by appellant.

This brings us to the second proposition that, if given the broad application just stated, the act is unconstitutional. With this contention, also, I am unable to agree. The constitutional provision invoked against the act is, "The trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate forever," etc. This, of course, as asserted by appellant's counsel, secures the right of trial before a common-law jury of twelve men of certain classes of issues, which include the ones here involved.

It is well settled that the object of such a provision is to preserve the substance of the right of trial by jury, rather than to prescribe the details of the methods by which it shall be exercised and enjoyed. Thus, in Walker v. New Mexico & S. P. R. Co. 165 U. S. 593, 596, 41 L. ed. 837, 841, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 421, 422, Judge Brewer, considering whether a statute of New Mexico violated the provisions of the United States Constitution on this subject, said: "The question is whether this act of the territorial legislature in substance impairs the right of trial by jury. The 7th Amendment, indeed, does not attempt to regulate matters of pleading or practice, or to determine in what way issues shall be framed by which questions of fact are to be submitted to a jury. Its aim is not to preserve mere matters of form and procedure, but substance of right. This requires that questions of fact in common-law actions shall be settled by a jury, and that the court shall not assume, directly or indirectly, to take from the jury or to itself such prerogative. So long as this substance of right is preserved, the procedure by which this result shall be reached is wholly within the discretion of the legislature, and the courts may not set aside any legislative provision in this respect because the form of action—the mere manner in which questions are submitted—is different from that which obtained at the common law."

And in People v. Dunn, 157 N. Y. 528, 535, 43 L.R.A. 247, 52 N. E. 572, 574, Judge Gray, expressing the same idea, also succinctly stated the fundamental elements of the trial by jury under the common law, and which our Constitution preserved. He wrote: "It is to be observed that our Constitution does not secure to the defendant any particular mode of jury trial, nor any particular method of jury selection. . . . The right was conceded to the citizen [at common law] of having the judgment of an impartial committee, or body, of his fellow citizens, upon charges involving his life, or his liberty, or his property, and two elements became essential ingredients of the right; viz., that the jurors should be twelve in number, and that they should be capable of deciding the cause fairly and impartially."

Even if we assume, as I think we should, that this section of the Code permits separate trials of separate issues at different times, before different juries, it seems very clear that it does not destroy or impair the substantial right of a litigant to have his 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case tried before a proper jury, but only prescribes the method in which this may be done. Every issue is submitted to the verdict of a jury. This is the substance of the right. As a matter of convenience, the court may order some issues to be tried before others are taken up. This is a matter of procedure and detail. The Constitution does not provide, and there should not be interpolated into it a provision, that all of the issues, even though completely separate and distinct, must be tried at one and the same time. No amount of analysis will disclose any such protection or benefit to a litigant in having all of the issues submitted to a single jury as will render such a right one of the essential ones secured by the Constitution. On the contrary, it is at once apparent that the convenience of litigants may be much prompted by a prior trial of various jurisdictional and preliminary issues, and it is to be presumed that courts will so administer the provision in question as to make it remedial and beneficial, rather than burdensome.

There are many decisions which, in my opinion, sustain the view that the legislature had power to enact the section as a regulation of mere procedure, and without impairing any constitutional rights, and reference will be made to some of them.

In People v. Connor, 142 N. Y. 130, 134, 36 N. E. 807, 808, it appeared that the court had ordered the trial, first and separately, of issues raised by defendant's special plea of a former trial and conviction, and when this had been passed on by the jury adversely to the defendant the court had directed the trial to proceed before the same jury on the other issues raised by the general plea of not guilty. The defendant objected to the latter step, asking that the trial be suspended after disposition of the first issue, and that he be permitted to examine the jurors before proceeding to the trial of the general issue, thus exactly reversing the position assumed by the present appellant. There was no statutory provision for separate trials of different issues at this time, and this court held that there was no basis for appellant's claim to such a method of procedure, and that the trial must be one continuous proceeding. It did say, however, even under these conditions: "The order in which the issues should be disposed of was a matter in the discretion of the court, which had power to direct them to be tried separately or together." (p. 134.)

In Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 164, 173, 13 Am. Rep. 492, the court considered the constitutionality of an act which overturned what was claimed to be the rule of the common law that the prior formation or expression of an opinion by a proposed juror conclusively proved want of impartiality, and disqualified him from serving. Said act, however, amply provided that at the time of the trial it must appear that the proposed juror, notwithstanding such opinion so formed or expressed, was able to render an impartial verdict according to the evidence, and would not be biased or influenced by his prior views. The court, overruling the defendant's plea, said: "While the Constitution secures the right of trial by an impartial jury, the mode of procuring and impaneling such jury is regulated by law, either common or statutory, principally the latter, and it is within the power of the legislature to make, from time to time, such changes in the law as it may deem expedient, taking care to preserve the right of trial by an impartial jury." (p. 173.) To similar effect is Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68, 70, 30 L. ed. 578, 579, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350.

In the following cases it was held directly, or by necessary inference, that separate trials may be had of preliminary or jurisdictional issues: Fisher v. Fraprie, 125 Mass. 472; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Brown, 113 Ga. 414, 84 Am. St. Rep. 250, 38 S. E. 989; Jones v. Donnell, 9 Ala. 695, 698; Tyler v. Murray, 57 Md. 418, 441.

In Lavelle v. Corrignio, 86 Hun, 135, 33 N. Y. Supp. 376, while that question was not actually decided, it was discussed, and the view expressed that on appeal in a partition action where several distinct and independent issues had been submitted to the jury, one of them incorrectly and the others correctly, a new trial might be granted as to the one without retrial of the others.

The legality of such a course of procedure has, however, fairly been affirmed in Boyd v. Brown, 17 Pick. 453, 461; Kent v. Whitney, 9 Allen, 62, 85 Am. Dec. 739; Pratt v. Boston Heel & Leather Co. 134 Mass. 300; Leiter v. Lyons, 24 R. I. 42, 52 Atl. 78, 81, 82; McKay v. New England Dredging Co. 93 Me. 201, 44 Atl. 614; Oberbeck v. Mayer, 59 Mo. App. 289, 298.

In the state of Missouri there is a provision in its practice act providing for the separate trial of different issues at the same or different terms of court; and, so far as appears, there has been no judicial opinion that this provision was a violation of the Missouri Constitution, securing the right of trial by jury.

In People v. Trimble, 60 Hun, 364, 15 N. Y. Supp. 60, affirmed in 131 N. Y. 118, 29 N. E. 1100, the court upheld a conviction for a felony, where the issue under plea of former conviction was first tried before one jury, and the issues raised by a general plea of not guilty before another jury.

None of the authorities cited by the appellant impair the reasoning or authority of 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

these decisions, and I feel no doubt that the order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs, and the first question certified should be answered in the negative, and the second one in the affirmative.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF OHIO

v.

PHILLIPS.

(85 Ohio St. 317, 97 N. E. 976.)

Husband and wife — larceny — liability of wife.

The common-law rule that neither husband nor wife can be prosecuted for larceny of the goods of the other is not abrogated by §§ 7995-8004, General Code, defining the rights and liabilities of husband and wife, nor by § 12,447, General Code, defining larceny. An intention of the legislature to abolish an established rule of the common law and to create a crime where none existed before must clearly and unmistakably appear.

(January 16, 1912.)

EXCEPTIONS by the State to the ruling of the Court of Common Pleas for Lucas County acquitting defendant of the crime of larceny from her husband. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Holland C. Webster and Roy R. Stuart for the State.

Mr. Paul J. Ragan for defendant.

Davis, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents the concrete question whether a wife can be prosecuted for larceny, when she has taken and converted to her own use personal property of her husband. The case is easily distinguishable from many of the cases cited in argument, in which there appear schemes of fraud or violence of which marriage is a part or to which it is an incident, or in which the wife or a husband goes away from the other with adulterous intent, the paramour assisting in the asportation and use of the goods of the defrauded spouse, or in which a third person without adulterous intercourse or intent, assisted in appropriating and using the goods which were charged to have been stolen; because none of these elements are found in this record. The bill of exceptions tends to prove that the defendant in error, about three weeks after the alleged crime, admitted that she took the money from the safe and gave it or part of it to her mother, and that she and her husband then joined in a mortgage to secure the repayment of $500 of the amount taken to the brewery company, which had become security for that amount when her husband borrowed it. The court of common pleas directed a verdict of not guilty, to which the prosecuting attorney excepted. This is the whole case as it appears of record.

The state concedes that by the common law the indictment would not be sufficient; but it is contended that, by virtue of § 12,447 of the General Code, "whoever steals anything of value is guilty of larceny;" and also by virtue of the statutes defining the rights and liabilities of husband and wife (§§ 7995-8004, General Code), the legal unity of husband and wife, theretofore recognized as the foundation of the common-law rule, has been abrogated, so far, at least, as to make either spouse liable for larceny from the other.

We get very little aid in the solution of this phase of the question from decisions in other states, because so much depends upon the legislation peculiar to each state and its construction by the local courts. For example, in Arkansas, the Constitution of 1874 (article 9, § 7) provides as follows: "The real and personal property of any feme covert in this state, acquired either before or after marriage, whether by gift, grant, inheritance, devise, or otherwise, shall, so long as she may choose, be and remain her separate estate and property, and may be devised, bequeathed, or conveyed by her the same as if she were a feme sole; and the same shall not be subject to the debts of her husband." The supreme court held that under that clause of the Constitution a husband might be guilty of larceny of his wife's personal property. Hunt v. State, 72 Ark. 241, 65 L.R.A. 71, 105 Am. St. Rep. 34, 79 S. W. 769, 2 Ann. Cas. 33. Although that judgment was reached by a course of reasoning which does not seem to us to be at all conclusive, it must be conceded that it is the law of that jurisdiction. In Beasley v. State, 138 Ind. 552, 46 Am. St. Rep. 418, 38 N. E. 35, the court said: "The learned judge below held the indictment good upon the ground that the recent statutes give the wife exclusive control and authority over her personal property, and have greatly enlarged her personal rights as to the disposition thereof, making contracts and doing whatever a feme sole might do; and that the effect of such statutes is to sever the unity of person and community of property heretofore existing between husband and wife. There seems to be sound logic in this position." It was accordingly held that under the statutes of that state the husband's interest in his wife's property is abolished, and he may be convicted of the larceny of her money.

On the contrary, it was held by the supreme court of Michigan, in Snyder v. People, 26 Mich. 106, 12 Am. Rep. 302, in which case a husband was under indictment for burning his wife's dwelling house, that the statutes of that state for the protection of the rights of married women did not affect the marital unity of husband and wife, and did not change the common-law rule that such burning would not be arson. Cooley, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "As regards her individual property, the law has done little more than to give legal rights and remedies to the wife, where before, by settlement or contract, she might have established corresponding equitable rights and remedies, and the unity of man and woman in the marriage relation is no more broken up by giving her a statutory ownership and control of property, than it would have been before the statute, by such family settlement as should give her the like ownership and control. At the common law, the power of independent action and judgment was in the husband alone; now it is in her also, for many purposes; but the authority in her to own and convey property, and to sue and be sued, is no more inconsistent with the marital unity, than the corresponding authority in him." Similar views are expressed in Thomas v. Thomas, 51 Ill. 162; Walker v. Reamy, 38 Pa. 410; State v. Wincroft, 76 N. C. 38; State v. Matthews, 76 N. C. 41.

Common-law rules have usually been founded upon sound reason and considerations of public policy, and out of this fact has grown the safe maxim that statutes derogating from the common law should be strictly construed. Keeping this maxim in mind, we have found nothing in the statutes of Ohio, and nothing has been pointed out to us, which would justify a conclusion that the general assembly expressly or impliedly abrogated the common-law rule that neither husband nor wife can be prosecuted for a larceny of the goods of the other; and much less an intention to do so. Indeed, we doubt that any member of that body had in contemplation such a result when he voted for the statutes which protect the individual rights of married people. The legislature was contemplating the expressed purpose of the statutes, and that only. They were not at that time considering crimes and criminal procedure; and surely they cannot be presumed to have intended a thing which they did not clearly express and which is fraught with such far-reaching and radical consequences to the law of the domestic relations; for the abrogation of the doctrine of the legal unity of husband and wife, when pushed to its logical conclusion, would not only create crimes where there were none before, but would also authorize a husband and wife to maintain civil actions for tort against the other, such as actions for personal injuries, assault, false imprisonment, or slander (15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed 857), thus multiplying a hundredfold the unhappy differences which have to be settled in the divorce courts. We cannot assume that the legislature intended this without very clear evidence of such an intention in the language of the statutes.

Since the foregoing was written, we have come upon a recent opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States (Thompson v. Thompson, 218 U. S. 611, 54 L. ed. 1180, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1153, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 21 Ann. Cas. 921) in which the court held that the common-law relation between husband and wife was not so far modified by § 1155 of the District of Columbia Code as to give to the wife a right of action to recover damages from her husband for an assault and battery committed by him upon her. The Code section referred to authorizes married women "to sue separately for the recovery, security, or protection of their property, and for torts committed against them, as fully and freely as if they were unmarried." The court's construction of this statute is that it was not intended to give to a married woman a right of action against her husband, but to allow the wife to maintain in her own name such actions in tort as at common law must be brought jointly to the husband and wife; and it was remarked within the power of the legislature to make this, by Justice Day, in the opinion: "Conceding it to be within the power of the legislature to make this alteration in the law, if it saw fit to do so, nevertheless such radical and far-reaching changes should only be wrought by language so clear and plain as to be unmistakable evidence of the legislative intention."

Moreover, the unity of husband and wife, as recognized in the common law, is founded not merely on a community of goods, but upon the recognized obligation of both to the family and to society. The unit of society is not the individual, but the family; and whatever tends to undermine the family, by the irrepealable laws of nature will crumble and destroy the foundations of society and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the state. So that the peace and sanctity of the home and family are the ultimate reason for the common-law rule. We do not think that we can safely hold by mere inference that the legislature has taken such a long step in the direction of destructive legislation.

The foregoing reasoning applies also to § 12,447, General Code.

Exceptions overruled.

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA EX REL.
FLORENCE PATTERSON, Resp't.,

v.

EMORY D. PICKERING, Appt.

(— S. D. —, 136 N. W. 105.)

Limitation of actions — bastardy proceedings.

An action to compel the father of a bastard to contribute to its support is civil, and not governed by the statute of limitations limiting the time for bringing proceedings of a quasi criminal or penal nature.

Note. — Limitation applicable to bastardy proceedings or action to compel support.

"It is not the policy of the law to encourage prosecutions of this kind [bastardy proceedings], brought years after the event," said Maxwell, J., in Denham v. Watson, 24 Neb. 779, 40 N. W. 308, "and unless the testimony shows that the mother from the first had charged the offense upon the putative father, the claim could not be maintained. In other words, the charge made years afterwards must not rest on the mere assertions of the prosecutrix, then made and communicated to the putative father, but must show that from the conception or birth of the child he had been charged by the mother as being the child's father. The law is to be carefully guarded in this respect to prevent it from being used as a means of extorting money upon a false charge. Where, however, the fact of the paternity of the child is satisfactorily proved to charge the putative father, the statute of limitations will not run against a claim for its support during the time it requires the mother's care. The expenses in such case being continuous, the father must provide for them. In other words, he must support his own child, and the statute will not bar such claims."

It has been said that "the process is one of a peculiar character, existing only by statute, and any attempt to class it with APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lawrence County in plaintiff's favor in a bastardy proceeding brought to require defendant to contribute to the support of his illegitimate child. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John T. Milek, for appellant:

The action is, in its nature, quasi criminal.

actions or suits at common law of any description will afford little light. It is not comprehended under any term used in the statutes of limitation, nor does it appear to have been designed to be limited by any of them." Keniston v. Rowe, 16 Me. 38; Wheelwright v. Greer, 10 Allen, 389; 5 Cyc. 647.

"No statute of limitations," says the court in Wheelwright v. Greer, supra, "bars a mother's right to complain against the father of her bastard child."

So, in Denham v. Watson, supra, where the mother, at the first opportunity after the birth of the child, stated to the putative father and others that he was the father, and asked him to provide for its support, and continued so to insist to the time the proceedings were instituted, it was held that the statute of limitations—the exact period of which was not stated in the case—would not run against a claim for its support during the time it required the mother's care, notwithstanding more than four years had elapsed since the birth of the child.

And so, in State ex rel. Washington v. Hunter, 67 Ala. 81, it is held that a proceeding to charge a person as the reputed father of a bastard child is clearly not a misdemeanor, within the meaning of the statute, so as to be barred within twelve months after the commission of the offense, under § 4644 of the Code, since it is neither a civil suit nor a criminal prosecution, but quasi criminal, partaking of the nature of both. It was said: "We can see good reasons why no statute of limitations was prescribed to bar such proceedings. They are chiefly intended for the public indemnity, and to coerce the putative father to support and maintain the unfortunate child. 2 Kent, Com. 215. The duty of maintenance continues for a period of ten years, which, in no case, we apprehend, is to extend beyond the time of the child's minority, or legal infancy. We can see no reason why the statute should be so construed as to require such precipitation in the commencement of the proceedings, as, in many instances readily to be imagined, it would defeat the very purpose of the law."

Nor does a statute limiting actions for statutory penalties and other actions to two years have any application to a proceeding to charge the father of a bastard child with its maintenance. State v. Laughlin, 73 Iowa, 351, 35 N. W. 449; State v. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Sarratt, 14 Rich. L. 29; State v. Compton (Mass. vol. 3, p. 611, May 1827), cited and set out in State v. Sarratt, supra.

So it has been held that a statute relating to crimes and punishments, and requiring the prosecution of certain offenses within one year after their commission, has no application to a prosecution for the support of an illegitimate child, but is confined to actions for forfeitures on penal statutes. State ex rel. Hagaman v. Stafford, 2 Blackf. 412.

But in Bake v. State, 21 Md. 422, it is held that a bastardy proceeding is a criminal proceeding, and is clearly within the provision of a statute requiring that prosecution of offenses must be instituted within one year from the time when the offense was committed.

So, the statute of limitations requiring the prosecution within a year from the commission of the offense begins to run from the birth of the child, and not from the time of the carnal intercourse between the parties. Neff v. State, 57 Md. 385.

Where the defendant flees to avoid arrest on the charge of fornication and bastardy, it is held that the statute of limitations requiring the prosecution to be brought within two years after the commission of such offense does not run until he returns to his customary residence, notwithstanding the fact that his hiding place has, all the while, been within the state. Com. v. Blackburn, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 464.

Of course, a proceeding to charge a defendant as the father of a bastard child must appear to have been commenced within the period prescribed by the statute relating thereto. State v. Ledbetter, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 242, wherein three years was the prescribed limitation.

In State v. Perry, 122 N. C. 1043, 30 S. E. 139, while it is admitted that bastardy proceedings are quasi criminal in nature, it is held they are not governed by the statute of limitations requiring the prosecution of misdemeanors generally within two years, but are governed by the three years' statutory limitation, which is exclusively applicable to bastardy proceedings. "To the same effect is State v. Hedgepeth, 122 N. C. 1039, 30 S. E. 140.

An action under Rev. Code Civ. Proc. § 807, by the mother of a bastard child against the father, to compel him to support the child, is an action on a liability created by statute, other than a penalty

Whiting, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought under chapter 37 of the Code of Civil Procedure, known as the bastardy statute, charging defendant or forfeiture, and is not barred by limitations in two years, but, under § 60, may be brought at any time within six years. State ex rel. Berge v. Patterson, 18 S. D. 251, 100 N. W. 162.

After the lapse of three years from the birth of the child, no application having been made to the court for certain annuities for the support of the child, the court cannot order the putative father to pay the annuities to the mother, as in the nature of a debt of annuity for which he is in default. State v. Howard, 1 Swan, 133, wherein it is also held that notwithstanding the proceedings were not instituted until after the lapse of three years from the birth of the child, it is competent for the court to secure the public against any loss or injury which may ensue by reason of the child becoming a public charge upon the county, by requiring the putative father to give a bond of indemnity, with sureties for such purpose.

And where, as in Denham v. Watson, supra, there was a delay of more than four years after the birth of the bastard child in instituting the proceedings, it was held that expenses of the child, accruing prior to that time, would not be allowed against the father.

In Ex parte Currie, 26 N. B. 576, it was held that § 7 of the Consolidated Statutes, chap. 103, providing that a charge of bastardy shall be tried at the next term of the county court after the birth of the child, is imperative, unless the trial is postponed to a subsequent term, as provided by the statute; so that when, upon the hearing of such a charge, the jury disagreed and it was postponed to the next term, when, owing to the illness of the judge, no court was held, a writ of prohibition was held to be proper to restrain the judge of the county court from afterwards trying the information.

But in Ex parte Reid, 34 N. B. 133, which was an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain a proceeding to hear and determine an information charging one with being the father of a bastard child likely to become a charge on the parish, in which proceeding it appeared that the defendant was neither arrested nor the information entered until after the term of the county court next ensuing the birth of the child, when he denied his guilt, and entered into a recognizance to appear at the next ensuing term, the court was evenly divided on the question whether the writ should issue, and so the matter dropped. Three of the judges thought the writ should not issue because the statute set out in Ex parte Currie, supra, is not applicable until the person charged has given the recognizance; and the Currie Case was distinguished on the ground that since the information in that case was tried and the jury disagreed, without any postponement of the trial at the next term of court, a writ of prohibition was warranted. The remaining judges, considering the Currie Case decisive of the question, thought the writ of prohibition should issue.

The infancy of the mother is no defense for her failure to comply with a specific statute requiring a prosecution for bastardy to be commenced within two years from the birth of the child, even though a general provision of the Code says that "any person being under legal disabilities when the cause accrues may bring his action within two years after the disability is removed." State ex rel. Ulen v. Pavey, 82 Ind. 543. But in this case it is to be observed that still another section of the Code provides that "in special cases, where a different limitation is prescribed by statute, the provisions of this act (the Code) shall not apply."

In Burt v. State, 79 Ind. 359, where the complaint and warrant in a prosecution for bastardy were issued within two years from the birth of the child, as required by the statute, but were lost before service, it was held that under the general rules applicable to lost pleadings and writs in civil cases, copies might be filed and used instead of the originals, and that the origin of the prosecution would date from the time of the original papers.

So, where the prosecution was begun within the two-year period, prescribed by the statute, but the defendant escaped after his arrest, but before trial, it was held that his re-arrest and prosecution nearly four years after the birth of the child was authorized. Patterson v. State, 91 Ind. 364, wherein it was said: "This provision [of the statute] applies to the institution of proceedings before the justice, and not to such proceedings as may be necessary to arrest a defendant who has escaped after the commencement of the suit."

In Warner v. Wheeler, 62 N. H. 385, it appears that the statute in New Hampshire does not allow the complaint to be made by the woman after the birth of the child, but that the town is allowed to sue for security when necessary, either before the birth of the child or "at any time before the expiration of one year from the birth of the child."

with being the father of the illegitimate child of one Florence Patterson, and seeking a judgment requiring such defendant to contribute to the support of such child. The action was brought more than three years and less than six years after the birth of such child. The defendant pleaded the bar of the statute of limitations, claiming that § 86 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, as amended by chapter 129, Laws 1907, applies to an action under said chapter 37. Said section reads as follows: "Section 86. In all other cases an indictment or information for a public offense and all proceedings of a quasi criminal or penal nature, including the forfeiture of existing rights, shall be filed within three years after the commission of the offense or crime made the basis of the prosecution or proceeding; and be it further enacted that this act shall apply to all such offenses and crimes as have heretofore taken place and to all pending proceedings in any of the courts of this state." The trial court held that such section did not apply; that the action was not barred, and, upon the verdict of the jury, rendered judgment against defendant. From such judgment, defendant has appealed; the sole question presented upon the appeal being whether the above holding of the trial court was correct.

It is the contention of appellant that this action is, in its nature, quasi criminal; respondent insists that it is purely civil, and that therefore § 86, supra, has no application thereto. We are of the opinion that respondent is correct.

To determine the nature of an action, we should look, not so much to the method of procedure to be followed, as we should to the end to be attained. This action is one brought, not in any sense to punish the defendant for an offense, legal or moral, but to compel such defendant to furnish money "for the support, maintenance, and education of such child," if he be proven to be the father of same. Code Civ. Proc. § 811.

In fixing the place for trial, it makes no difference where the cause of action arose, where the child was born, or where the mother or child may be domiciled at time action is brought. State ex rel. Berge v. Patterson, 18 S. D. 251, 100 N. W. 162; State v. Etter, 24 S. D. 636, 140 Am. St. Rep. 801, 124 N. W. 957. Except when statutes forbid, the mother may make settlement with the putative father. The rules of evidence are those of a civil case. It is true that the method of procedure partakes, especially in connection with the inception of the action, very much of the nature of proceedings in a criminal action. This is not because the action is in any sense criminal in its nature, but rather because, from the very necessity of the situation, it is necessary to secure the person of the defendant and compel the giving of security, in order to insure the value of any judgment that may eventually be found against the defendant. The proceedings under our statute are, outside of the original arrest, no more criminal in their nature than are those under our statute providing for arrest and bail in a civil action.

In the case of Re Walker, 61 Neb. 803, 86 N. W. 610, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 343, under a statute very similar to our own, the court held, in accordance with a long line of decisions, that the action was civil in character; and the court quoted the following from the case of Stokes v. Sanborn, 45 N. H. 276: "Indeed, it is quite obvious that the object of the law is to redress a civil injury by compelling the putative father to aid the mother in the support of the child, and to indemnify the town chargeable with its support against the expenses which may be incurred thereby, giving to the court the power to require of the father or the mother, or both, security against this liability. . . . Some of the forms of this proceeding, it is true, are borrowed from the criminal law; but these are simply with the view of giving a more summary and stringent character to the process by which the respondent is brought into court and held to answer to the charge, leaving it in most other respects to stand upon the footing of ordinary civil causes. It is therefore held in Marston v. Jenness, 11 N. H. 156, and Little v. Dickinson, 29 N. H. 56, . . . that the respondent is not arraigned, but appears and pleads by attorney. Under a similar law in Massachusetts, this is held to be a civil proceeding. Wilbur v. Crane, 13 Pick. 284; Williams v. Campbell, 3 Met. 209. So in Mariner v. Dyer, 2 Me. 165; Hinman v. Taylor, 2 Conn. 357; Robie v. McNiece, 7 Vt. 419; Gray v. Fulsome, 7 Vt. 452; Smith v. Lint, 37 Me. 546. . . . The service in these cases is by arrest of the body, and security taken for the appearance of the respondent at the proper court, by bond; and, although the form of the proceeding in more summary, yet in substance it is like the cases of arrest and bail in ordinary civil process; and, upon a careful consideration of the question, we are of the opinion that a trial and judgment may be had without the personal attendance of the respondent, or that judgment may be rendered on default."

In some of the earlier decisions of this court, it was held that the action was quasi criminal in its nature; but in State ex rel. Berge v. Patterson, supra, which also involved the question of the bar of the statute of limitations, this court held the action to be civil in character; and that it was not barred until the expiration of six years from time cause of action arose. Appellant insists that what was said in that case upon each of these points was mere dictum and unnecessary to the determination of the real question then before the court; and, furthermore, calls attention to the fact that § 86, supra, as it now reads, was not then in force. We are content to sustain the views of this court as expressed in that case; the same being sustained by the great weight of authority. 5 Cyc. 644; notes to State v. Addington, 11 Ann. Cas. 316. It follows that § 86 of the Code of Criminal Procedure has no application.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 2.)

JAMES J. CONWAY and Wife, Appts.,

v.

MINNESOTA MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Respt.

(62 Wash. 49, 112 Pac. 1106.)

Insurance — forfeiture — reinstatement — control of discretion.

1. The courts will not control the discretion of the officers of an insurance association in refusing to reinstate a member who has forfeited his rights by nonpayment of dues, where the contract provides that any person in such circumstances may be reinstated "in the discretion of the officers," "upon his furnishing them satisfactory evidence that he is in good health;" at least, where there are facts bearing upon the question of his health which might influence the sound judgment and good conscience of an officer to decide against reinstatement.

Same — use of intoxicants — age.

2. The court cannot hold that a misrepresentation by an insured as to his age and the amount of intoxicants used during a day is not so material to the risk as to influence against reinstatement the sound judgment and good conscience of officers of the company in whom is vested the discretion as to his reinstatement after forfeiture of the policy for nonpayment of dues, upon his furnishing satisfactory evidence of health.

Same — waiver of provision — subordinate officer.

3. An insurance company which permits payments of overdue premiums without insisting on proof of good health on the part of insured, as provided by the contract, does not waive its right to require such proof before permitting reinstatement after a subsequent forfeiture; at least, where the first default was condoned by a subordinate officer who had no authority to bind the company without bringing it to the attention of the officers in whom was vested the power to enforce or waive the forfeiture.

(Dunbar, Ch. J., and Rudkin, J., dissent.)

(February 1, 1911.)

Note. — Insurance: judicial control of discretion as to reinstatement of insured.

For an extended treatment of the general question of conclusiveness of decisions of tribunals of associations or corporations, see note to Ryan v. Cudahy, 49 L.R.A. 353.

The decision in CONWAY v. MINNESOTA MUT. L. INS. CO. to the effect that the courts will not control the discretion of officers in whom is vested the right to determine as to whether or not the insured has furnished satisfactory evidence of good health, at least, where they have acted in evident good faith, is supported by the authorities. Thus, in Kennedy v. Grand Fraternity, 36 Mont. 325, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 78, 92 Pac. 971, it was held that an applicant for reinstatement in a mutual benefit society cannot complain of a decision adverse to him, made in the exercise of the discretion vested in an officer of the society authorized to pass upon the sufficiency of a certificate of health, required as a condition precedent to reinstatement to membership. And, continuing, the court said that granting that the officer in whom discretion as to the sufficiency of the certificate of health was vested could not arbitrarily refuse to approve the certificate if it was satisfactory to him, it could not be said as matter of law that he had abused 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the discretion by rejecting an applicant who had had pneumonia about two months prior to the making of the application, and had been confined in bed for several weeks, as serious after-effects sometimes follow pneumonia, although the applicant stated that he felt better "at the present time" than he had for years. And in Lane v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. 142 N. C. 55, 115 Am. St. Rep. 729, 54 S. E. 854, in holding that the court could not control the discretion of the officers as to reinstatement of an insured, at least, in the absence of any showing that the action of the officers was fraudulent or arbitrary, it was said: "In the absence, certainly, of any showing that the approval of the officers has been fraudulently withheld and that their denial of the application is purely arbitrary, we do not see why their refusal to reinstate the plaintiff is not fatal to his right of recovery in this action. We are not called upon in this case to say under what circumstances, if any, we would decide that the action of the officers designated to pass upon the application of a delinquent member could be investigated, with a view to ascertain whether they have exercised their judgment properly, or have unreasonably deprived him of any right to which he is entitled under the terms of his contract and the by-laws of the company. A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County dismissing an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful refusal to reinstate a life insurance policy after forfeiture by nonpayment of dues. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Boyle, Warburton, & Brockway for appellants.

Messrs. Hudson & Holt, for respondent:

The officers of defendant company had the right, in the exercise of their discretion, to reject the application for readmission according to the dictates of their own judgment and conscience, uncontrolled by the judgment or conscience of others.

There can be no waiver or estoppel unless the person against whom the waiver is claimed had full knowledge of his rights and of facts which would enable him to take effectual action for the enforcement of his rights.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from a judgment of dismissal, in an action to recover damages for the alleged wrongful refusal to reinstate a life insurance policy, after forfeiture by nonpayment of assessments and dues. There is no dispute as to the facts, from which it appears that on November 13, 1894, the Bankers' Life Association of St. Paul, Minnesota, which subsequently changed its corporate name to that of respondent, issued its policy of insurance upon the life of James J. Conway in the sum of $2,000. This policy was upon the co-operative assessment plan, providing for annual dues and mortuary assessments according to the terms of the articles of incorporation, which by reference were made a part of the policy. In July, 1908, an assessment of $40 became due under the policy, which Conway received notice of, but failed and neglected to pay, whereby his policy lapsed. On November 5, 1908, he applied for reinstatement, forwarding to the company the July assessment, with $7.50 dues and a certificate from Dr. Libbey that he was then in good health. On November 11th the company acknowledged the receipt of $47.50, and informed Conway that his certificate had lapsed, but that he might be reinstated upon furnishing satisfactory evidence of present good health; but that, in order to procure such reinstatement, it would be necessary for him to be examined by Dr. Dewey, the medical examiner of the company at Tacoma, and such examination must disclose a satisfactory condition of health. In the same letter Conway was informed the company would not accept the other legal wrong, there can be no valid reason why the applicant should be permitted to attack the soundness of their judgment or the justness of their conclusion." And see Graveson v. Cincinnati Life Asso. 6 Ohio C. D. 327, 8 Ohio C. C. 171, affirming 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint 369, and affirmed without opinion in 56 Ohio St. 725, 49 N. E. 1110 (set out at length in CONWAY v. MINNESOTA MUT. L. INS. CO.), holding that the court will not disturb the decision of the association officers when made in good faith, and not arbitrary or capricious. And see Murray v. Supreme Hive, L. O. T. M. 112 Tenn. 664, 80 S. W. 827, wherein it was held that the only question to be considered by the court in a suit to reinstate an expelled member in a benefit association was whether the order had acted arbitrarily or unreasonably; and that when the charge was that it had acted arbitrarily, unjustly, and oppressively, it could not be prevented from disproving such allegations by marshaling the information upon which it acted.

But it seems that where the officer in whom is vested the authority to determine whether or not the applicant for reinstatement has satisfactorily complied with the conditions acts arbitrarily, or considers elements not properly entering into a consideration of the question presented, the courts will set aside a decision adverse to the applicant. Thus, in Van Houten v. Pine, 38 N. J. Eq. 72, where the by-laws of a mutual benefit society provided that a delinquent should be reinstated upon "rendering a satisfactory excuse" for the delinquency and paying the sum in arrear, it was held that the action of the board of directors in refusing to reinstate a delinquent would be set aside and the applicant declared reinstated, the excuse given having been considered satisfactory by the board, but the delinquent's physical condition having been taken into account adversely to him. In arriving at this conclusion the court said that "under such circumstances as this case presents it is proper for the court to determine the question whether the member was properly excluded or not; to decide whether the action of the trustees or agents to whom the management of the affairs of the association was intrusted was lawful or not; to judge whether the member, by the imputed misconduct or alleged delinquency, ought reasonably to be held to have forfeited his claim to the advantages which the society promised, and in view of which he had, up to the time of the alleged exclusion, discharged his duties to it." And in Leonard v. Prudential Ins. Co. 128 Wis. 348, 116 Am. St. Rep. 50, 107 N. W. 646, which involved a similar by-law under which the insurance company had refused to reinstate an ap-$47.50, and the same was returned. On November 17th Conway presented himself to Dr. Dewey for medical examination, and the doctor's certificate was mailed to the company. On December 11th Conway was informed by the company that his application for reinstatement was rejected.

The question now submitted is: Did Conway have such a legal right to reinstatement as can be enforced against the denial of such right by the company. It will readily be admitted, as stated in Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, at page 2395, that, after a forfeiture of a life insurance policy because of nonpayment of assessments, "the right to reinstatement depends on the provisions of the contract. Since the right is not absolute, the insurer may impose such conditions as it sees fit, not contrary to public policy, on which reinstatement may be had. Saerwein v. Jamour, 32 Misc. 701, 65 N. Y. Supp. 501." Upon the same page the rule is also laid down that compliance with the conditions gives the delinquent an absolute right to reinstatement, if the provisions of the contract do not make the reinstatement optional with the officers of the company. The provision of the contract in this instance is found in the articles of incorporation, and is as follows: "Any person, having once been a member of this company, may be readmitted in the discretion of the officers of this association, upon his furnishing them satisfactory evidence that he is in good health, and upon his paying to said association all assessments due and other sums of money which he would have been called upon to pay to his association had he continued to be a member thereof." Respondent contends, which was also the theory upon which the court below made its order of dismissal, that this provision destroys the absolute right to reinstatement, and makes such reinstatement optional with the officers of the company in providing that readmission shall be in their discretion, and that the evidence of good health shall be such as is satisfactory to them, and, that having so acted, such discretion is not reviewable in the courts; while appellants contend that the word "discretion" is to be construed in the sense of judicial discretion, and may be reviewed when it appears to have been arbitrarily exercised, as they claim here. While it may be difficult to give a satisfactory definition of the term "judicial discretion," because of the wide difference of the authorities as to its nature, it may be said to be a discretion that is sound and guided by the fixed principles of law. 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 819. But, even in cases calling for the exercise of such discretion, it will not be reviewed except for its manifest abuse. Such is, we believe, the universal rule. Where, however, discretion is vested in a nonjudicial body, such as trus-plicant, not because of any insufficiency or defect in the certificate furnished by him, but upon secret information obtained by defendants, the court, in holding that the rejection of the application must be set aside, said that the agreement to restore the policy upon specified conditions when they were satisfied according to the prescribed procedure, and wanting only insurer's judgment upon the record, carried with it by necessary implication the obligation to act reasonably and with fairness to the assured; that insurer had no right of arbitrary refusal, or right to act upon information secretly obtained without opportunity for assured to meet it; that the company was entitled to be satisfied as to the insurability of the applicant before restoring the policy, but that it had no right by proceeding outside of anything contemplated by the contract to court dissatisfaction. And in McNeil v. Southern Tier Masonic Relief Asso. 40 App. Div. 581, 58 N. Y. Supp. 119, under similar by-laws and circumstances as to satisfactory excuse, except that the applicant for reinstatement was considered too old, a similar conclusion was reached. So, in Dennis v. Massachusetts Ben. Asso. 120 N. Y. 496, 9 L.R.A. 189, 17 Am. St. Rep. 660, 24 N. E. 843, affirming 47 Hun, 338, under like circumstances it was held that what constituted "valid reasons" was not to be arbitrarily determined by officers of a benefit association, but that their determination was subject to review in the courts. And see Misell v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. 76 N. Y. 115, which is to the same effect. See also Lovick v. Providence Life Asso. 110 N. C. 93, 14 S. E. 506, wherein it was held that the officers of the benefit association could not arbitrarily and unjustly refuse to reinstate the member.

But in Harrington v. Keystone Mut. Ben. Asso. 190 Pa. 77, 42 Atl. 523, where the by-law provided that "the executive committee shall have power to reinstate a delinquent member at any time within a year upon satisfactory evidence of good health and upon payment of all delinquent premiums," it was held that the decision of the committee was final, the court saying: "Conceding, for the purpose of argument, that her application was in time, and that she complied or was ready and willing to fully comply with all the terms and conditions of the by-laws above quoted, it does not follow that the committee was bound to reinstate her to membership in the association. While the by-laws empowered them to grant her request, they were not bound nor could they be compelled to do so. It neither clothed her with any legal or equitable right, nor did it impose any duty or obligation on the association that would enable her, as a delinquent member, to maintain this action."

tees or officers of a corporation, or other public functionaries, its exercise does not call for the application of any fixed rules or principles of law, and its meaning cannot be so limited nor restricted, since to do so would be to take such a discretion away from the body upon which it is conferred and bestow it upon some other body, and so on ad infinitum, so long as the right of appeal or review existed. In the case of Oneida C. P. Judges v. People, 18 Wend. 79, 99, Senator Tracy, in his opinion, while not clear in his mind as to the proper meaning of a discretion that is governed by legal principles, finds no difficulty in defining a discretion that is not so controlled, and says at p. 99: "It means, when applied to public functionaries, a power or right conferred upon them by law of acting officially in certain circumstances, according to the dictates of their own judgment and conscience, uncontrolled by the judgment or conscience of others." A like construction is adopted in Brown v. State, 109 Ala. 70, 83, 20 So. 103, 108, where, in reviewing the provisions of the statutes of Alabama in fixing the punishment for certain crimes by providing such punishment shall be "at the discretion of the jury," the court says at p. 83: "The words of the statute, 'at their discretion,' are peculiarly significant and expressive of the freedom in the exercise of judgment, of the liberty of action and decision, intrusted, and exclusively intrusted, to the jury. The discretion they are to exercise, and exercise in obedience to their own consciences only, is the choice of election between the alternative punishments. The discretion is legal in the sense that it is derived from and conferred by law. But it is not of the nature of judicial discretion, which is said to be controlled by fixed legal principles. . . . It must have been foreseen and anticipated that there would be jurors reluctant to inflict capital punishment, . . . that there would be some reluctant to convict on circumstantial evidence, and that not infrequently there would be some not so fully satisfied as others that the evidence of guilt reached the standard the law prescribes. These are considerations which will influence the jury in choosing between the alternative punishments,—a choice they must make according to the dictates of their own judgment and consciences, and which cannot be controlled or directed by the judgments or consciences of others."

We do not know the facts operating upon the minds of the officers of this company, inducing them to exercise their discretion against the reinstatement of this applicant, nor why his evidence of good health was not satisfactory to them, except as we read the record and find therein facts which might 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

have influenced them in arriving at the conclusion they did. In his first application for membership Conway gave his age as about fifty years, and in response to an inquiry as to the extent of his use of ardent spirits, wine, or malt liquors, answered, "One glass a day." In his application for reinstatement he gave the date of his birth as March 22, 1842, which would have made his age fifty-two years, seven months, and nine days at the time of his first application. In both he stated that his father and mother both died from unknown causes when he was a child. In response to an inquiry as to his use of liquors each day, he answered, "Malt liquors, two or three glasses; wine, none; spirits, two or three drinks." In his first application the medical examiner rated him as a first-class risk. In his application for reinstatement he was rated as a first-class risk, "except for age and amount of stimulants taken." Statements as to age and habit as to use of liquors are statements material to the risk, and, while we do not hold as a matter of law that the discrepancies here noted would in themselves be sufficient to avoid the policy or to prevent reinstatement, if such question was purely one of law and properly submitted to us as such, we cannot say that they would not influence the sound judgment and good conscience of an officer of an insurance company in whom discretion is vested to pass upon such matters. Neither can we eliminate from this contract the fact that this medical examination upon application for reinstatement must disclose a condition of good health satisfactory, not to the applicant nor to the physician conducting the medical examination, but to the officers of this company in whom, by his contract, the applicant had placed the judgment and discretion to decide,—a decision they must arrive at "according to the dictates of their own judgment and consciences, and which cannot be controlled or directed by the judgment or conscience of others." To hold otherwise would be to destroy that element of individuality and personal judgment which must enter into any decision, and to substitute for the discretion and satisfaction of one body the discretion and satisfaction of other bodies, strangers to the contract and not within its contemplation, and making the contract read in effect that reinstatements may be had upon the applicant furnishing evidence of reasonably good health, instead of, as it does read, "in the discretion of the officers of this association, upon his furnishing them satisfactory evidence that he is in good health."

The nearest case in point we have found is Graveson v. Cincinnati Life Asso. 6 Ohio C. D. 327, 8 Ohio C. C. 171, where the policy was forfeited on March 11th for failure to pay an assessment due March 1st. In September following the insured offered to pay all arrearages, and asked for reinstatement. The rules of the association provided for medical examiners whose duty it was to make all examinations, and who might accept or reject applications. The association having declared its willingness to reinstate the applicant upon his furnishing a satisfactory medical examination, he submitted to such examination, and, as a result thereof, was rejected; the only reason given by the medical examiner being that the applicant's pulse was between 76 and 100. The court, in touching upon this feature of the case, says: "This brings us to the only remaining question in the case, and that is, as to the medical examination,—was it satisfactory? In the first place, to whom was it to be satisfactory? The constitution and by-laws provided that as to all applications it should be within the discretion of the medical director to accept or decline any application; but, as to forfeiture, it provided that by 'furnishing a new and satisfactory application and medical examination' one might be restored, saying nothing as to whom this examination should be satisfactory. We are of the opinion, however, that this examination must be satisfactory to the medical director. It certainly could not have been intended that the examination should only be satisfactory to the applicant, or to anyone whom he might select to make the examination. Why should the defendant require the performance of these conditions if they were not to be satisfactory to the defendant?" This case was affirmed without opinion by the supreme court of Ohio in 56 Ohio St. 725, 49 N. E. 1110.

We will discuss one other feature, and that is appellants' contention that the company waived its right to reject the application in accepting dues and assessments from him on a prior occasion, after the time fixed for their payment, and also in writing him that his right to reinstatement was conditioned upon his "furnishing satisfactory evidence of present good health." What we have said disposes of the latter contention, such satisfactory evidence of good health meaning satisfactory to the company, and giving it the right of rejection if, in the exercise of the discretion vested in it, such evidence was not satisfactory. In support of the first feature of this contention, appellant testified that he knew the time for payment had passed, but thought he would be reinstated by showing he was in good health, "because it happened once before. I was behind once before in my delinquency, and had no trouble at all." This would not be sufficient to estop the company from now 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) insisting upon the provisions of the contract. A party to a contract who does not take immediate steps to forfeit it because of a default in payment does not thereby lose his right to insist upon a forfeiture for subsequent nonpayments. Cash v. Meisenheimer, 53 Wash. 576, 102 Pac. 429; Garvey v. Barkley, 56 Wash. 24, 104 Pac. 1108; Walker v. McMurchie, 61 Wash. 489, 112 Pac. 500. This same contention was raised in Graveson v. Cincinnati Life Asso. supra, and it was there held that such a payment, being accepted by the secretary of the company (to whom the payments were also made in the case at bar), would not constitute a binding waiver; it not appearing that it was done with the knowledge and approval of the officers of the company in whom the power of forfeiture existed. Such is the case here. The secretary not having the right to forfeit, his unknown and unapproved act could not bind the company where the act of the company complained of is based, not alone on the failure to pay the assessment when due, but upon the failure to pass a satisfactory medical examination upon the application for reinstatement.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the judgment of dismissal was rightly entered, and the same is affirmed.

Note. — Insurance, in name of partnership, of property the legal title of which is in the name of individuals.

The decision in SCOTT v. DIXIE F. INS. Co. to the effect that the fact that the title to property insured in the partnership name stood in the names of the individual members of the firm at the time it was insured did not constitute a breach of a condition providing for a forfeiture "if the interests of the assured in property be not truly stated. . . . or if the interests not closed, and the share or assets of the decedent is not withdrawn, but the firm business goes on in the firm name as before, his administrator acting as a copartner. In this state of things, a fire insurance policy, after such death of a member, is issued in the name of the firm, insuring a house belonging to it, though the legal title is in the members as individuals. The administrator may join the other members, in a suit in the names of all, as partners, on the policy, to recover the loss from destruction of the house by fire. It is no misjoinder of plaintiffs.

of the assured be other than the unconditional and sole ownership," seems sound, as does the further decision that the partnership had an insurable interest in such property.

A search has disclosed little authority dealing with like questions.

In Missouri Sav. Assn. v. German-American Ins. Co. 73 Mo. App. 158, it was held that a stipulation of a policy providing that it should be void if the interest of the insured was other than the unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of the insurance was a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple, was not violated where the insured property before the formation of the partnership belonged to one member of the firm, and after the formation of the firm and before the issuance of the policy he executed a deed of the property to the partnership in its company name. The court said: "Whatever may be said as to the capacity of the lodge company to take a conveyance of the legal title to the property, it is nevertheless clear that the parties who were doing business under that name were the absolute, equitable owners of the property, and held the same free of all conditions or claims of other parties. And it has been repeatedly held that such ownership is sufficient to answer the demands of a policy such as we have here."

In American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Heath, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 445, 69 S. W. 235, it was held that the mere fact that property belonging to a person was insured in the firm name under which he carried on business did not avoid the policy, and the fact that the other member of the firm was a clerk in the store was held not to affect the case. The court said: "The property did in reality belong to a firm called Heath & Blackwell, was insured in the name of the firm, and there was no evidence of any misrepresentation as to the ownership of the property. As said by this court in the case of Bonnet v. Merchants' Ins. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 42 S. W. 316: 'There is no statute of this state that prohibits the use of firm names which fail to indicate the members of the partnership, and appellant had the right to do business for himself under a firm name, if he so desired, and the right to insure his property in that firm name. His representation that the property belonged to Bonnet Brothers was correct, at the same time that he owned the 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Insurance — partnership property — death of partner — interest.

2. A lot of land is conveyed to a number of persons in their individual names, but with intention to be used in the business of a partnership, and by them put into the partnership business and used in it; the firm in possession of and using the lot and house on it in its business. One of the partners died; his share of the naked legal title being in his heirs. After his death, the house is insured against loss by fire in the name of the firm. There is here no violation of a clause in the policy that "if the entire interest in the goods.' This principle would not be altered by the fact that Blackwell was clerking in the store. Heath did not make any representation as to who composed the firm of Heath & Blackwell, and his silence on that point did not mislead appellant. If it was solicitous as to who composed the firm, it should have interrogated Heath, and if he had then made statements contrary to the facts, appellant might have some basis for its contention. The allegation in the petition that the firm was composed of E. N. Heath and N. Blackwell was not evidence of misrepresentation, and the only question the pleading would present would be one of variance between pleading and proof, and that would not be tenable."

In Bonnet v. Merchants' Ins. Co. supra, referred to by the court in the preceding case, it was held that where one partner withdrew from a firm and the other continued business alone under the firm name, a provision of a policy that it should become void if the insured concealed or misrepresented any material fact, or if his interest was not fully stated, was not violated, although the policy was taken out by the insured in the firm name. To the same effect are Delaware Ins. Co. v. Bonnet, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 107, 48 S. W. 1104; and Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Bonnet, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 48 S. W. 1110.

In Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 14 Wall. 504, 20 L. ed. 729, a policy issued in the name of a nominal partnership covering goods held by the nominal partner on commission, the legal title to which was in third parties, was sustained. The points, considered, however, were as to whether insurance could be effected in the name of a nominal partnership, and as to whether the omission to notify the insurer of the dissolution of the partnership avoided the policy.

It has been held, however, that a partnership has no insurable interest in the household ornamental and kitchen furniture of one of the partners and his wife, or in their wearing apparel. Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Hall, 94 Ga. 630, 21 S. E. 828.

For a note on formation of partnership or change in personnel of firm as affecting a change of title or ownership, stipulated against in insurance policies, see American Steam Laundry Co. v. Hamburg Bremen F. Ins. Co. 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 442. J. T. W.

Same — insurable interest.

3. Real estate acquired for a partnership with partnership means, and used in its business, gives the partnership an "insurable interest" to warrant a policy insuring it against loss by fire.

Same — equitable title.

4. An equitable title to real estate gives an insurable interest to warrant a policy in the name of its owner, insuring it against loss by fire.

Same — denial of liability — waiver.

5. Denial by an insurance company of liability on other grounds, within the time allowed for furnishing preliminary proofs of loss, is, in law, a waiver of the conditions of the policy requiring such proof.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Dixie Fire Insurance Company issued an insurance policy to Scott & Calloway, insuring a house. The house being destroyed by fire, an action was brought against that company in the names, as plaintiffs, of L. P. Scott, J. P. Calloway, A. B. Ellis, S. S. Boyd, Shedrick Hughes, in his own right and as administrator of Randolph Hughes, deceased, as partners in the name of Scott & Calloway, and a judgment having been rendered on a verdict for the plaintiffs for $1,050, the company obtained a writ of error.

As one point of error, it is claimed that there could be no recovery because of a misjoinder of plaintiffs. Here it is said that the administrator cannot join with the other parties, and there could be no joint recovery. The facts are that the property was conveyed by one Smith to Scott, Calloway, and a number of others as individuals, the deed not indicating any partnership, but intended for such use. On its conveyance, the grantees formed a partnership, under the name of Thompson & Scott, to carry on the liquor business, using the house in such business, and treating the house as partnership property. By subsequent conveyance, the house came to be owned in the name of Scott, Calloway, Boyd, Ellis, Shedrick Hughes, and heirs of Randolph Hughes.

Such was the title when the policy of insurance issued. The partnership name was changed from Thompson & Scott to Scott & Calloway. The house was occupied and used in the partnership business of Scott & Calloway when the policy issued to them in that name. The property was, so far as legal title is concerned, in the name, as individuals of plaintiffs Scott, Calloway, Ellis, Boyd, Shedrick Hughes, and heirs of Randolph Hughes. Before the policy issued, Randolph Hughes had died, and Shedrick Hughes, as his administrator, still participated in the business; and it was carried on with him as a partner, individually and as administrator.

Realty purchased with partnership assets for partnership purposes, though deeded to individuals, is partnership property, and is personal property as to creditors and between partners. Davis v. Christian, 15 Gratt. 11; Brooke v. Washington, 8 Gratt. 248, 56 Am. Dec. 142; Pierce v. Trigg, 10 Leigh, 406. As held in Miller v. Ferguson, 107 Va. 251, 122 Am. St. Rep. 840, 57 S. E. 649, 13 Ann. Cas. 138, it is to every intent considered personal property not only as between the partners and their creditors, but also between the survivors and the representatives of the deceased.

It is so far personalty that a widow of a partner cannot have dower in the realty itself. Parrish v. Parrish, 88 Va. 529, 14 S. E. 325. I admit this is the rule in the court of equity, not law, and I do not say that such consideration alone would call for recovery; but I introduce that view to say that, though not technically at law the property of the firm, yet in equity it is, and that furnished right to the firm to take insurance in its name. In equity, partnership property, and in actual possession of the firm; the individuals holding title only for the firm, as a dry trustee holds for a cestui que trust in possession. The company chose to issue the policy thus; and it cannot raise this question, which at best is one between the other parties.

We cannot say the title was misrepresented, as the firm was substantial owner. It had substantial interest to be injured by the burning of the house. "Whoever may fairly be said to have a reasonable expectation of deriving pecuniary advantage from the preservation of the subject of insurance, whether that advantage inures to him personally or as representative of rights of others, has insurable interest." Hogg, Pleading & Forms, § 29. If this firm had care and custody of the property for those holding legal title, though not expressed in the policy, it has an insurable interest. "In general, to give a party an insurable interest, . . . it is not necessary that he have any actual right of property, either legal or equitable, in the subject insured; but it is sufficient if he, or those whom he represents, will suffer any sort of loss from its destruction." Sheppard v. Peabody Ins. Co. 21 W. Va. 368. There it was held that an administrator has an insurable interest in realty, if the personalty is not sufficient to pay debts. If we regard this firm as owner, of course, it has an interest; but say that the title is in the individuals. Then those individuals are trustees, holding for the firm; then the full equity is in the firm, and it is well settled that the owner of the equitable title may insure in his name. Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, vol. 1, 150, citing Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Pet. 25, 7 L. ed. 335, and many other cases. This consideration clearly justifies insurance and recovery in the name of the firm. Moreover, it is seen in Cooley's Briefs on Insurance (vol. 1, 151), that "possession, though without title, is sufficient to give the possessor an insurable interest. And where the possession is coupled with a beneficial use, the possessor has an insurable interest." "The interest one must have in the property insured, in order to give him an insurable interest, need be only slight and contingent." 1 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 149. I stop to ask, How can the insurance company raise a question on this ground? If the firm had to account to the holder of the legal title, payment by it to the firm would be good. But it is owner. Its members own.

I have been considering the case as if the policy issued in Randolph Hughes' life. This being a money demand, the administrator could unite with the others in suit. In Clarkson v. Booth, 17 Gratt. 490, it is held that, where one of several tenants in common owned a slave and one died, his administrator must join in an action to recover the slave. The policy issued after his death. His administrator, as a matter of fact, continued his assets in the business; and while he was a partner the insurance was taken out. Here is a contract with the firm, the administrator a member,—a contract with him. A mere money demand comes from it. He, as administrator, has an interest. Under those facts, it is much plainer that the administrator could join. Legal title to the money was in him jointly with others. Again, if the administrator is not a proper party, as the right would be in the survivors, would not his presence be treated as surplusage? Goshorn v. County Ct. 42 W. Va. 735, 26 S. E. 452. So I conclude there was no misjoinder.

I opine that the defense most relied upon is a falsity under that clause of the policy saying that, "if the interest of the insured in the property be not truthfully stated herein, . . . or if the interests of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership," the policy should be void. What is said above will largely apply under this head to show that the firm had insurable interests, equitable title,—was real owner in possession. This clause "is held to refer to character and quality of title,—to the actual and substantial ownership,—rather than the strictly legal title; in other words, the insured interest must be such that he would sustain the whole loss if the property is destroyed." Who but the firm would in this case? "If the insured has an equitable title, it is a sufficient compliance with the condition requiring sale and unconditional ownership in the insured." 2 Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, 1367. One in possession under oral contract of sale surely could insure, though he has no title or color of legal title. I have above shown that the firm was full equitable owner. Moreover, the agent who took the policy knew the state of title. No false statement as to title was made. There were no questions asked, no statement made; and, if the insured had stated that right to the property was in the firm, it would have been true, under the law of insurance, for reasons above given.

The policy contains a clause that loss should not be payable until sixty days after notice and proof of loss. No proof of loss was made; but it was waived. Soon after the loss, an adjuster examined the place of the fire, took measurements, and obtained full information. No objection made as to fact or extent of loss. The adjuster made objection only on the ground that plaintiffs were not sole owners, and admitted that the loss was greater than the amount of the insurance. He referred the matter to the general agent, who wrote, stating that the company resisted payment because the true ownership had not been stated in the policy. This was within sixty days. He did not demand proof of loss, or allege that as a ground of nonpayment. This was a waiver of that defense. Medley v. German Alliance Ins. Co. 55 W. Va. 342, 47 S. E. 101, 2 Ann. Cas. 99; Morris v. Dutchess Ins. Co. 67 W. Va. 368, 68 S. E. 22. If a company refuse to pay upon independent ground before proof of loss is made, and before the time within which proof is to be made, such denial is a waiver of proof. After such denial of liability, suit could be brought at once; but was not brought before five months after the fire. We see no just defense to the insurance claim,—no reason why the company should not make its policy good.

Judgment affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK OF BLUE-FIELD, Plff. in Err.,

v.

HAROLD A. RITZ.

(— W. Va. —, 74 S. E. 679.)

Corporation — knowledge of agent — notice — personal transactions.

Knowledge by one of the officials of a bank, acquired in a capacity other than as its representative, relating to infirmity in commercial paper offered for discount, is not notice to the bank, when that official is also an officer of the corporation seeking the discount, and has an interest in the transaction so adverse to the bank that the reasonable presumption is that he would not communicate the knowledge to it.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By this action in debt, the plaintiff bank seeks to recover from defendant the amount of two negotiable notes which he indorsed. The notes were made by the Southern West Virginia Fuel Company, and were discounted by the plaintiff for the benefit of that company.

Fowler, at whose request defendant indorsed, was president of the fuel company, and also president of the bank,—a director in both corporations. Defendant also was a director in both corporations.

Defendant filed a special plea in which he avers, substantially, that he was merely an accommodation indorser of the notes at the request of Fowler as president of the fuel company; that Fowler represented to him that the company was sorely in need of funds and money must be raised for its use by discounting notes; that he signed the notes with a distinct agreement between himself and Fowler that the other directors of the company would indorse them before they were discounted; that it was also agreed that the notes should not be used until a writing was signed by all the indorsers, stipulating that the directors of the company, as indorsers, were liable only in proportion to their stock; that such a writing was prepared by defendant and was signed by him, Fowler, and Shands, that Fowler was to obtain the signatures of the other directors to this writing as well as to the notes; that, notwithstanding these agreements, Fowler had the notes discounted at the bank, indorsed only by himself, the defendant, and Shands, without the indorsement of the four other directors, and without securing these others to sign the writing relating to the extent of liability; and that, at the time the notes were discounted, the bank had notice of these agreements in the premises and was therefore advised of the infirmity of the paper in relation to defendant when it became the holder of the same.

A trial by jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff, by writ of error, comes seeking a reversal.

Defendant rests his case on the assertion that the bank had notice of the infirmity in the paper through the knowledge of Fowler, its president and managing officer. That knowledge, it will be observed, Fowler obtained as an officer of the fuel company. It did not come to him as an officer of the bank.

An instruction was given on behalf of defendant over the objection of plaintiff. It is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this case that William E. Fowler was president of the American National Bank, the plaintiff in this case, and that he agreed with the defendant that the notes sued on in this case, or the notes for which said notes, or either of them, is a renewal, should not be discounted at said bank until they had been indorsed by William E. Fowler, William Shands, J. Lee Harne, S. M. Smith, W. P. Hawley, F. L. Black, and the defendant, directors of the Southern West Virginia Fuel Company, and that said notes should not be discounted at said bank until the written agreement introduced in evidence in this case had been signed by all of said directors of the Southern West Virginia Fuel Company, and if the jury further believe from the evidence in this case that the said William E. Fowler violated the said agreement with the defendant by causing the said notes to be discounted and the amount thereof placed to the credit of the said Southern West Virginia Fuel Company without the indorsements of all the persons aforesaid, and without all of said persons having signed the said contract in accordance with the said agreement, then the jury shall find for the defendant." Plainly, this instruction assumes that the knowledge which Fowler had of the agreement that the notes were not to be delivered until the proposed indorsements and signatures were obtained was notice to the bank of which he was president. Was the trial court justified in thus virtually assuming as matter of law that notice to Fowler was notice to the bank?

It does not appear that the exclusive management of the bank had been committed to Fowler. No resolution of the directors or long-existing custom held out to the public establishes that he had the power to act absolutely in behalf of the bank. It is not shown that he alone was the bank, so that there could be no other channel of notice to it. On the other hand, it appears that the bank had a full board of directors. It is not proved that they were so derelict in their duties that those duties necessarily passed to Fowler. We must assume that they were managing the bank as the law required them to do, since it does not appear that they were not. Besides, the 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) bank had an active cashier, who was also a director. We must assume that he exercised his powers as a director and as the cashier. The identity of Fowler and the bank were not the same. He was not the bank,—he was merely one of its agents. So there were others entitled to information in the affairs of the bank. There were other officers to whom it was Fowler's duty to communicate knowledge received by him affecting the bank, and to whom it must ordinarily be presumed he would communicate such knowledge. They had the power to disapprove his acts.

The general rule that knowledge or notice on the part of the agent is notice to the principal is based on the duty of the agent to communicate all material information to his principal, and the presumption that he has done so. In short, this rule rests on the presumption that the agent will do his duty to the principal by communicating material information to the latter. The rule cannot stand without this presumption. In this case, the presumption does not arise. It is not to be presumed that Fowler communicated to the other officers of the bank the knowledge which he had as to the infirmity in the notes. It was to his interest to remain silent. He was president of the corporation which needed the funds by a discount of the notes. He was acting for an interest which was adverse to the interest of the bank. So an exception to the general rule applies. That exception prevails "in case of such conduct by the agent as raises a clear presumption that he would not communicate the fact in controversy, as where the agent acts for himself, in his own interest, and adversely to that of the principal." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1145. "No agent who is acting in his own antagonistic interest, or who is about to commit a fraud by which his principal will be affected, does in fact inform the latter, and any conclusion drawn from a presumption that he has done so is contrary to all experience of human nature." Gunster v. Scranton Illuminating, H. & P. Co. 181 Pa. 327, 59 Am. St. Rep. 650, 37 Atl. 550.

Defendant was a director of the bank, and of course knew that Fowler was also a director and the president. He also knew that Fowler, in the particular transaction of the discount of these notes, had an interest adverse to the bank. Defendant, therefore, could not rely on the mere knowledge which Fowler had received in a transaction outside of his line of duty as a bank official as being notice to the bank. He was bound to observe that this knowledge was not the kind of notice to an officer that is directly imputable to the bank in any event, but that to make it notice there must be a presumption that Fowler would communicate it to the bank. He could not rely on such a presumption, for he well knew Fowler's adverse interest. Under such circumstances he should have given direct notice to the bank, if he desired to protect himself. He should have given notice that would be presumed to reach the bank. Instead, defendant in fact constituted Fowler as his agent to see the notes perfected and the writing fully signed, intrusting that agent with negotiable instruments which he could pass to an innocent holder and thereby bind defendant. If there is loss should it not fall on defendant? He should have observed that he placed Fowler in a position to have the bank innocently part with its funds on the faith of paper that appeared sound on its face. True, the best of men sometimes neglect. But duty to himself, as well as duty to the bank of which he was a director, demanded that he do more for the protection of both himself and the bank than he did. Applicable to this case are the following: "If the third person has notice of the agent's adverse interest in a former transaction in regard to which the agent was acting not for the bank, and the knowledge gained in such a transaction is such that needs to be communicated to the bank in order to bind it,—that is to say, if it is knowledge acquired by the officer outside of his duties,—there will be no presumption of a communication where the officer has an interest or a duty in concealing the matter." Zane, Banks & Bkg. § 112. "If the third party, C, knows that A has an adverse interest tending to cause him to withhold his knowledge from [B] the bank, C has no right to regard A and B as identical in the transaction, and cannot hold B." Morse, Banks & Bkg. § 106.

It is submitted that the evidence shows that the board of directors did not pass the discount of the notes, but that the same was done by Fowler alone. That cannot alter the case. They could have overthrown his act. Though Fowler took the paper from himself into the bank, it must be presumed that the other officials, who were disinterested and qualified to act on that paper, acquiesced in his action only because they had no notice of the infirmity in the notes. It is not reasonable to think that these disinterested officials would have silently approved his action if they had known what he knew about the paper. These disinterested officers of the bank received the paper as regular and valid. Defendant cannot rely, as he undertakes to do, on a conduit of notice that did not lead to the real entity,—the bank itself through its disinterested officers. To hold that Fowler, as president, acted alone for the bank, and that he had absolute power to bind it for his own private interests or those of a company in which he was privately interested, notwithstanding there were other officials of the bank who naturally would have intervened in its behalf if the knowledge which he possessed had been known to them, would mean no regard for the interests of depositors and stockholders.

In the transaction of the discount of the notes, Fowler was acting really not for the bank, but for other interests,—those of the fuel company. The directors who permitted the paper to remain as the property of the bank acted for it. Fowler's interest was so adverse to the bank that he was disqualified from representing it. A reputable authority says: "When an agent of a corporation himself contracts with the company, or otherwise deals with it in a transaction in which his interests are opposed to the interests of the company, his knowledge will not be deemed the knowledge of the company as to matters connected with that transaction; for the agent could not represent the company in such a transaction. So, if a person is an officer of two companies, and these companies enter into dealings with each other, the knowledge of the common officer cannot be attributed to either company in a transaction in which he did not represent it." 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 540c. And says Mr. Justice Mitchell in Gunster v. Scranton Illuminating H. & P. Co. supra: "If it be urged, as in some cases, that the principal, having put the agent in his place, should, as a matter of public policy, be held answerable for all the latter does, a sound answer is suggested by the court in Allen v. South Boston R. Co. 150 Mass. 200, 206, 5 L.R.A. 716, 15 Am. St. Rep. 185, 22 N. E. 917, that an independent fraud committed by an agent on his own account is beyond the scope of his employment, and bears analogy to a tort wilfully committed by a servant for his own purposes, and not as a means of performing the business intrusted to him by his master."

By claiming the notes and suing on them, the bank did not adopt Fowler's act in discounting the notes with notice. All that the bank adopted of his act is what it knew of the act. As far as it appeared to the bank, the notes which Fowler passed into the bank as agent of the fuel company, and received as agent of the bank, were entirely regular and valid. The bank took the notes as paper of that character. Why should its insistence for payment charge it with an adoption it never intended to make,—one that in reason cannot be imputed to it?

The giving of the instruction for defendant was error. The instructions requested by plaintiff properly presented the law of the case, in view of the evidence. We deem it unnecessary to discuss plaintiff's objection to the special plea, based on the ground that proof under it violates the rule that parol evidence is not admissible to change a written contract. It suffices to say that proof of the plea is admissible.

The judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded. Plaintiff asks for judgment here, but it does not plainly appear that defendant cannot make a different case at another trial. He may be able to prove notice.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

LEVI MARTIN

v.

F. W. SCHWERTLEY et al., Appts.

(— Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 218.)

Surface water — opening drainage culvert after accumulation of water.

1. The owners of land on one side of a highway from which surface water naturally drains through culverts in the highway are liable for injury to property on the opposite side of the highway for reopening the culverts, which were closed in improving the highway, after surface water has accumulated in large quantities upon their property, and casting it in a body onto the lower land.

Appeal — defense — first suggestion.

2. The defense that some of several persons sued jointly for turning surface water onto another's property did not participate

Note. — Liability for reopening or cleaning out drain or natural water way after body of surface water has accumulated.

The general subject as to the rights with respect to the flow of surface water is treated in the note to Gray v. McWilliams, 21 L.R.A. 593.

As to right to hasten flow of surface water along natural drainways, see note to Manteufel v. Wetzel, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167.

As practical as the point here presented seems to be, no case in addition to MARTIN v. SCHWERTLEY has been found that is squarely in point. Several cases are used in the note, however, as being somewhat analogous.

In 3 Farnham on Waters, § 889g, it is said: "A landowner has a right, in the interest of good husbandry, to fill in the cuts, sagholes, washouts, and other holes in his premises, and if he does in this regard no 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Evidence — injury to crop — scope of testimony.

3. Upon the question of injury to a crop by turning surface water upon it early in July, witnesses may state its condition in June and in August, there being no question that the difference in condition, if any, was due to the water.

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Harrison County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's growing crops, alleged to have been caused by defendants' wrongful act. Affirmed.

Statement by McClain, Ch. J.:

Action to recover damages for the alleged wrongful act of defendants in cutting openings through a highway embankment, thus permitting surface water to flow upon and across the plaintiff's land, with the result that his growing crops were seriously injured. There was a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $625.27, and from a judgment on this verdict the defendants appeal.

Messrs. C. W. Kellogg and J. S. Dewell, for appellants:

The condition of the corn in August could, under no circumstances, be any ground for fixing the measure of damage; the flood occurred July 5, the rule being that the measure is the condition immediately before and immediately after the injury.

One may lawfully and properly exercise a right even though it amounts to a damage to others.

The upper owner is not liable for hasten-more than is necessary and desirable for proper tillage of his land, he is not liable to a neighboring owner for obstructing the natural flow of the water."

In Overton v. Sawyer, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 308, 62 Am. Dec. 170, it was held that the upper owner of land has a right to remove an embankment constructed along his boundary line by the lower owner, which cuts off the natural flow of the surface water from his land. In this case the court, after observing that the upper owner had a cause of action against the lower owner for causing the obstruction, but that instead of bringing an action, he removed the obstruction, said: "We can see no ground upon which the plaintiff [lower owner] can maintain an action against him [upper owner], for merely undoing that which the plaintiff ought not to have done. If a man turns his hog into a cornfield of a neighbor, and the latter pulls down the ing the flow of surface water onto the lower land, if it is made to follow the course of usual flow, even though he collects it into a ditch for such purpose.

This work was of a public nature, done in accordance with a plan adopted by the proper authorities, and therefore there can be no recovery.

McClain, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

During the summer of 1909, the plaintiff was in possession as tenant of a farm of 160 acres, situated in Harrison county, and had growing on such farm crops of wheat and corn. On the north side of this farm is a highway, and the natural course of the surface water is from higher ground to the north across such highway and upon and over the land occupied by plaintiff. There is evidence tending to show that prior to the fall of 1908 the surface water from the north crossed the highway through culverts at different places, and flowed in the natural course of drainage across the farm, but that in the fall of that year, at the general request and instance of land-owners in the neighborhood, the highway was graded up, the culverts being removed so that the highway constituted a solid embankment, preventing the surface water from the north flowing upon and across the farm of plaintiff, and that the highway remained in this condition without openings through it along the entire north line of plaintiff's farm and for some distance beyond it, when, on July 5, 1909, very heavy rains caused an accumulation of water on the land north of the highway in some places to the depth of 2 or 3 feet, and that defendants on the 6th and 7th days of July, while the water was still thus standing north of the highway, cut openings in the highway embankment at places where there had formerly been culverts, allowing the surface water north of the highway grade to run through with great rapidity and in large volume upon plaintiff's land, with great damage to his crops. For the injury thus occasioned to his crops and to a garden adjacent to his dwelling house on the farm, plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment against the defendants.

1. The sufficiency of the allegations in the pleadings and of the evidence to sustain this judgment is questioned by counsel for defendants in their complaints with reference to instructions given by the court. Their objections are not to specific portions of the instructions, but to the general theory on which the case was submitted. They contend that the court did not require plaintiff to prove that the construction of the highway embankment in the fall of 1908 was the wrongful act of defence and drives the hog out, doing no unnecessary damage, can he be sued for doing so, upon the ground that he ought to have let the hog alone, and bring an action for the trespass?"

Article 656 of the Civil Code, imposing on the lower estate the servitude of suffering the waters falling on the upper estate to pass through its drains in the manner that will best conciliate the rights of the owner of the upper estate with the interests of agriculture, it was held in Darby v. Miller, 6 La. Ann. 645, where the defendant constructed causeways across his land, leaving gullies and natural channels for the flow of water open, throwing bridges over them, that the plaintiff, whose plantation was situated above that of the defendant, could not have the causeways removed, on the ground that they caused higher water, after heavy rains, to rise on his land, where he failed to prove this contention; but since 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) it was also shown that the gullies and natural drains on the defendant's land, through which the water from the plaintiff's lands flowed, had become "partially filled up by fallen timber and the succession of time," and so grown up with flags that the water passed through them with great difficulty, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to remove those impediments and restore the natural drains to their original depths.

And while land may be subject to the servitude of receiving the waters that flow naturally on, to, and through it from an adjoining estate above, the owner of the latter estate has no right to enter at will upon the land for the purpose of cleaning out or removing obstructions in order to enjoy the servitude, but is only entitled to ask the owner to remove the obstructions, when, upon his failure to do so, he may compel such action by legal process. Landry v. McCall, 3 La. Ann. 134. E. M. S.

fendants, but instructed the jury that, although this embankment was at that time constructed by lawful authority, the defendants acted wrongfully in cutting openings through it after the surface water had accumulated north of it on July 6 and 7, 1909, and allowing the surface water to flow through and on and over plaintiff's premises "substantially in a greater quantity and velocity and in a different manner than it would have done" if openings had been previously made in the highway embankment where the culverts had formerly been. There was a special finding of the jury that these cuts in the embankment were made at the points where the surface water, prior to the construction of the embankment, naturally flowed across the highway upon plaintiff's land, and we therefore have this question for consideration to wit: Was it wrongful on the part of defendants to thus open ways through the embankment for the immediate escape of water accumulated by it on the other land to the north, conceding that, if such openings had been made when the embankment was thrown up, or at any time before surface water had accumulated in great quantities on the land to the north, the construction of such openings would have been prior and fully warranted for the purpose of allowing surface water to flow across the highway in the usual course of drainage. Even though defendants had not constructed the embankment, they were aware of its existence and condition, and they were bound to know that, if it continued in that condition until large quantities of surface water had accumulated by reason of a heavy rainfall, the cutting of these openings would cause damage to the plaintiff, although they might be desirable for the purpose of relieving the land north of the highway of the accumulation of water. The evidence that they appreciated the effect of their action in thus attempting to relieve the land north of the highway of the sudden accumulation of surface water is undisputed. It is elementary law that one person has not the right to relieve his own property of a mischief by causing a similar mischief to the land of his neighbor. And this is not inconsistent with another rule that, if a danger of injury is common to two persons, one of them may avert the injury to himself, although in consequence of his doing so damage results to the other. Thus, in the case of Whalley v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. (1884) L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 131, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 285, 50 L. T. N. S. 472, 32 Week. Rep. 711, 48 J. P. 500, it was held that a railroad company which had rightfully constructed an embankment which was imperiled by the accumulation of surface water had no right to open a way for the water through such embankment, and thus cause it to be discharged on the adjoining land. And in Pollock on Torts (at page 150) the rule announced in the case just cited is approved in this general statement: "At all events, a man cannot justify doing for the protection of his own property a deliberate act whose evident tendency is to cause and which does cause damage to the property of an innocent neighbor. Thus, if flood water has come on my land by no fault of my own, this does not entitle me to let it off by means which, in the natural order of things, cause it to flood an adjoining owner's land." This is but an application of the well-recognized maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. See Broom's Legal Maxims, 6th Am. ed. 1868, 275.

The rule announced in an early case in this state, that one person may not improve his land for the purpose of freeing it from surface water by throwing the water upon the land of another, to his injury, in a different manner from that in which it would naturally have flowed (Livingston v. McDonald, 21 Iowa, 160, 89 Am. Dec. 563), has been somewhat modified in the interest of agriculture, so that the upper proprietor may drain his land into a natural water course without liability to a lower proprietor for resulting damages, although the effect of such drainage is to throw the surface water in somewhat increased volume at times on the land of the lower proprietor (Dorr v. Zimmerman, 127 Iowa, 551, 103 N. W. 806; Hull v. Harker, 130 Iowa, 190, 106 N. W. 629). But the principle has still been maintained that the upper proprietor may not discharge collected water upon lower land, even though in a water course, in an unusual manner or in unusual quantities. Tretter v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 147 Iowa, 375, 140 Am. St. Rep. 304, 126 N. W. 339; Hume v. Des Moines, 146 Iowa, 624, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 126, 125 N. W. 846, Ann. Cas. 1912 B, 904; Baker v. Akron, 145 Iowa, 485, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 619, 122 N. W. 926; Sheker v. Machovec, 139 Iowa, 1, 116 N. W. 1042. And this is the general rule in this country. 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 1906, 1189. It is to be noticed that the case before us does not involve the ordinary question of drainage. The common enemy, surface water, had been accumulated on the lands of defendants in large quantities so as to constitute an immediate menace and mischief, and the defendants had no right to free themselves of the natural consequence of this invasion by a hostile force by transferring the menace and mischief to the land of plaintiff, who was wholly innocent of any wrong in the matter, so as to cause him the same kind and quantity of injury as that with which defendants were threatened. It would hardly be pretended that, if a herd of cattle were devastating the crops of one landowner, he would have the right, for the purpose of averting further damage to himself, to open a partition fence and drive them on the land of an adjoining proprietor who was in no way at fault, with the result of causing to him the same kind of injury which the former was seeking to avert. The accumulated surface water was not mere surface water in the ordinary sense, but it was a present, active foe, constrained for the time being on the lands of defendants, threatening unusual and extraordinary danger to someone, and, as turned loose upon the plaintiff's land, it was not ordinary surface water, but a body of water which, by its accumulation, had become an extraordinary menace.

Counsel argue that the highway embankment without proper openings was a nuisance which the defendants might rightfully abate by their own action; but we find no authority for so abating a nuisance as to throw the resulting injury upon someone else who is in no way at fault for its existence. The act of the defendants was not an instinctive and involuntary act in avoiding the injury threatened in a sudden emergency, as in the celebrated "squib case" of Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892, 3 Wils. 403, but it was a wilful and deliberate act, calculated to throw upon the plaintiff, an innocent party, the very injury with which defendants were threatened. This wilful and deliberate act, and not the original construction of the highway embankment, which might or might not be injurious to adjoining landowners, depending upon circumstances which should subsequently arise, was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff. See 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 1906, 101. In the case before us the situation was simply this: Regardless of the responsibility for the original construction of the highway embankment without the openings through it which should have been placed there, the lands of defendants and others were covered with water which had accumulated as the result of a heavy rainfall. Defendant desired to relieve their land immediately of this water, and they cut openings in the embankment with the intention that the water should thereby be cast on the land of plaintiff otherwise than as it would have been cast upon his land if the openings had been previously made in the embankment, with a full knowledge that damage would result to him similar to that which they were seeking to avoid by making the openings. Under such circumstances, it seems to us there can be no question as to the wrongfulness of defendants' acts and their consequent liability for the damage resulting to the plaintiff.

2. The defendant Schwertley filed an answer in his own behalf, disclaiming any participation in the acts of the other defendants. But the other defendants filed a joint answer, denying their liability. No question was raised on the trial as to the liability of any one of the other defendants, if a wrong was done by any of them. Under these circumstances, the court did not err in submitting to the jury the issue as to the joint liability of all the defendants save Schwertley, and requiring them to find specifically only as to his participation in the wrong which occasioned the injury to plaintiff. The verdict was against Schwertley and all the other defendants as joint wrongdoers, and there is no specific complaint as to defendant Schwertley. The contention now made, that the evidence tended to show that some of the defendants other than Schwertley did not participate in the joint wrong, cannot now be considered. There was sufficient evidence to sustain a verdict against all, and no issue was raised as to the individual liability of the other defendants.

3. There is some contention on the part of counsel for appellants that the court erred in rulings relating to the admissibility of evidence as to measure of damages. There is no complaint as to the general rule recognized by the court, that plaintiff, a tenant with right of occupancy for only one year, should be allowed to recover, if anything, the difference in the value of his crops in the condition existing just before the flood and the condition which existed after the flood; and the only questions raised in this respect are as to whether the witnesses were sufficiently limited in the scope of their testimony.

One witness was allowed to state the condition of plaintiff's growing corn in the latter part of June and others to testify as to its condition about the middle of August. But such testimony was part only of the general description of the plaintiff's corn crop, which tended to show that, until it was submerged by water on the 6th and 7th of July, it was good crop, and that, as the result of being thus submerged, it was almost destroyed; the damaged condition in August being the natural consequence of the flood caused by defendants' acts. Witnesses might, therefore, properly testify as to what the value per acre of the crop was in June, and what its value per acre was in August; the diminution in value appearing plainly to have been due to the flood, and to no other cause. Such evidence would enable the jury to say what the difference in value of the crop was immediately preceding and immediately following the damage by flood. The value per acre of the crop as it was just before the flood might properly be testified to by a witness familiar with the amount of grain which the usual crop would yield, and, as compared with this estimate, he might properly testify as to the actual yield of the portion of the crop which had been damaged; it appearing that the diminution was due to the flood. These suggestions are sufficient to meet the contentions of counsel for appellants without specifically setting out the questions and answers of the various witnesses. The rulings of the court as to the admissibility of the evidence relating to measure of damages are fully supported by the views expressed in Jefferis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 147 Iowa, 124, 124 N. W. 367, if it is borne in mind that there was no controversy under the evidence as to the damaged condition of the crops as they existed after the flood being due to that cause.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

STATE FARMERS' MUTUAL HAIL INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

Note. — Liability of insurance company for negligent delay in passing upon or issuing policy until after loss.

The question as to the effect of delay in passing upon applications for insurance is covered in the note to Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Neafus, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1211. In the cases there dealt with the question presented was whether the insurer could be held liable as upon a contract of insurance; that is, whether a delay in passing upon the application would amount to an acceptance of the risk which would bind the insurer. In BOYER v. STATE FARMERS' MUT. HAIL INS. CO., however, it was sought to hold the insurer liable, not upon a contract of insurance, but because of the negligence of its agent in failing to forward the application within a reasonable time. But 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) storm is liable in damages for the amount of the insurance which would have been in force before the storm had its soliciting agent not delayed for an unreasonable length of time to forward the application on which the policy was issued.

(February 10, 1912.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Jewell County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's agent in not forwarding plaintiff's application for hail insurance promptly. Affirmed.

Statement by Burch, J.:

The plaintiff sued the defendant for damages occasioned by the negligence of its soliciting agent in not forwarding the plaintiff's application for hail insurance promptly, in consequence of which the policy was not issued until after the property sought to be insured was destroyed.

The court made the following findings of fact and conclusions of law:

Findings of Fact.

"(1) The defendant was, at the time of the happenings mentioned below, a corporation existing under the laws of the state of Minnesota.

"(2) The defendant W. P. Woody was, at the time of the issuance of the policy of insurance hereinafter mentioned, an agent of the said company, authorized to solicit applications for insurance, to collect premiums, and to forward applications to the defendant insurance company at Waseca, Minnesota, for approval or rejection by said company.

"(3) On the 7th day of July, 1909, plaintiff, J. M. Boyer, was the owner of 100 acres of growing corn, 50 acres of which was situated in section 21, township 5 south, of range 9 west of the sixth prin-one case dealing with that question has been disclosed.

In Walker v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 51 Iowa, 679, 2 N. W. 583, the trial court instructed the jury that if they found that the person who received the application for insurance was an agent with limited and restricted authority, having power only to receive and forward applications to the company for its approval or rejection, then, as such, he would be held to the use of ordinary diligence, and the company would be liable for his negligence in the performance of such duty, and if he neglected to forward the application within a reasonable time, considering all the circumstances, the company would be liable for any loss occasioned by such neglect. This instruction was held erroneous in that case on the ground that no issue of negligence was raised by the cial meridian, and 50 acres situated in section 21, township 5 south, of range 9 west of the sixth principal meridian.

"(4) On the 7th day of July, 1909, said W. P. Woody went to the farm of the plaintiff, and took his application for the insurance of the corn, above mentioned, for the purpose of insuring it against damage from hail, the limit of the amount of such insurance being $1,000; the premium for such insurance being the sum of $60.

"(5) During the negotiations, the plaintiff informed Woody that he could pay cash or give his note; but it would be more convenient to give his note. This was agreed to by said Woody.

"(6) The crop of corn was exceptionally good, and plaintiff also informed said Woody, in effect, that he desired the application forwarded at once, as he had a fine crop of corn and did not wish to lose it.

"(7) The application was then drawn up and the note was executed, made payable to the order of W. P. Woody, which was done for the convenience of Woody in having it discounted.

"(8) Woody had never been expressly authorized to accept notes in payment of premiums; but it had been his habit to take them and have them discounted, and send in the cash with the application.

"(9) Woody's residence and place of business were in Cawker City, Mitchell county, Kansas. He arrived in Cawker City about 7 o'clock in the evening. On the 8th day of July, at about 9 o'clock in the morning, he took the note to a bank in Cawker City to sell it and have it discounted; but the bank declined to purchase it. He kept it in his possession all that day, and on the 9th day of July he drove over to the town of Glen Elder, situated in the same county, and there offered the note for sale and discount at two banks, and they declined to purchase it. He returned to Cawker City, and on the 10th day of July he endeavored to dispose of it to other parties, who declined to purchase it, and on the night of the 10th day of July, 1909, he sent the note and the application to the defendant company, where it arrived on the 12th day of July, 1909. He had also taken the application of A. T. Boyer and Charles Boyer for insurance on growing crops owned by them separately, and had taken their notes in payment of the premiums thereon. He sent all three of these notes and the applications at the time of sending the application and note of plaintiff, and in his letter informed the company 'that he would stand for the collection' of the notes; that they owned 680 acres of very fine land in Jewell county, Kansas, but were in debt a good deal; and that they had given a first lien on 165 acres of as fine corn as could be seen in the county, and which was tasseling out in fine shape.

"(10) The note, application, and letter were received by the secretary of the company, who made no objection because the application was not accompanied by the cash, and on the 12th day of July, 1909, the policy of insurance, which is marked 'Exhibit A,' and appears as such in the petition of plaintiff, was issued to the plaintiff, and the other policies issued to A. T. Boyer and Charles Boyer.

"(11) The application of the plaintiff on which such policy was issued is the one marked 'Exhibit B' in plaintiff's petition. A copy of the by-laws was printed on the policy so issued, and forms a part of the contract under which said policy was to be so issued.

"(12) That had said application and note been forwarded on the night of the 7th, or on the morning or night of the 8th of July, which could have been done, pleadings, the court saying: "It may be, but the point we do not decide, that defendant is liable for the neglect of its agent, as contemplated in this instruction; but in order to recover for such negligence the action must be based thereon and the petition must so declare. The petition in this case declares upon a contract for insurance. This instruction contemplates liability of defendant on account of the negligence of defendant's agent in not forwarding to defendant the application and other papers. No issue as to negligence was raised by the pleadings. The court, therefore, erred in submitting to the jury by this instruction the question of the agent's negligence."

Although the instruction in the foregoing case was there improper because no issue of negligence had been joined, it appears to be perfectly sound as a legal proposition. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

As there suggested, the question of what is a reasonable time for forwarding the application would vary with the particular circumstances of each case. For example, what might be found to be a reasonable time for forwarding an application for fire or life insurance might not be a reasonable time in a case involving an application for hail insurance which was made, as in Boyer v. State Farmers' Mut. Hail Ins. Co., at a time when a loss might be expected momentarily. But whatever the decision of the jury may be on this question, it cannot be doubted that the proposition that an insurer should be held liable for a loss sustained by an applicant for insurance because of the negligence of the insured's agent in failing to forward the application within a reasonable time is sound.

J. T. W.

instead of on the 10th, they would have been received by the company and the policy would have been issued to plaintiff before the destruction of his crop of corn below mentioned. But, considering the critical situation of the corn, the danger of hail from [in] July and August, and the limited number of days the insurance was to run, together with all the other circumstances in this case, the court finds that the said agent held said application an unreasonable length of time, and on such account the application was not passed upon by the company until July 12, 1909.

"(13) On the 11th day of July, at 3:30 o'clock, A. M., a violent hailstorm swept over the country and totally destroyed the crop of 100 acres of corn described in the policy so issued to the plaintiff.

"(14) The value of the crop of corn so destroyed was at least $1,200.

"(15) On the 12th day of July, 1909, the plaintiff made affidavit of his loss, which he sent by United States mail to the proper parties, as designated in the policy of insurance, and afterward, on the 15th day of July, 1909, he made further and formal proof of loss, as required by the policy of insurance, and deposited it in the United States mail, sending it by registered letter to said company, and within the time required by the policy of insurance.

"(16) The company has refused, and before the bringing of this action refused, and still refuses, to pay for the destruction of said crop or any part thereof.

"(17) Section 15 of the by-laws provided that 'the application and policy and the by-laws of this company now in force, or as hereafter enacted, constitute the entire contract between the company and its members, and no agent is authorized to enter into any agreement which alters said contract in any particular.'

"(18) While the company did not expressly authorize the agent, Woody, to accept notes in payment for premiums, yet they notified their agents, including Woody, that if they should find difficulty in discounting notes taken that the company would refer them to a bank that would, and it is apparent many such notes were taken, and in that way the company encouraged its agents to take notes in payment of premiums; and this is why Woody took the note payable to himself, instead of the company.

"(19) The company had cautioned the agent, Woody, never to send notes when they could be discounted.

"(20) The plaintiff believed the agent, Woody, had authority to accept the note in payment of the premium, and had no notice to the contrary, save and except 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

such, if any, as is imparted by the matters contained in the application of the plaintiff and the policy issued to the plaintiff; and plaintiff had no notice that there would be any attempt to discount or sell the note before forwarding the application.

"(21) The policy issued to the plaintiff was so issued July 12, 1909, and for a term ending on the 15th day of September, 1909.

"(22) A bank in Waseca, Minnesota, in the same city wherein the home office of the company was situated, had sent a letter to the agent, Woody, informing him that when notes were taken for premiums for policies to be issued by the defendant company, that said bank would purchase said notes.

"(23) The plaintiff has necessarily been compelled to employ attorneys to prosecute this action, and a reasonable fee for such attorneys, the court finds, under the circumstances, should be $200.

"(24) On the bottom of the paper upon which the application of the plaintiff for hail insurance is written, and occurring below and after the signature, appearing in large type, as large as that in which the body of the application is printed, the following: 'Notice.—All payments of premiums must be made by the assured by bank check or draft payable to the order of the State Farmers' Mutual Hail Insurance Company of Waseca, Minnesota, and be attached to and sent to the company with the application.'

"(25) The plaintiff has suffered damage to his property by reason of the destruction thereof in the sum of $1,200, and for $1,000 of which amount the defendant the State Farmers' Mutual Hail Insurance Company is liable to the plaintiff."

Conclusions of Law.

"1. The court therefore concludes that the plaintiff is entitled to recover of the defendant, the State Farmers' Mutual Hail Insurance Company, the sum of $1,200; that this liability does not arise from any contract of insurance, but arises solely and on account of the failure of the agent, Woody, to forward the application within a reasonable time to the said company; and upon what the court in this case deems to be such negligence on the part of the said agent, the judgment to be rendered in this case is based."

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The greater part of the brief for the defendant is devoted to arguments which relate to the agent's lack of authority, under the restrictions placed upon him, to effect a contract of insurance, and to the necessity for an acceptance of the application as a condition precedent to the formation of a contract of insurance. Many authorities are cited upon these subjects, including those decisions which hold that unreasonable delay in acting upon an application does not constitute acceptance and does not warrant a presumption of acceptance. The course of the inquiry in this case lies in a different direction. This is not a suit on a contract of insurance, and the judgment does not rest upon the breach of such a contract. The position of the plaintiff and of the district court is that, under the peculiar conditions surrounding the transaction, the agent should have forwarded the plaintiff's application promptly for acceptance or rejection; that the application would have been accepted if he had done so, and a contract of insurance would have been consummated, protecting the plaintiff from the loss which occurred; that the negligence of the agent in not forwarding the application until it was too late for the acceptance of it to be of any benefit to the plaintiff was the negligence of the company; and consequently that the company wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the indemnity he should have had, to his injury.

For all purposes of taking and forwarding the application, the agent was the company itself. He could negotiate an application for insurance, based upon cash, upon the applicant's note, or upon any other terms, precisely as the board of directors of the company might have done. The option exercised by the agent to take a note, instead of the cash, which he might have received (finding No. 5), was an option exercised by his principal. He could dispense with a bank check or draft (finding No. 24) as an essential feature of the application, and whatever the arrangement with the applicant might be, it was the agent's duty to present it for acceptance or rejection to the officer or officers holding the reserved power to determine whether or not a policy should be issued. The agency relation of insurance solicitors to the insurer and the person solicited, and the authority of such agents over the subject of the application, are fully discussed in the case of Pflester v. Missouri State L. Ins. Co. 85 Kan. 97, 116 Pac. 245, and the rules of law there stated are applicable here.

When the application was solicited by the agent, the danger period of the corn-growing season had been reached, and early action, whereby the risk of injury might be shifted to the defendant, was a matter of much consequence to the plaintiff. The application was given for the purpose of transmission to the defendant's headquarters, and not that it might be retained by the agent and carried about in his pocket. The defendant itself recognized the necessity for expeditiousness in a letter of instructions to the agent, which was introduced in evidence, and which, no doubt, was regarded by the court as quite material, when considering the matters covered by finding No. 12. A portion of the letter reads as follows: "Special Notice.—Send all applications promptly, because there is no liability of the company until the application is received and approved by us." It is fair to presume that likelihood of the destruction of the plaintiff's corn by hail induced the very high rate of premium demanded for the brief term of the insurance, in this case 6 per. cent on $1,000, or 5 per cent of the full value of the crop at the time of the negotiations. There was sufficient danger to the plaintiff to be apprehended from delay in closing the transaction that a reasonably prudent business man, guided by the considerations which ordinarily regulate conduct, would have acted with diligence. If the agent only be considered, it is clear enough that he would be liable if his negligent retention of the application prevented its timely acceptance. Since he was merely the arm of the defendant, the obligation resting upon him was the obligation of the defendant. Therefore the duty of the defendant to secure prompt transmission of the application from the solicitor's field to the central office is quite apparent. Whether or not the delay in this case was unreasonable was a question of fact for the trier of the facts, and as it is presented here is not one of law for this court.

It is claimed that the finding that a policy would have been issued before the corn was destroyed, had the application been forwarded promptly, is not sustained by the evidence. The finding is sufficiently sustained by the proof that the application was immediately approved upon its arrival at the defendant's office, and a policy was issued accordingly, taking effect at noon of the same day. The position of the defendant was that its hailstorm business was conducted on a cash basis only, and its witnesses supported this position by some interesting testimony. They stated that premiums must be paid in cash; that promissory notes are never accepted; that the defendant was not interested in the plaintiff's note, and did not know what became of it; and that the defendant was only interested in a cash settlement for the policy,—all in face of the proof that three policies at least (finding No. 10) were issued on July 12th without cash, and without hesitation or objection.

It is said that the plaintiff invited delay by giving his note, instead of paying cash. Findings 5 and 6 dispose of this contention, and they are abundantly sustained by the evidence. It is further said there is no evidence that the plaintiff did not know the agent would attempt to sell the note before sending in the application. The plaintiff did not testify in so many words that he had no such knowledge; but the evidence is quite conclusive that he believed he had paid his premium, and that the application would go forward immediately. Other criticisms of the findings of fact are either invalid or immaterial. Certain evidence objected to was admissible under the decision in the case of Pflester v. Missouri State L. Ins. Co. supra.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN

v.

GEORGE A. OSBORNE.

(— Mich. —, 135 N. W. 921.)

Voter — residence — attendance at school.

Note. — Acquiring residence as a voter while attending school or public institution.

Earlier cases on the point here annotated may be found in the note to Wolcott v. Holcomb, 23 L.R.A. 215.

As to whether residence as a qualification of voters means domicil, see note to Anderson v. Palmer Transfer Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 759.

Most of the states from which cases are cited in this note have a constitutional provision which reads: "For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the service of the United States, nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of this state, or of the United States, or of the high seas; nor while a student at any seminary of learning; nor while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense; nor while confined in any public prison." So that in this note, whenever a constitutional provision is referred to, the reference is to the one just quoted. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant, before sentence, to rulings of the Circuit Court for Calhoun County in a proceeding charging him with illegal voting, which resulted in his conviction. Sustained.

Statement by Ostrander, J.:

Respondent is unmarried, twenty-seven years of age, and, born in Canada, is a naturalized citizen of the United States. His father, an itinerant Methodist clergyman, is not a citizen of the United States, though living in Michigan. From Canada respondent came to Whittamore, Michigan, but just before going to Albion, Michigan, in September, 1905, he was teaching school in the township of Burley, Iosco county, Michigan, where he was registered as an elector and voted. He has not lived with his parents for twelve years and has supported himself since he was fifteen years of age. When he left Iosco county, he did so without expecting ever to return, and his name was stricken from the registration book. At Albion he registered at the

The courts, however, generally take the view that while the constitutional provision prevents one from acquiring a voting residence by reason of the circumstances named, it does not prevent one otherwise within its purview from acquiring such a residence by reason of other circumstances.

Inmates of soldiers' homes, or occupants of government posts.

In Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 459, 39 Pac. 19, it is held that such a constitutional provision as is stated supra does not prevent one who gives up a former residence and enters a veterans' home with the purpose of forever making it his home, from acquiring a voting residence in the precinct where the home is located.

And in Cory v. Spencer, 67 Kan. 648, 63 L.R.A. 275, 73 Pac. 920, which case squarely overrules Lawrence v. Leidigh, 58 Kan. 594, 62 Am. St. Rep. 631, 50 Pac. 600, it was held that such a provision does not prevent one in a soldiers' home from acquiring a voting residence there if such is his pur-college as a resident of the city. He has lived there continuously, in the third ward, where he is registered as an elector and where he voted for five years. His permanent address since September, 1905, has been Albion, Michigan, and during that time he has earned his living in and about the city. He has no definite plans for the future. At the spring election in the year 1911, respondent's vote was challenged, but was received by the inspectors, whereupon he was arrested, and in an information filed in the circuit court for the county of Calhoun is charged with having voted illegally. The material facts are not in dispute. Respondent testified at the trial that his primary purpose in going to Albion was to attend college; that he had been for six years fitting himself for the ministry, and went to Albion because he could there obtain an education and because there was offered there inducements to work his way through college. He said: "If after graduating I should receive a call to go to some other place, I expect I would go. I may receive a call to preach in a church in Calhoun county, but not in Albion. I don't expect to in Albion." He was asked by the court the following question: "Is there anything now, or has there been anything during the past two years, that has caused you to remain there except the fact that you are taking the course of instructions provided by Albion college?" To which he replied: "There is. In the first place, the ecclesiastical history of the college, and, in pose. The court said: "He is as free as if he were not a recipient of this bounty."

The vote of a permanent inmate of a soldiers' home in a state other than that of the county where he voted and from which he is not permitted to go without a "furlough" is properly rejected, notwithstanding the testimony of the party that he has no intention of changing his residence from the place where he voted. Lankford v. Gebhart, 130 Mo. 621, 51 Am. St. Rep. 585, 32 S. W. 1127, wherein it was said: "The testimony . . . that he had no intention of changing his residence when he became a member of the home or afterward may be taken as a mere conclusion of the witness. A contrary intent may be gathered from all the circumstances."

But in Powell v. Spackman, 7 Idaho, 692, 54 L.R.A. 378, 65 Pac. 503, it is held that such a constitutional provision preserves the voting status of the inmates of a soldiers' home at the time of their entry thereto, and prevents such inmates from acquiring the right to vote in the county and precinct in which the home is located. To the same effect is Re Smith, 44 Misc. 384, 89 N. Y. Supp. 1006.

And "the fact that a member of the home (soldiers' and sailors') is detailed to perform certain services, for which he receives a compensation, does not change his status. He is still kept in the home at public expense; . . . and a member of the home, a part of whose pension is turned over to the commander . . . does not . . . occupy a relation to the home different from that of the other inmates." Re Registration of Voters, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. 473, wherein it was also said: "I do not hold that a member of the home may not acquire a residence, for voting purposes, in that district, but do hold that to do so he must acquire such residence aside from that which attaches as a member of the home. For instance, a member of the home who has a family may, by moving such family into the district, become a voter therein. So, if discharged from the home, by remaining in the district with proper intent, he may become a voter therein and remain such even 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

if again a member of the home. For, if a voter in that district when entering the home, he would, of course, remain such."

And the inmates of a soldiers' home in Tennessee, the exclusive jurisdiction of which is vested in the United States government, are not entitled to vote at state elections notwithstanding that the state statute by which consent was given to the acquisition of the site for the home provides that nothing therein shall prevent the inmates from voting, as the legislature could not confer the right of suffrage upon persons whose legal status is fixed as nonresidents. State ex rel. Lyle v. Willett, 117 Tenn. 334, 97 S. W. 299. The court referred to the fact that there was no provision in the Constitution of Tennessee similar to that referred to at the beginning of the note.

But employees and inmates of the home, who work and eat both regularly and irregularly therein, but who have homes and families on the outside of the home grounds, with whom they spend their evenings and nights and irregularly take their meals, being residents of the state and otherwise qualified to vote, are entitled to vote in that place. Ibid.

Inmates of almshouses and hospitals.

In Re Batterman, 14 Misc. 213, 35 N. Y. Supp. 593, it was held that art. 2, § 3, of the Constitution of 1895, providing that "for the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence" while kept at any asylum or institution wholly or partly supported at public expense or charity, is prospective in its operation and effect, and if a residence has been already acquired in any institution of the kind described in the section, it will not be held to have been taken away by this provision of the Constitution. To the same effect is Re Griffiths, 16 Misc. 128, 38 N. Y. Supp. 953.

A constitutional provision against gaining a residence while confined in a public prison applies to a person committed to such prison, even if the commitment was ir-the second place, the opportunity we get in supplying pulpits around the immediate vicinity and attending college also, and also the work we get during vacations in the city at various employments as the Employment Bureau suggests and discovers for us. Q. Those things which you have just enumerated are the only things that have caused you for the past year or so and are now causing you to continue your residence there in Albion. Is that true? A. Yes, the school advantages plus the opportunities of earning my way through." Respondent's motion for a directed verdict was denied, and the court advised the jury that upon the undisputed evidence respondent could not have acquired a residence in Albion. Pro forma he submitted the question of respondent's guilt to the jury, which returned the following verdict: "Under the direction of the court only, we return a verdict of guilty." The cause is here on exceptions before sentence.

Messrs. Weeks & Cooper, for defendant:

A student is not compelled to maintain his residence at the place from whence he regular or illegal, and was made up on his own application; and consequently he cannot vote in the district where the prison is located, and therefore has no right to register therein, notwithstanding the fact that he has no family and no home, and made application for commitment to get a home and work in the prison. People v. Cady, 143 N. Y. 100, 25 L.R.A. 399, 37 N. E. 673, affirming 78 Hun, 616, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1110.

And an unpaid helper in a public hospital, who is simply an inmate of the hospital under a bare license, that is, with mere permission to use it as an asylum, getting his board and lodging for work he would be required to do, is "kept" in the institution within the constitutional provision, and cannot acquire a residence for voting in the district where the hospital is situated. People ex rel. McShane v. Hagen, 164 N. Y. 570, 58 N. E. 1091, affirming 48 App. Div. 203, 62 N. Y. Supp. 816.

Neither does an inmate of a Samaritan Home for the Aged acquire a residence for the purpose of voting in the district where the home is located. Re Olwell, 165 N. Y. 642, 59 N. E. 1128, affirming 54 App. Div. 630, 66 N. Y. Supp. 859.

And in Murray's Petition, 5 W. N. C. 9, it was said of former paupers at an institution, who get no money compensation or wages, but do certain work at the institution, and are accorded certain privileges in return for their board, lodging, and clothing: "This class is very near the class of paupers among whom such distinctions as to employment and privileges may fairly be made as a reward for superior intelligence, industry, or good behavior. We think it more in accordance with the language and spirit of the Constitution to treat such persons as still in the class of paupers. They are not free and self-supporting citizens, and are therefore deprived, for the time, of their political privilege of voting."

The fact that one is a student in a university does not entitle him to vote where the university is situated, nor does it of itself prevent his voting there. He may vote at the seat of the university if he has his residence there and is otherwise qualified. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Wickham v. Coyner, 30 Ohio C. C. 765; Berry v. Wilcox, 44 Neb. 82, 48 Am. St. Rep. 706, 62 N. W. 249, wherein it was said: "Persons otherwise qualified as voters, who come to the seat of a university mainly for the purpose of obtaining an education, who are not dependent upon their parents for support, who have not the intention of returning to their parental home upon the completion of their studies, who are accustomed to leave the seat of the university during vacation, going wherever they might find employment, and returning to the university when the term opens, regarding the seat of the university as their home, and having no purpose formed as to their movements after completing their studies, are entitled to vote at the seat of the university."

So, in Hall v. Schoenecke, 128 Mo. 661, 31 S. W. 97, it was held that a student may become a resident of the place where the college is located though he only went there for the purpose of attending school. Whether he has done so or not depends upon all the facts and circumstances. The facts that he is supported and maintained by his parents, and spends his vacations with them, are strong, but not necessarily conclusive, circumstances to prove that he has not changed his residence. The question is, as in other cases, largely one of intention, though as to this, the evidence of the party himself is not necessarily conclusive.

And where a student who is self-supporting gives up his former residence and comes to college with the intention of remaining in the county after his studies are over, he acquires a residence for the purpose of voting. Wickham v. Coyner, supra; Re Lower Oxford Contested Election, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 323.

People ex rel. Saunders v. Hanna, 98 Mich. 515, 57 N. W. 738, is sufficiently set out in PEOPLE V. OSBORNE.

An active intent upon the part of the student to change his residence to the place where he is pursuing his studies must be shown. Wickham v. Coyner, supra.

In Re Lower Merion Election, 1 Chester Co. Rep. 257, it was said: "He [the student] may intend to go elsewhere when his studies are over, but, if he has no other home while present at the institution, if he has no fixed place to which he intends to came, against his wishes and desires, but can abandon that residence and gain a residence in his college town.

go when his undergraduate period is over, if he elects to become a citizen in the district of his alma mater, and does become such citizen, he has the right to vote—if the election board is satisfied as to the bona fides of his intent."

One who comes into the state for the sole purpose of attending school, and resides for six months in the county and precinct where the school is, or if he intends to reside until the school's four-year course is finished, but with no intention to reside there afterwards, is not a resident, within the constitutional provisions, of the precinct where the school is located, and therefore not a voter in that precinct, notwithstanding the fact that all the while he is in the school he has no intention as to where he will reside when his school is over. Parsons v. People, 30 Colo. 388, 70 Pac. 689.

Where there is no constitutional or statutory provision against a student at college acquiring a voting residence there, he may acquire one at the college if he supports himself entirely by his own efforts, is not subject to parental control, and regards the place where the college is situated as his home, even though he may at some future time intend to remove, but has the intention of making it his present abiding place, and has no positive and fixed intention as to where he will locate when he leaves; but his presence in the college town must be an actual, bona fide one, with no intention of returning to the parental home upon the completion of his studies. Welsh v. Shumway, 232 Ill. 54, 83 N. E. 549.

Notwithstanding the constitutional provisions in New York, it is held that a voter may change his legal residence into a new district in spite of the fact that he becomes a student in the institution of learning therein; but the facts to establish such a change must be wholly independent and outside of his presence in the new district as a student, and should be very clear and convincing to overcome the natural presumption. Re Goodman, 146 N. Y. 284, 40 N. E. 769, affirming 84 Hun, 53, 31 N. Y. Supp. 1043, wherein it was held that the mere fact of taking a room at a seminary for the sole purpose of studying did not constitute one a voter in the district in which the seminary was located. To the same effect is Re Garvey, 147 N. Y. 117, 41 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the Constitution of 1850, § 5 of article 7 reads as follows: "No elector shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his being employed in the service of the United States or of this state; nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of this state or of the United States; or of the high seas; nor while a student of any seminary of learning; nor while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense; nor while confined in any public prison, except that honorably

N. E. 439, affirming 84 Hun, 611, 32 N. Y. Supp. 689.

So, where one settles in a town with the sworn intent of becoming a resident of that town, he does not effect a change of residence from that town to a seminary in another city by the fact that he sells books in the latter city and acts as a lay reader incidentally to pursuing his studies in a theological seminary. Re Garvey, supra.

And the letters of a student who enters a seminary, addressed to the mayor of the city and to the board of registration of the election district in which the seminary is located, informing them that he intends to make the seminary his residence for all purposes, but places no additional facts before the court bearing upon the change of residence, are not sufficient to effect such change of residence, since nothing independent of his temporary residence at the seminary as a student is shown. Re McCormack, 86 App. Div. 362, 83 N. Y. Supp. 847.

So, the inability of students to acquire a residence for voting purposes merely by attending an institution of learning, under Const. art. 2, § 3, extends to students in a Roman Catholic seminary, studying for the priesthood, although each of them has renounced all other residence or home, and on admission to the priesthood will continue in the seminary until assigned elsewhere by his ecclesiastical superiors. Re Barry, 164 N. Y. 18, 52 L.R.A. 831, 58 N. E. 12, 8 N. Y. Ann. Cas. 148, affirming 61 N. Y. Supp. 124.

On the other hand, in Re Garvey, supra, reversing 84 Hun, 611, 32 N. Y. Supp. 689, where one who gave up his residence in Virginia, and took up his permanent residence at a seminary in New York, notified the registrar of the former state to erase his name from the registered voters there, wrote the bishop of the New York diocese, informing him that he had given up his legal residence in Virginia and intended to reside and vote in New York, and requested that he be received by the bishop as a postulant by reason of his residence in the diocese of New York, it was held that the intent to change his legal residence was clearly disclosed by acts which were independent of his presence as a student in the seminary, and that his name is improperly stricken from the registry list.

discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who have served in the military or naval forces of the United States or of this state, and who reside in soldiers' homes established by the state, may acquire a residence where such home is located." Construing this provision, it was said, in Wolcott v. Holcomb, 97 Mich. 361, 367, 23 L.R.A. 215, 56 N. W. 837, 839: "We are of the opinion that the terms 'by reason of' and 'while' were understood by the framers of the Constitution to have a different meaning. In the former case the intention would very largely, if not entirely, govern the question of domicile, while in the latter it would not. It was clearly the intention of the former provision to give the citizen the right, if he chose, to carry his residence with him to the place where he was employed in the service of the United States or of the state, and in the latter case it seems equally clear that it was the intention not to give that right." It was also said, by way of illustration and argument: "Furthermore, students in all institutions of learning, although they are in attendance there for the sole purpose of obtaining an education, might, at their own will, become electors in the places where such institutions are located. We think the Constitution prohibits a change of residence under such circumstances, and that, when one's presence in any of the institutions named is due to the sole purpose of receiving the benefits conferred, his former residence must be considered his domicile for citizenship." While this decision was rendered by a divided court, it was followed, without dissent, in People ex rel. Saunders v. Hanna, 98 Mich. 515, 57 N. W. 738. In the Constitution of 1908 the same provision appears as § 2 of article 3. The punctuation is not the same as that employed in the earlier Constitution, and there is some slight change in the words used. There is nothing upon which a change of meaning may be reasonably predicated. It will be assumed, therefore, that the convention which framed the last Constitution included therein the provision in question with the meaning given to it in the decisions which have been referred to. That portion of the opinion of the court in Wolcott v. Holcomb to which we have alluded was not, as respondent intimates, mere dictum. The right of a student attending an institution of learning was not involved in that case, but the right of one placed by the Constitution in the same class with such a student, in respect to a change of domicile, was involved. We think the history of the constitutional provision requires the decision to be followed in like cases. Is the case before us a like case?

It is said in the majority opinion delivered in Wolcott v. Holcomb that no question of disfranchisement was involved, and in the portion of the opinion above quoted the language implies a limitation of application of the rule announced to such persons as attend institutions of learning "for the sole purpose" of receiving the benefits conferred. It is clear, too, from the facts stated in the opinions, that the inmate of the Soldiers' Home whose rights were considered was, at the time he applied for admission to the Home, a resident of Woodstock township, Lenawee county. He presented the certificate of the supervisor of the township that he was then an actual resident of the township. The inmate later declared that "he always intended, and in fact made, the township of Grand Rapids, and that part of it in which said Soldiers' Home is located, his home, subsequent to his entry therein." The respondent in the case at bar appears to have had no residence, in fact or by intention, when he went to Albion. If we eliminate from the circumstances to be considered the fact of his presence at the college, the inference may still be drawn that he adopted in fact and by intention a residence in Albion before entering college, having at the time, and intending to have, no other residence. I apprehend that if a young man of full age was sent to college by his father, never having acquired a residence apart from that of his father, and if his father and family should, in good faith, for the purpose of establishing their family domicile there, take up a residence in the college town while he was a student there, he would thereby gain a residence as an elector. In such a case he would gain a residence "while a student at an institution of learning;" but the fact that he was a student would be a circumstance of no importance in determining residence. So, if the family of such a young man should remove from one place to another in the state, I apprehend that he might register and vote as an elector in the community in which his father lived. In such a case, he would both lose and gain a residence "while a student at an institution of learning." A construction of the Constitution which would deny him the right to reside where his father resided, and the right to gain a residence elsewhere, "while a student," would involve disfranchisement. The law will not permit students at institutions of learning by any declaration of intention to become electors in the communities in which such institutions are situated. But if respondent, having no domicile, in good faith made a domicile at Albion, entering college as a resident citizen of Albion, he was entitled to vote there. Whether he did so is a question of fact.

It is charged in the information that respondent, "not being then and there a resident of the third ward of the said city of Albion, did . . . wilfully vote at the said third ward voting place in the said city of Albion at the election held in the said ward and city." I assume that the prosecution is under and by virtue of 3 Comp. Laws, § 11,439, which provides a punishment for the voting by a qualified elector in any township or ward in which he does not reside. It does not appear that the attention of the court was directed to a question stated rather than argued in the brief for respondent, viz., that a criminal intent must be found to violate the law. The court was requested to instruct that a verdict of not guilty must be returned. The jury was instructed that respondent was presumed to be innocent and that the people must establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The question of respondent's good faith in voting was not mentioned in the charge. Counsel for neither party refer to authority upon the subject. The statute in respect to a qualified elector voting at a place not his residence does not use the words "wilfully" or "intentionally," or any other word qualifying the act. In terms, the act of voting in a place where the elector does not reside is made a misdemeanor. In the same connection, it is declared to be a misdemeanor if an elector gives in two or more votes folded together, or votes, or offers to vote, more than once at the same election, in the same or different voting places. As a rule, there can be no crime without criminal intent; this is not a rule without exceptions. People v. Roby, 52 Mich. 577, 50 Am. Rep. 270, 18 N. W. 365; People v. Rice, 161 Mich. 657, 664, 126 N. W. 981; and cases cited in opinion. There appears to be no reason for saying that criminal intent is not a necessary element of the offense with which respondent is charged, and upon a new trial the jury should be so instructed.

It will be certified to the Circuit Court for the County of Calhoun that the exception to the charge delivered is sustained, and that the verdict should be set aside and a new trial ordered.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

FRED H. MURRAY, Appt.,

v.

WALTER J. SMITH, State Treasurer, et al.

(117 Minn. 490, 136 N. W. 5.)

Tax — highway — special assessment.

Chapter 254, Laws 1911, providing for the establishment and maintenance of highways outside of cities and villages, and for the assessment of one fourth the cost thereof on land specially benefited, is valid, under § 1, art. 9, of the state Constitution, which requires taxes to be uniform upon the same class of subjects, but permits the legislature to authorize municipal corporations to lay and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby, without regard to cash valuation.

APPEAL by complainant from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in a suit to enjoin payment of state funds for the construction of a rural highway. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas McDermott, for appellant:

The law under which the state officers were attempting to act is unconstitutional. Sperry v. Flygare, 80 Minn. 325, 49 L.R.A. 757, 81 Am. St. Rep. 261, 83 N. W. 177.

The owners owed no duty to the public to construct this roadway, and under the law an assessment cannot lie.

State ex rel. Stateler v. Reis, 38 Minn. 371, 38 N. W. 97.

Headnote by BUNN, J.

Note. — Rural highway as a local improvement the cost of which may be assessed against tributary property upon the basis of special benefit.

This note does not include the question whether the legislature, under its general power of taxation, as distinguished from the power of local assessment, may create a special tax district consisting of property tributary to a rural highway, and authorize a uniform tax on all property within the district, according to its value, to cover the cost of such highway; but it is confined to the question whether, under its power to authorize local assessments with reference to peculiar and special benefits to property, the legislature may authorize the assessment of all or a part of the cost of a rural highway against the tributary property benefited thereby upon the basis of special benefits conferred, and without reference to the value of the property.

Messrs. Lyndon A. Smith, Attorney General, and William J. Stevenson, Assistant Attorney General, for respondents:

Land is enhanced in value from 30 to 50 per cent by the opening up and substantial improving of highways.

Benefits are special when they increase the value of the land, relieve it from a burden, or make it especially adapted to a purpose which enhances its value.

The benefits of a highway can be offset against the damages accruing to the adjacent owner. This deduction of benefits is an indirect form of assessment.

The practice of assessing benefits of country highways is common.

A local assessment for a highway can be sustained on the taxing-district theory.

Maltby v. Tautges, 50 Minn. 248, 52 N. W. 858; Steiner v. Sullivan, 74 Minn. 498, 77 N. W. 286; State ex rel. Skyllingstad v. Gunn, 92 Minn. 436, 100 N. W. 97; Van Pelt v. Bertilrud, 117 Minn. 50, 134 N. W. 226; Cooley, Const. Lim. 479.

Bunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by plaintiff, a taxpayer, to enjoin defendants, as state officers, from paying out funds of the

The distinction between these two questions is pointed out in Bowles v. State, 37 Ohio St. 35, a case involving the former question, in which the court said: "Much has been said in argument against the validity of this statute, on the assumption that it was intended as an exercise of the power of local assessment. . . . We do not think the legislature intended to exercise the power of local assessment according to benefits. . . . The intent of the legislature, we think, was to establish special taxing districts for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the construction of free turnpikes therein, and to impose the burden thereof by taxation upon all the property within the district by a uniform rate, according to its true value in money. And in so far as that purpose can be accomplished under the statute, without an infraction of the Constitution, we see no objection to its operation."

But while rural highways, as well as city streets, may be constructed by taxation, as distinguished from an assessment, and while it seems clear that the cost of opening or improving a city street may be defrayed by local assessments against the abutting property, on the basis of special benefits conferred thereon, there has been a difference of opinion as to whether a rural highway is a local improvement, such that the cost, or a part of the cost, thereof may be specially assessed against the abutting or tributary property on the basis of special benefits conferred, and without regard to value.

On the one hand, it has been said, in accord with MURRAY v. SMITH, that "they both [streets and highways] seem equally proper subjects for the application of the principal of assessment, on the ground of local benefit to property. They are constructed along the line or through the lands of a proprietor; they become a part of the improvement, or betterment, of the land itself; they are outlets required for its full enjoyment and use." Law v. Madison, S. & G. Turnp. Co. 30 Ind. 77.

So, an act authorizing the assessment, to the extent of the benefit received, of all lands within 1½ miles on either side, or within 1½ miles of the terminus, of any road authorized by a certain prior act, for the purpose of the construction and completion of the road, is not in conflict with a constitutional provision that the legislature shall provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, or a provision that it shall not pass local or special laws for the assessment and collection of taxes for state, county, township, or road purposes. Ibid.

And the assessment of the costs and expenses of the improvement of a county road against real estate adjacent thereto and benefited thereby, within 2 miles on either side and 1 mile beyond the terminus of such improvement, according to the benefits derived therefrom, is not a taking of property without due process of law, nor is a road act authorizing such assessment a violation of a constitutional provision that taxation shall be equal and uniform. St. Benedict's Abbey v. Marion County, 50 Or. 411, 93 Pac. 231.

Likewise, an act providing for the assessment of benefits, to the extent of certain proportions of the cost of the improvement of county highways, against the county, against all property within certain cities within the county, against the lots and lands lying within the proposed improvement boundaries, and against the road districts or townships through which or into which the im-state in constructing a rural highway in Pennington county under the provisions of chapter 254, p. 352, Laws 1911. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appealed.

The sole question involved is the constitutionality of the law under which defendants propose to pay the money of the state in aid of the construction of the highway. The only feature of the law that is assailed is that providing for the assessment of lands benefited by the highway for one fourth of the cost thereof. Section 1 of chapter 254 provides for the construction or improvement of highways by county boards, to be known as "state rural highways," upon the approval of a petition for the same by the county board and the state highway commission, and that "the expense therefor shall be borne one fourth by local assessment, one fourth by the county, and one half by the state." Section 2 provides that such highways shall be constructed or improved by a procedure identical with the proceeding prescribed by §§ 3 to 52, inclusive, of chapter 230, pp. 305-337,

Laws 1905 (Rev. Laws Supp. 1909, §§ 2651-45 to 2651-95), the drainage law, so far as the same may be made applicable to the construction or improvement of highways, to the raising of money therefor, and to the assessment of benefits, one fourth only of the cost of "state rural highways" to be met by assessment. These sections of the drainage law, in so far as applicable, are made a part of this act. By turning to these provisions in chapter 230, Laws 1905, we find that the county board can act only upon a petition signed by six or more of the landowners whose land is liable to be assessed for the highway, setting forth the necessity thereof and that it will be of public benefit or promote the public health. The county board must approve the petition, as must the state highway commission. The assessment district is not limited, but the viewers determine the amount of benefits to the lands, to the aggregate of not more than one fourth of the cost of the highway. Their report is made to the board, and after notice and hearing it rests with the board to determine whether the improvement is located, to cover the cost of the improvement, is not in violation of a constitutional provision that the legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon municipal corporations or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for municipal purposes, as such assessment for benefits is not a "tax," within the meaning of the provision, but is a special assessment for a local improvement. Seaton v. Whatcom County, 13 Wash. 48, 42 Pac. 552.

And in State ex rel. Eastman v. Warren County, 17 Ohio St. 558, it was held that a statute authorizing county commissioners to construct roads on the petition of a majority of the resident landowners along and adjacent to the line of the road, and authorizing the apportionment of the estimated cost of the work upon the land and lots that will be benefited thereby, and which are situated within 2 miles of the road, according to the benefit to be derived therefrom, authorizes an "assessment," and not a "tax," and does not violate either a constitutional provision that counties shall have such power of local taxation as may be prescribed by law, or a constitutional requirement that laws be passed taxing all money, credits, property, etc., by uniform rule, according to their value in money.

On the other hand, in the earlier Minnesota case of Sperry v. Flygare, 80 Minn. 325, 49 L.R.A. 757, 81 Am. St. Rep. 261, 83 N. W. 177, referred to at length in the opinion in MURRAY v. SMITH, it was held that a rural highway is not "a local improvement," within the meaning of a constitutional exemption of assessment by municipal corporations for local improvements, from a constitutional requirement that all taxes shall be as nearly equal as may be; and that a statute authorizing county commissioners to lay out and establish county highways, and to charge and assess the cost and expense thereof to all lands lying within 1 mile of the highway, with certain exceptions, according to the benefits received, is accordingly a violation of such constitutional requirement and invalid.

And in Graham v. Conger, 85 Ky. 582, 4 S. W. 327, and Conger v. Bergman, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 899, 11 S. W. 84, it was held that the mode of assessments for street improvements cannot be applied to the improvement of highways in the country; and that an act authorizing the assessment of the whole cost of improving and macadamizing a rural highway upon the owners of land lying between two lines parallel to the center of the road and distant on each side 800 feet therefrom, is unconstitutional, as imposing unequal taxation, and taking private property for public use without compensation.

And upon a second appeal in the case of Graham v. Conger, supra, this was held to be true, although the land embraced in the assessment district created by the act receives special and peculiar benefits from the improvement by reason of its peculiar situation, as the road, after being improved at the cost of a few citizens, remains a public highway for the use of all, and thus the burden is imposed upon a few for the benefit of the public. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 12, 11 S. W. 467.

And a public highway, 7 miles long, mainly through agricultural land, has been held not to be a local improvement, to pay for which a local assessment may be levied, by the acre, upon the land lying within 1 mile on each side thereof. Re Washington Ave. 69 Pa. 352, 8 Am. Rep. 255. A. C. W.

whether the benefits have been duly assessed, and to confirm the report and to establish the highway. The assessments are payable in ten annual equal instalments, with 6 per cent interest. An appeal lies to the district court.

We have stated so much of the law for the purpose of making clear the precise question involved, and to show that the rights of landowners are well safeguarded. Does the fact that one fourth of the cost of the highway is assessed upon lands deemed specially benefited make the law in violation of § 1 of article 9 of the Constitution of this state, which provides that taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects ". . . provided that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation?" We have held that counties are municipal corporations, within the meaning of the constitutional provision, for the purpose of levying and collecting the assessments provided for by drainage laws. Dowlan v. Sibley County, 36 Minn. 430, 31 N. W. 517; Lien v. Norman County, 80 Minn. 58, 82 N. W. 1094; McGee v. Hennepin County, 84 Minn. 472, 88 N. W. 6. There is no difficulty in extending this ruling to the present case. The crucial question here is whether a rural highway is or may be a special benefit to neighboring lands, as distinguished from a general benefit to the public. Plaintiff relies upon Sperry v. Flygare, 80 Minn. 325, 49 L.R.A. 757, 81 Am. St. Rep. 261, 83 N. W. 177, as answering this question conclusively in the negative. The law held unconstitutional in the Sperry Case was clearly vicious. The entire cost of the highway was assessed upon lands within the prescribed limit of 1 mile on either side, whether the costs exceeded the benefits or not. The present law assesses one fourth of the cost upon lands deemed specially benefited, without defining the limits of the assessment district. The 1895 law (Laws 1895, chap. 302) worked a great hardship upon the farmers of the state; it might easily be confiscatory. The present law is not burdensome; but one fourth of the cost is assessed, and that is payable in ten instalments. We have no hesitation in saying that the law under attack in this case is meritorious, and that it should be sustained, unless it is entirely clear that lands outside of cities and villages can receive no special benefit by the construction and maintenance of good roads.

that case laid on the fact that the law imposed the entire cost on adjoining lands, without regard to the lands benefited by the highway, yet it may well be considered as authority for the proposition that rural highways are not local improvements. This is perfectly true in the sense that lands bordering on the highway are not benefited in the way lots bordering on a city street are benefited. It is not the fact that the road is in front of or along the border of the farm which creates the special benefit, but the fact that the farmer is given a good road to use in going to and from his markets. But we do not consider the Sperry Case controlling on the proposition that lands tributary to a rural highway may not receive a special benefit therefrom different in character and extent from the benefit received by the public. The land of the farmer who is given a good road to market, where before he had a poor one, is certainly enhanced in value by the improvement. So is the land of every other owner who is thus given easy access to the cities or towns where he sells his produce and makes his purchases. The general public receive a benefit wholly different in character. The benefit to the motorist of the cities in having good roads for his pleasure runs is an example of the general benefit. Lands not in the territory reached by the highway and whose owners cannot use it, receive no special benefit.

The law in question does not attempt to say what lands are benefited, but leaves the determination of the district, as well as the distribution of the assessment, to the viewers, and ultimately to the court. It is right that lands tributary to the highway should pay a part of the cost thereof, over and above what the public pays, for they receive a benefit over and above what the general public receives. The principles applied to the spreading of assessments for parks, for paving city streets, or laying sidewalks would be entirely erroneous, if applied to fixing the district or spreading the assessment for rural highways. But this is a question that does not concern the validity of the law, but rather the validity of the action that the viewers and the board of county commissioners may take in the matter. If they proceed upon an erroneous principle, or make a demonstrable mistake of fact, there is a remedy by appeal.

It is twelve years since the decision in Sperry v. Flygare. The Constitution has been amended. The value of good roads is better understood. The farmer now has his automobile, his traction engines, and his telephone. He has all the facilities for reaching the best markets at the right time, except the good road. We think it can fairly be said that the establishment and maintenance of a rural highway, that gives the owner of land easy and convenient access to his markets, enhances the value of his land and constitutes a special benefit, different in character from the public or general benefit. It is true that at no time have farm lands been assessed for roads, except that, in assessing damages, benefits to the land have been deducted from the amount awarded to the landowner. This is a recognition of the fact that a highway may be a special benefit to land outside of cities and villages. See Swenson v. Hallock, 95 Minn. 163, 103 N. W. 895, quoting with approval Trinity College v. Hartford, 32 Conn. 452. It would seem that, if there are local benefits that can be set off against the damages awarded to a landowner by the establishment of a highway, the same local benefits are sufficient to warrant an assessment. The weight of authority to-day seems to be to the effect that a highway may be a local improvement, and that an assessment of lands specially benefited may be unsustained. Page & J. Taxation by Assessment, § 322; Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548, 42 L. ed. 270, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 966; Law v. Madison, S. & G. Turnp. Co. 30 Ind. 77; Monroe County v. Harrell, 147 Ind. 500, 46 N. E. 124; Spaulding v. Mott, 167 Ind. 58, 76 N. E. 620; Jones v. Tonawanda, 158 N. Y. 438, 53 N. E. 280; Seanor v. Whatcom County, 13 Wash. 48, 42 Pac. 552.

The case of Graham v. Conger, 85 Ky. 582, 4 S. W. 327, is opposed to this view, and the Washington Ave. Case, 69 Pa. 352, 8 Am. Rep. 255, seemingly so, though in the Pennsylvania case the real vice was charging the cost of the highway at a fixed sum per acre against adjacent lands, which the court held was so obviously unreasonable and erroneous as not to constitute on any fair principle of reasoning a valuation according to benefits. This may properly be said of any law that attempts to impose a front-foot assessment on lands adjacent to the highway, or that attempts to say that only farms that border on the road are specially benefited by it. This was practically the vice in the 1895 law. Lands that do not border on the highway, even though they are quite distant therefrom, receive a special benefit, if the owner has access to the highway, and can use it to go to and from his market.

We do not think the law can be upheld on the ground that the construction of a particular highway may involve drainage features. We place our decision on the ground that a public rural highway is or may be a special benefit to lands in the territory tributary to the same, as distinguished 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

from the general benefit accruing to the general public. We hold that the provision of the act assessing one fourth of the cost of the highway upon lands specially benefited is not obnoxious to article 9, § 1, of the Constitution.

FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,

v.

MCCOY & SPIVEY BROTHERS.

(— Okla. —, 122 Pac. 125.)

Bills and notes — definition.

1. As defined by §§ 4626 and 4627, Comp. Laws 1909, a "negotiable instrument" is a written promise or request for the payment of a certain sum of money to order or bearer, and must be made payable in money only, and without any condition not certain of fulfillment.

Same — negotiability — discount for prompt payment.

2. A note given December 16, 1908, payable in instalments three months apart, which contains a stipulation that, if it is paid within fifteen days from date, a discount of 5 per cent will be allowed, being uncertain as to the amount necessary to satisfy it at the time of its execution, is non-negotiable.

ERROR to the County Court for Oklahoma County to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dumars & Vaught and R. E. Gish for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Welty & Price and Berry H. Randolph for defendants in error.

Headnotes by SHARP, C.

Note. — Bills and notes: negotiability as affected by provision for discount in event of payment before maturity.

The weight of authority is with FARMERS' LOAN & T. Co. v. McCoy, in holding that a provision in a note for a discount if it is paid before maturity, renders it non-negotiable.

Thus, in Way v. Smith, 111 Mass. 525, a note providing that it might be paid at any time before maturity, and that interest at the rate of 18 per cent should be deducted till due, was held to be non-negotiable, because uncertain both as to time and amount.

In Fralick v. Norton, 2 Mich. 130, 55 Am.

Sharp, C., filed the following opinion:

The sole question necessary for determination of this case is whether or not the note sued on is a negotiable instrument. Omitting indorsements, the note is as follows:

Oklahoma City P. O. Chicago, Ill., Dec. 16, '08.

For value received we promise to pay to the order of the Equitable Manufacturing Company (Not Incorporated), Chicago, Ill., three hundred seventy-four dollars and forty cents ($374.40), at Chicago, Ill., in four instalments, payable as below:

A discount of 5
per cent will be	8 months after date 8 $93.60
allowed if paid	6 months after date 6 93.60
within fifteen	9 months after date 9 93.60 days from date.	12 months after date 12 93.60
Instalments after maturity draw 6 per cent interest.

It is agreed that default in the payment of any of the above instalments shall, at the option of the payee herein, render the whole unpaid balance immediately due and payable.

[Signed] McCoy & Spivey Bros.

The question was before the supreme court of the territory in Randolph v. Hudson, 12 Okla. 516, 74 Pac. 946, in which it was held that a note in the following language was non-negotiable:

Enid, O. T., May 15, 1894.

Thirty days after date I promise to pay to the order of J. H. Thomas two hundred and seventy-five dollars ($275), with interest at the rate of 12 per cent from date if not paid at maturity. Value received.

N. Randolph.

The opinion is by Irwin, J., and a number of authorities were there reviewed, including cases from California and South Dakota, decided under statutes the same as here, and, after reviewing these authorities and considering the statute, the court used this language: "From a careful consideration of all the authorities, we think the true rule as to negotiable paper is that certainty as to payor and payee, the amount to be paid, and the terms of payment, is an essential quality of a negotiable promissory note; and that it is not sufficient that the amount necessary to liquidate the note on the day when due can be determined, but certainly must continue until the obligation is discharged."

The court proceeded to cite various authorities, including the Supreme Court of the United States, in Stutsman County v. Wallace, 142 U. S. 312, 35 L. ed. 1025, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 227, on the question of the binding effect of the construction of an adopted statute, arriving at the conclusion that the court was bound, in that instance, by the construction of the supreme court of the state of South Dakota of the statute then under consideration. The decision of the supreme court of that state deemed binding on the court was Hegeler v. Comstock, 1 S. D. 138, 8 L.R.A. 393, 45 N. W. 331. To this case we may add Merrill v. Hurley, 6 S. D. 592, 56 Am. St. Rep. 859, 62 N. W. 958; National Bank v. Feeney, 12 S. D. 156, 46 L.R.A. 732, 76 Am. St. Rep. 594, 80 N. W. 186. While a different result was reached in the first-mentioned case, the result adopted in Hegeler v. Comstock, supra, was followed. The court there observed, in both Merrill v. Hurley and National Bank v. Feeney, supra, that the court of that state had placed itself in line with the class of authorities which require such a degree of certainty that the exact amount to become due and payable at any future time could be clearly ascer-

Dec. 56, a note for $60, payable on a certain date, which provided that payment of $50 on a certain earlier date would cancel the note, was held to be non-negotiable because indefinite as to the amount due.

In Story v. Lamb, 52 Mich. 525, 18 N. W. 248 (a former appeal of which is reported in 45 Mich. 488, 8 N. W. 87), a note payable on or before two years, with interest, but without interest if paid within one year, was held to be non-negotiable because being indefinite as to both time and amount.

And in National Bank v. Feeney, 12 S. D. 156, 46 L.R.A. 732, 76 Am. St. Rep. 594, 80 N. W. 186, it is held that a stipulation for a discount of 12 per cent if a note is paid before maturity renders it non-negotiable because of the uncertainty as to the amount to be paid.

But in Loring v. Anderson, 95 Minn. 101, 103 N. W. 722, a note for a certain sum, with interest payable on a certain date, with a discount of 6 per cent if paid on or before maturity, was held not to be uncertain as to amount, and therefore to be negotiable.

And in Mansfield Sav. Bank v. Miller, 2 Ohio C. C. 96, 1 Ohio C. D. 383, a note for a certain amount, due upon a fixed date, was held to be negotiable though it contained a provision for a discount of a certain sum if paid in full when due.

And in Smith v. Crane, 33 Minn. 144, 53 Am. Rep. 20, 22 N. W. 633, a note for a specified amount, payable on or before a certain date, with interest at 10 per cent until paid, with a provision for 7 per cent only if paid when due, was held to be negotiable the court taking the position that the note in effect provided for 7 per cent interest; with a penalty of larger interest if it was not paid when due.

For provision accelerating maturity as affecting negotiability, see note to Halladay State Bank v. Hoffman, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 390.

tainable at the date of the note, uninfluenced by any conditions not certain of fulfillment.

In National Bank v. Feeney, supra, the provision in the note destroying its negotiability was: "This note to be discounted at 12 per cent if paid before maturity." True, this case was decided after the adoption of the statute by the legislature; but it will be noted that it is based upon the former decision of the court in Hegeler v. Comstock, decided before the adoption of the statute by the territory of Oklahoma.

This court has repeatedly held that a stipulation in a promissory note, providing for attorneys' fees, etc., destroyed the negotiable character of the instrument, and thereby made it non-negotiable. Cotton v. John Deere Plow Co. 14 Okla. 605, 78 Pac. 321, in which it was held that the instrument must not contain any condition that is not capable of certainty of fulfillment. Other cases are Dickerson v. Higgins, 15 Okla. 588, 82 Pac. 649; Clevenger v. Lewis, 20 Okla. 837, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 410, 16 Ann. Cas. 56, 95 Pac. 230; Clowers v. Snowden, 21 Okla. 476, 96 Pac. 596; Adams v. Seaman, 82 Cal. 636, 7 L.R.A. 224, 23 Pac. 53; Findlay v. Pott, 131 Cal. 385, 63 Pac. 694. On the authority of the foregoing opinions and the principle announced therein, we are of the opinion that the note in question was non-negotiable.

It should be kept in mind that the present negotiable instrument act of June 11, 1909, is not involved in the present consideration having been enacted subsequent to the date of the note in question.

We find no error in the record, and conclude that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

EX PARTE J. C. AXSOM.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 141 S. W. 793.)

Sunday — running pool room — liability.

Running a pool room on Sunday in which a charge is made for the use of the tables

Note.— There seems to be no other case on the question whether keeping a pool or billiard room on Sunday is a violation of Sunday laws.

Generally as to what amusements are prohibited by Sunday laws, see note to Re Hull, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 465, and other notes there referred to.

is prohibited by a statute providing for the punishment of anyone who shall labor on Sunday, except certain specified works of necessity, among which running such a place is not included.

(Davidson, P. J., dissents.)

(November 22, 1911.)

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the County Court for Cameron County denying a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioner from custody to which he had been committed because of alleged violation of the Sunday law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. I. Hudson for appellant.

Mr. C. E. Lane, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Harper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator in this case applied for, and obtained, a writ of habeas corpus before the county judge of Cameron county, asking release from arrest on a complaint charging him with violating the Sunday law.

The contention was made that it was not a violation of the law to operate a pool room on Sunday. The county judge held it was a violation of the law, and remanded the relator to the custody of the sheriff. The complaint charged: "On or about the 27th day of February, 1910, in the county of Cameron and state of Texas, it being Sunday, one J. C. Axsom, of said county and state, was a trader in a lawful business, to wit, keeper of a pool room, did unlawfully and wilfully open and permit his place of business to be open for the purpose of traffic, and the said J. C. Axsom did unlawfully and wilfully labor and do and perform the labor, work, and business of keeping a pool room, the same not then and there being a work of necessity or charity." The relator himself testified: "My name is J. C. Axsom. I live in Brownsville, Texas. I keep a pool room in the city of Brownsville, Texas, on Elizabeth street. I was so engaged on Sunday the 27th day of February. I was at my place of business on said day, managing and operating my pool room. I dusted off the pool and billiard tables, and did such other work as I am accustomed to do. A number of people played pool and billiards at my said place of business. Among them were Graham Mason, Jesse Mason, and William Tate. I made a charge for the games played, and collected from said above-named parties the sum of 30 cents for two games of pool played. I personally opened my said place of business on Sunday, February 27, 1910, and kept the same open all day. I made no charge for admission to the pool room. The only charge I made was for the use of the cues and games played."

The evidence thus appears undisputed that relator opened and run his pool room on the Sabbath; and the sole question to be decided is, Do the statutes of this state prohibit the running of a pool room on Sunday? Article 196 of the Penal Code provides: "Any person who shall labor on Sunday shall be fined not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars." And article 197 exempts from the provisions of the preceding articles ferrymen, keepers of toll bridges, keepers of hotels, boarding houses, restaurants, and keepers of livery stables, etc., evidently showing that the legislature intended that the word "labor" should be given its broadest signification; and this court in the case of Ex parte Kennedy, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 148, 51 L.R.A. 270, 58 S. W. 129, holds that "the ordinary vocation of a barber comes within the statute prohibiting all persons from laboring on Sunday." In Quarles v. State, 55 Ark. 10, 14 L.R.A. 194, 17 S. W. 269, it is held that selling theater tickets was labor within the meaning of a similar statute. It was held in Cortsey v. Territory, 6 N. M. 682, 19 L.R.A. 349, 30 Pac. 947, that a person selling intoxicating liquors on Sunday was engaged in "labor" within the meaning of the Sunday act. In State v. Frederick, 45 Ark. 348, 55 Am. Rep. 555, it was held that a barber within the meaning of the Sunday law was a laborer, and in Stewart v. Davis, 31 Ark. 518, 25 Am. Rep. 576, a livery-stable keeper is held to be a laborer. In Cincinnati v. Rice, 15 Ohio, 225, the prohibition of common labor was held to embrace the selling and buying of any goods, wares, and merchandise under their statute. The word "labor" has been given a broad meaning when construing the laws relative to the observance of Sunday; and when we read the statutes of the state relative to what is prohibited in specific language, and what excepted from the operation of the law, no other conclusion can be drawn than that the intent of the legislature was to prohibit running a pool hall on the Sabbath, and such construction should be given their language as to effectuate that purpose. One who in his language managed and operated the pool room, dusted the pool and billiard tables, set the balls, furnished the cues, and did such other work as is necessary in a pool room, is within the definition of "laborer," if a barber, livery-stable keeper, and bartender come within the meaning of that word. The legislature intended to exempt only such labor and vocations as are necessary for the welfare of mankind, recognizing that human experience had demonstrated that days of rest were necessary for the best interest of the human race. In the case of Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal. 502, Judge Field has well expressed this thought, saying: "In its enactment the legislature has given the sanction of law to a rule of conduct which the entire civilized world recognizes as essential to the physical and moral well-being of society. Upon no subject is there such a concurrence of opinion, among philosophers, moralists, and statesmen of all nations, as on the necessity of periodical cessations from labor. One day in seven is the rule, founded in experience and sustained by science. There is no nation possessing any degree of civilization where the rule is not observed, either from the sanctions of the law or the sanctions of religion. This fact has not escaped the observation of men of science, and distinguished philosophers have not hesitated to pronounce the rule founded upon a law of our race." Again: The same authority quotes with approval the following from the supreme court of Pennsylvania (Specht v. Com. 8 Pa. 312, 49 Am. Dec. 518): "All agree that to the well-being of society periods of rest are absolutely necessary. To be productive of the required advantage, these periods must recur at stated intervals, so that the mass of which the community is composed may enjoy a respite from labor at the same time. They may be established by common consent, or, as is conceded, the legislative power of the state may, without impropriety, interfere to fix the time of their stated return, and enforce obedience to the direction. When this happens, some one day must be selected, and it has been said the round of the week presents none which, being preferred, might not be regarded as favoring some one of the numerous religious sects into which mankind are divided. In a Christian community, where a very large majority of the people celebrate the first day of the week as their chosen period of rest from labor, it is not surprising that that day should have received the legislative sanction."

We are of the opinion that the complaint charged an offense against the laws of this state, and judgment is affirmed.

Davidson, P. J., dissenting:

I feel constrained to dissent in this case from the conclusion reached by my brethren that the opening of a pool room or the operation of a pool room or billiard hall on Sunday is a violation of the Sunday law. Especially do I disagree with this on the ground upon which they place it: that is, that the man who opens his pool room or operates it on Sunday is a laborer within the terms of our statute.

Article 196 of the Penal Code which relator was charged with violating, reads as follows: "Any person who shall hereafter labor or compel, force, or oblige his employees, workmen, or apprentices to labor on Sunday, etc., shall be fined not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars." Relator, if guilty, is to be so adjudged under the first clause, "Any person who shall hereafter labor on Sunday shall be fined." From the evidence relator was the proprietor of an ordinary pool parlor or hall, and kept his pool tables for the purpose or remuneration, for which he charged a fee, not for admittance to the hall, but charged those who played games on his tables at a stipulated price. Billiard halls or parlors and pool halls or parlors have at all times and under all circumstances, so far as I am aware, been classed as places of amusements, where people go to entertain themselves by playing games on the tables for pleasure, amusement, or to while away the odd hours for pleasure, but it has never been held or regarded as a place where people labor or work. It would hardly be considered a machine shop or factory, or a planing mill, or any of those various places where people congregate as laborers and employ their time in such service. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 943; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 54.

Keepers of billiard halls and pool halls are required to pay an occupation tax usually to pursue such character of business. The legislature has further provided that, if such character of tables are exhibited for the purpose of securing betters or gaming, the owner or keeper of the table would be guilty of exhibiting the same under the gambling act, and this although it may be a licensed occupation; and it has been further held in this state that, if the players of the game of pool should bet or wager on the game, they would be guilty of betting. It has also been held that the betting of the table fees would constitute gambling; and, if the owner of the table was aware of the fact and permitted the parties to bet the table fees, this would constitute him the keeper of the gaming table. It would hardly be contended under these circumstances, at least ought not to be, that the keeper of such a place would be what is commonly known as a laborer. Article 196, quoted, does not include pool parlors within its terms, and, if it be so held under the terms of the article, it would be by the most strained construction. It cannot be held to be a place of amusement under article 199, because of the fact that entrance fees are not paid and other reasons as well, and it is not to be classed as amusement 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under the terms of that statute. My brethren evidently believe that it is not within the terms of article 199. That article interdicts traders, merchants, and those who carry on a lawful trading business opening their business on Sunday for the purpose of traffic. It is more than difficult to comprehend how the proprietor of a pool hall could be held to be a laborer under the terms of our statute. It does not include him; and, if the statute is not susceptible of the construction under the ordinary language as commonly understood, he would not be within the terms of the statute. No man can be held to violate a law in Texas unless the legislature has made it an offense in plain language. Penal Code, arts. 1, 9. If we take the definition of what constitutes a laborer, then it is clear that relator cannot be brought within the definition of the term as commonly understood. A "laborer," as defined by Mr. Webster, is one who works at a toilsome occupation. A laborer is one who performs manual labor. Re Ho King (D. C.) 8 Sawy. 438, 14 Fed. 724, 725; Wildner v. Ferguson, 42 Minn. 112, 6 L.R.A. 338, 18 Am. St. Rep. 495, 43 N. W. 794; Milligan v. San Antonio & G. S. R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 46 S. W. 918, 919; McPherson v. Stroup, 100 Ga. 228, 28 S. E. 157; Weatherby v. Saxony Woolen Co. — N. J. Eq. —, 29 Atl. 326; Coffin v. Reynolds, 37 N. Y. 640; Whitaker v. Smith, 81 N. C. 340, 31 Am. Rep. 503; Wentroth's Appeal, 82 Pa. 469; Boyle v. Mountain Key Min. Co. 9 N. M. 237, 50 Pac. 347; Stuart v. Poole, 112 Ga. 818, 81 Am. St. Rep. 81, 38 S. E. 41; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Lyle, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 753, 26 S. W. 264. It is useless to multiply these authorities. They are very numerous in the United States. I have searched the authorities with some degree of interest to ascertain if it has been held by any court that a pool hall would be construed to be a laboring establishment, or the keeper or employee of the keeper of such hall would constitute either a laborer as that term is usually understood. Judge Brooks in Benson v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 609, 85 S. W. 800, held that a bartender who sold beer on Sunday could not be held to be a laborer. In fact, under our statute, he would not be a laborer, but, if guilty of selling on Sunday would come within the terms of article 199 by all of our decisions, which prohibit merchants, grocers, and dealers in wares and merchandise and traders in business from opening their places on Sunday. It was thought, however, by my brethren that pool halls were not within the terms of that statute. If pool halls are to be included within the terms of the Sunday law, the legislature has not seen proper to do so.

This court by construction cannot create offenses or make acts criminal within the terms of the law when not included by the legislature. Murray v. State, 21 Tex. App. 620, 57 Am. Rep. 623, 2 S. W. 757.

I do not care to pursue this subject further. I am clearly of the opinion that my brethren are in error, and that by their opinion they have construed into existence a violation of law which has not been created by the legislature. I therefore respectfully dissent.

H. O. BLANKENSHIP, Appt.,
v.
KING COUNTY, Respnt.

(68 Wash. 84, 122 Pac. 616.)

Highway — permitting obstruction — liability of county.

1. A county which permits granite blocks,

Note.—Liability of county, town, or municipality for obstruction or defect outside of traveled portion of highway.

Generally municipalities are held to have fully performed their duty when they have constructed highways of reasonable width and smoothness; and if a traveler chooses, without reasonable cause, to travel outside 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

which have been placed by a citizen on the graded part of a highway, but outside the macadamized part, to remain there for five months, may be held liable for injury to a traveler on the highway whose vehicle comes into collision with them in the dark.

Same — knowledge of obstruction — contributory negligence.

2. The mere fact that one attempting to drive along a highway on a dark rainy night knew that granite blocks had been left lying adjacent to the macadamized portion of the way, at a certain point, does not establish contributory negligence on his part as matter of law, in coming into collision with them.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County dismissing an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

such way, he assumes the risk. 37 Cyc. 294.

Thus no liability attached to a town where a traveler voluntarily left the traveled highway and was injured by walking or driving into a hole or ditch located within the limits, but outside of the traveled portion, of the highway (Burr v. West Brookfield, 184 Mass. 309, 68 N. So, where plaintiff was injured by step-

Messrs. George F. Hannan and Richard G. Hutchinson, for appellant:

Appellant's knowledge of the defect and his failure to have it in mind at the time of the happening of the injury was not negligence per se.

Messrs. John F. Murphy and Robert H. Evans, for respondent:

The county was free from negligence.

Rust v. Essex, 182 Mass. 313, 65 N. E. 397; Carey v. Hubbardston, 172 Mass. 106, 51 N. E. 521; Stricker v. Reedsburg, 101

Wis. 457, 77 N. W. 897; Goeltz v. Ashland, 75 Wis. 642, 44 N. W. 770.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant sought in this action to recover for personal injuries received by him from an accident happening while he was driving a team upon a county road in King county. The roadbed at the place of the accident was some 24 feet in width, and had been macadamized for a width of 16 feet along its center. The road, so the appellant testified, was traveled throughout its entire width, although the heavy traffic passed over the macadamized portion of the way. At the place of the accident, and for some distance on each side thereof, the road had ping upon a culvert made of plank and covered with earth within the limits of the highway, the court said: "To render a verdict for the plaintiff, the jury must have found that the place where the accident happened was within the limits of that part of the highway wrought and prepared by the defendants for public travel." Kellogg v. Northampton, 8 Gray, 504.

So, where a horse which a traveler was leading became frightened, and she was injured by being dragged over a pile of stones which had been scraped out of and left beside the road, the town was held not guilty of negligence in leaving the stones there for a few days while the men were busy in another part of the town. Stedman v. Osceola, 147 App. Div. 220, 132 N. Y. Supp. 28.

So, where a traveler chose to leave the traveled highway, the city was held not liable for injury sustained:

—by falling off end of culvert. Scranton v. Hill, 102 Pa. 378, 48 Am. Rep. 211; Monongahela City v. Fischer, 111 Pa. 9, 56 Am. Rep. 241, 2 Atl. 87.

—by pedestrian falling into ditch within located limits, but out of the traveled part of highway, she not being a traveler within the meaning of the statute providing for recovery of damages arising from defects in streets and highways. Leslie v. Lewiston, 62 Me. 468.

—by falling into a hole 5 feet outside of street, the defect not being in the highway within the meaning of the statute, so as to render the village liable. Keyes v. Marcellus, 50 Mich. 439, 45 Am. Rep. 52, 15 N. W. 542.

—by falling over scantling lying in the road, the court stating that if the pedestrian chose to use that portion of the street designated for vehicles, instead of the portion designated for pedestrians, it was his duty to exercise sufficient care to avoid an obstacle of that character. Brown v. Chicago, 135 Ill. App. 126.

But, notwithstanding the general rule that municipalities are not liable for accidents outside of the traveled portion of a highway, they may, under certain circumstances, be held liable, as where the obstruction tion or defect is near the traveled portion, and the traveler accidentally or by necessity deviates from the traveled way.

Thus, a town was held liable for personal injury sustained where a horse shied and the wagon struck a post near the traveled highway (Fowler v. Linquist, 138 Ind. 566, 37 N. E. 133), or a log outside of but within close proximity to the traveled part (Snow v. Adams, 1 Cush. 443), or where a horse suddenly swerved to avoid a mud puddle, causing the wheel to strike a stump standing a few inches outside of the traveled track (Boltz v. Sullivan, 101 Wis. 608, 77 N. W. 870).

And where a horse became restive and plaintiff reined him out of the traveled part of the road, sustaining injury by the chaise running over a log beside the traveled part of the highway, the city was held liable. Cobb v. Standish, 14 Me. 198.

So, a town was held liable where a blind man on a dark night left the traveled portion of the road to avoid an approaching team, and by so doing was injured by stepping over a bank wall, such deviation being, by law, deemed a necessity. Glidden v. Reading, 38 Vt. 52, 88 Am. Dec. 639.

So, where the wrought way was impassable by reason of snow drifting, and for that reason a traveler drove outside of the usually traveled path, and was injured by reason of a defect, the city was held liable, in Savage v. Bangor, 40 Me. 176, 63 Am. Dec. 658, it having constructive notice that the highway was defective.

So, where a highway became impassable because of snow, and a traveler, to avoid the drift, took a side track and was injured by a horse while assisting it out of the deep snow, the town, under its statutory duty to keep the highway in repair, was held liable for failure to render the highway passable when it had notice of its defective condition. Hogg v. Brooke, 7 Ont. L. Rep. 273.

But where plaintiff reined her horse out of the road on the opposite side from an electric car, and her carriage dropped down over the end of a culvert, causing her injury, a verdict for plaintiff was set aside on the ground that her thoughtless inattenbeen graded out from the side of a hill, and lay in the shape of a curve; the point of the curve extending towards the summit of the hill. On the other side it broke off abruptly, owing to the fact that the roadbed was built up from the natural slope of the hill. Some five months or more before the accident one Barret, for purposes of his own, in no way connected with the affairs of the county, hauled and placed on the roadbed between the macadamized portion of the way and the hill two blocks of granite 2 feet by 2 feet by 4 feet in size, laying them diagonally to the course of the road, so that their ends reached within a foot and a half or 2 feet of the macadamized part of the road. On the evening of September 16, 1909, the appellant drove along the highway towards his home with a team of well-broken horses and a light wagon, traveling in a trot at a speed of perhaps 6 miles an hour. As he reached the point in the road where the granite blocks were placed, he collided with them. The collision broke the right front wheel of his wagon to pieces, and caused the right hind wheel to loosen from the axle and to roll off. The team thereupon started to run away, dragging the appellant, and before they were stopped he received the injuries for which he sues in this action.

In his direct as well as his cross-examination the appellant admitted that he was familiar with the road over which he was traveling; that he had traveled it many times in the nighttime as well as the daytime; that he knew the exact location thereon of the granite blocks; and that his team tion, the very essence of negligence, was the cause of the accident. Tasker v. Farmingdale, 85 Me. 523, 27 Atl. 464, motion for new trial sustained on ground supporting former ruling, 88 Me. 103, 33 Atl. 785.

And see the subdivision, "Loitering, deviation," in note to Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 751.

So, a municipality has been held liable for injury sustained by reason of defect or obstruction in close proximity or so connected with the traveled portion of the highway as to be dangerous to the people traveling thereon, and it is upon this rule that the decision of the reported case, BLANKENSHIP v. KING COUNTY, rests.

Thus, under this rule, a town was held liable where a pedestrian injured himself by stumbling over boulders lying alongside of the traveled part of the road (Wheeler v. Westport, 30 Wis. 392); or by driving upon scales set in the highway margin which, by long use, had become part of a road which the town was bound to keep in repair (Potter v. Castleton, 53 Vt. 435); or by driving into a stump allowed to remain at the edge of the traveled part of the highway (Foley v. East Flamborough Twp. 26 Ont. App. Rep. 43).

And where an apparently safe but in fact deep and dangerous watering place was located within the limits of a highway, but outside of and connected with the traveled highway by a well-beaten path, the town was held liable for loss of a horse, occasioned by his falling into the water while attempting to drink. Cobb v. Standish, 14 Me. 108. In the above case the court said: "The traveled part of the road was of sufficient width and well made for ordinary accommodation, but a portion of the space in which the public have an easement was unsafe; and the danger, being concealed, was calculated to deceive and entrap a traveler. Towns are not obliged to provide watering places for the public convenience, but when they are provided by nature in the highway, they ought not to be suffered to become pitfalls first to allure and then to destroy horses or other animals turned aside to partake [of] the refreshment to which they are thus invited."

So in Wakeham v. St. Clair Twp. 91 Mich. 15, 51 N. W. 696, where plaintiff was thrown from his horse by the horse stepping into an existing hole in the highway, or by the ground sinking beneath the horse's feet as a result of water action under ground, the court said that if the hole was so near the traveled way, or way intended for travel, that a person would be likely to get into it in seeking to avoid a mud hole, the township was guilty of negligence in allowing it to remain there for an unreasonable time. If, however, the hole was so open and notorious that a person using ordinary care would have observed and avoided it, the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in riding into it. These questions were for the jury under the testimony as to the condition of the road at this point and the state of the weather at the time.

And where a person was killed by coming into contact with a broken highly charged fire alarm wire lying in the road just outside of the macadamized portion, which accident would not have occurred had the deceased kept to the macadamized part, the city was, in Emery v. Philadelphia, 208 Pa. 492, 57 Atl. 977, held liable on the ground that a city or even a borough or township may not with impunity leave a highly dangerous and insidious obstruction, such as a heavily charged and exposed electric wire, on any part of a public highway, so near it that a traveler accidentally or intentionally deviating a few feet from the beaten track may encounter it to the risk of life.

So, when a private way leading from a public way has been opened and dedicated to a public use, a city is liable for a defect between the part wrought for public travel and the entrance of the private way, unless it has cautioned the public against entering upon such private way. Paine v. Brocton, 138 Mass. 564.

See also note to Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 684, as to liability of municipality for defects or obstructions in proximity to highway.

J. D. C.

was under control at the time of the accident. But he also testified, in excuse of his act of driving upon the blocks, that the macadamized part of the road was covered over with more or less dust and dirt, especially on its edges, and that one driving over it could not always tell by the mere sound the team and wagon made whether or not they were entirely on this part of the way; that, as he approached the blocks, he was keeping well to the right of the way, so as to avoid collision with possible approaching teams and automobiles; that but a short time before the collision his team had become frightened and increased their speed somewhat, and that it took more than his usual attention to keep them under control; that the night was dark and rainy, and that the blocks could not be readily seen; and that he "was cold and wet" and "bent on getting home." At the trial, before the appellant had concluded his testimony, the court took the case from the jury and entered a judgment of dismissal, basing his action on the grounds that no negligence was shown on the part of the county, and that the defendant was guilty of negligence in driving upon the granite blocks after he had knowledge of their location in the highway. This appeal is from the judgment of dismissal.

This court has heretofore held, and it is the general rule, that counties are not obligated to open highways to travel for their full located width; but that their duty in this regard is accomplished by opening the way for a sufficient width to make it reasonably safe and convenient for ordinary travel, that it is not compelled to keep the sides of the prepared way free from obstructions, nor is it obliged to erect barriers where there is no unusual danger to be encountered. These rules are pressed upon us as sustaining the court's judgment in the present case, but it seems to us that they do not meet the question suggested by the facts in the record. The appellant in the case before us was not injured because he passed out of the part of the highway that had been opened by the public authorities for travel; on the contrary, he was injured by an obstruction placed in the very part of the way that had been so opened. If, therefore, the county was responsible for the obstruction, and the appellant was not guilty of contributory negligence, the county cannot escape liability on the ground that there was a sufficient way left open by the use of which travelers along the road could avoid collision with the blocks of granite. To place them there was to invite injury.

A traveler along a highway expects to keep within the way prepared for him, and anticipates meeting with obstructions if he departs therefrom, but he does not expect to meet with obstructions in that part of the way over which he is invited to travel, and consequently he is not to be held to as strict an accountability if he is injured by such an obstruction as he would be were he injured by an obstruction outside of the place of travel.

We have not overlooked the contention of the county to the effect that it had extended no invitation to the public to travel off the macadamized part of the highway, and that those blocks were not placed on the part that had been macadamized; that 4 feet of graded space on each side of the macadam was so graded in order to protect the macadam from breaking and spreading out with the weight of loads, and were not intended as places upon which to travel. But the record furnishes no support for these contentions. The county offered no evidence at the trial, and the evidence of the appellant is that all parts of the highway were used by the public for the purposes of travel, the dirt sides as well as the macadamized center. This is sufficient to carry to the jury the question whether the county intended that all parts of the way should be so used by the public.

It was not shown that the county permitted the granite blocks to be placed in the highway, or that any officer of the county had knowledge that they had been so placed, and it is insisted that the county cannot be held liable because of these facts. But the plaintiff did show that the blocks had been suffered to remain in the highway for a period of five months, and this is sufficient to warrant a jury in finding that the county officials knew or ought to have known of their placement therein.

The further contention that the appellant was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, because he was familiar with the highway, and had previous knowledge of the fact that the granite blocks had been placed therein, is equally without foundation. The appellant was not bound at all times, by day and by night, to keep in mind the fact that some person had placed obstructions in the way. The human mind is not so constituted that it can recall at all times things with which it is familiar, and we know from experience and observation that reasonably prudent persons receive injuries from defects and obstructions in streets and highways of the existence of which they had previous knowledge. The law does not therefore in all cases hold a person injured by a defect in a highway guilty of contributory negligence merely because he had previous knowledge of the defect, but generally treats the matter of knowledge as a fact or circumstance bearing upon the question of contributory negligence, to be submitted to the jury along with the other facts and circumstances surrounding the accident, leaving it for them to say whether, under the facts shown, the injured person was or was not guilty of contributory negligence. Benson v. Hamilton, 34 Wash. 201, 75 Pac. 805; Cowie v. Seattle, 22 Wash. 659, 62 Pac. 121; Mischke v. Seattle, 26 Wash. 616, 67 Pac. 357; McQuillan v. Seattle, 10 Wash. 464, 45 Am. St. Rep. 799, 38 Pac. 1119.

The facts in the case before us do not show conclusively that the appellant was guilty of contributory negligence. The court should not therefore have taken the case from the jury.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

SMITH BALL et al., Appts.,
v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(149 Ky. 260, 147 S. W. 953.)

Breach of peace — bond — forfeiture — shooting dog.

A conviction and fine for being disorderly, shooting a dog in a street, and insulting a citizen, does not forfeit a peace bond under statutory provisions that such bond shall be required upon apprehension that the obligor will commit violence endangering human life, or a felony, or an offense against the person or property of another, and will be forfeited by conviction of a felony or an offense constituting a breach of the peace.

(June 21, 1912.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harlan County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the penalty of a peace bond. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. C. Faulkner & Sons, for appellants:

The warrant upon which Smith Ball was tried does not necessarily contain or involve a breach of the peace.

Judicial conviction of defendant of an offense not amounting to or involving a breach of the peace is not a breach of the peace bond under § 391, subsec. 2 of the Criminal Code.

It will be seen that in BALL v. COM. it is held that, in the absence of a conviction for a felony, nothing less than "violence or injury to an individual or his property" will breach the bond.

It may be noted that in Cornett v. Com., quoted from in the BALL CASE, the bond contained an undertaking not to engage in the unlawful sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, and the defendant was convicted of such sale, and the decision of the court is that there was no authority for taking a bond which undertook to abstain from offenses not amounting to a breach of the peace.

The subject of peace bonds and of those for "good behavior" cannot well be separated, although it has been suggested that the latter is more easily breached.

In Com. v. Duane, 1 Binn. 99, Tilghman, Ch. J., said, as to surety for good behavior: "Surety for good behavior may be considered in two points of view. It is either required after conviction of some indictable offense, in which case it forms part of the judgment of the court, and is founded on a power incident to courts of record by the common law, or it is demanded by judges or justices of the peace out of court, before the trial of the person charged with an offense, in pursuance of authority derived from a statute made in the 34th year of Edward III. It is this last kind of surety we are now to consider. The statute 34 Edward III. authorizes justices of the peace to take surety for good behavior of all those that are not of good fame, to the intent that the public may not be troubled by such persons. It is supposed that this statute was made to prevent the disorders which were introduced by the soldiers of Edward the Third, numbers of whom, after serving in his armies in France, were discharged in England. The natural meaning of the words 'persons not of good fame' seems to be, those who, by their general evil course and habits of life, had acquired

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant Smith Ball, being in custody under a charge of having confederated with other persons for the purpose of intimidating and alarming others, and for having cruelly and inhumanly beaten and bruised one J. T. Farley, was, upon the motion of the commonwealth's attorney, required to give a bond in the sum of $5,000 to keep the peace and be of good behavior for a period of twelve months. He executed this bond on February 11, 1911, with his coappellants, W. M. Smith and Allen Ball, as his sureties. By the terms of his bond, Ball undertook to keep the peace and be of good behavior towards all citizens in this commonwealth for a period of twelve months,

"and that he would not be guilty of a felony, or any offense involving a breach of the peace during said time."

On July 11, 1911, Ball was tried upon a warrant issued against him by the judge of the Harlan county court, which contained the following charge: "Smith Ball has committed the offense of a breach of the peace by being disorderly, insulting Marion Etling and wife, Lidia Etling, discharging deadly weapons, and shooting a dog." Ball was tried by a jury and fined $25, which he paid. On July 25, 1911, the commonwealth instituted this action upon Ball's peace bond, seeking to recover from him and his sureties the penalty of $5,000 therein stipulated, upon the ground that it had been broken by Ball's conviction above a bad reputation, and were supposed to be dangerous to the community. In process of time, however, the construction of these expressions has been extended far beyond their original meaning, and persons are now commonly held to find surety for their good behavior who are not generally of ill fame, but have only been charged with some particular offense."

There are very few reported cases upon breaches of "peace bonds" or those for good behavior. It has been held that the bond has been breached—where there is a condition to appear—by a failure to appear (Lawton v. State, 5 Tex. 272); where there has been assault with intent to murder (State v. San Miguel, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 182, 23 S. W. 389); assault and battery (State v. Rudowsky, 65 Ind. 389; Com. v. Braynard, 6 Pick. 113); where the one bound was guilty of an affray (State v. Sanders, 153 N. C. 624, 69 S. E. 272).

But it seems to have been thought in at least one case that an assault on a third person would not necessarily breach the bond. Thus, in Rex v. Stanley, Sayer, 139, the report was that "upon a rule to shew cause why the proceedings upon a scire facias should not be stayed, it appeared, that the scire facias was brought upon a recognizance entered into by Stanley and his bail, for Stanley's keeping the peace; that the recognizance was entered into in consequence of articles of peace having been exhibited by J. S. against Stanley; and that Stanley had been guilty of assaulting J. S. The rule was discharged. And by Ryder, Ch. J., if the peace have not been broken by an assault upon the person who exhibited articles of the peace, the court will not permit a proceeding by scire facias upon a recognizance for keeping the peace, if the proceeding appear clearly to be vexatious: yet, as such recognizance is for keeping the peace to all the King's subjects, as well as to the person who exhibited the articles, the court will not, in a doubtful case, stay the proceedings upon a scire facias; because the question whether the breach of the peace by assaulting another person did amount to a forfeiture of the recognizance may be determined upon the plea of not guilty to the scire facias."

But, on the other hand, see Reg. v. Howard, 11 Mod. 109, where Lady Howard exhibited articles of the peace against her husband, whereupon he was bound to keep the peace for a year. On a motion for a discharge, upon a suggestion that she was consenting, Holt, Chief Justice, said: "How can we discharge it before the condition is performed? Besides, if my lord breaks the peace upon anyone else, it is a forfeiture of his recognizance."

In Lawton v. State, 5 Tex. 272, it was held that a bond to keep the peace and appear in answer to a charge of assault and battery is breached by a failure to appear.

In Respublica v. Cobbet, infra, it was held where a bond for good behavior was taken of one charged with libel, a libel might breach the bond.

But in State v. Sanders, 153 N. C. 624, 69 S. E. 272, it was held that convictions of C for publishing, selling, and having in possession obscene and indecent literature could not be a violation of a bond conditioned in showing that C kept the peace towards A and B.

In this connection reference may be made to Randolph v. Brown, 2 Va. Cas. 351, where the condition was that one Brown should keep the peace, and be of good behavior towards all the citizens of the commonwealth, and particularly towards Samuel Jackson. Upon this recognizance a scire facias issued against the cognizors, assigning for cause of issuing it, that said Brown had failed to perform the condition of the said recognizance, without stating how or in what he had broken it, and it was held: "That the said sci. fa. is defective in this, that it does not set forth nor aver in what particular the said Isom L. Brown had broken the condition of the said recognizance, and that for this reason it was rightfully quashed."

Where the condition of the bond was "to keep the peace as against the person, family, and property," it was held that it was error to hold that it was no breach of the bond to call A a liar, and contemporaneous-set forth. A demurrer to the petition was overruled. In the first paragraph of their answer, appellants traversed the alleged breach of the bond, and in a second paragraph they alleged affirmatively that, while Ball was walking along one of the streets of the town of Harlan in a quiet, civil, and orderly manner, he was attacked in a violent way by a vicious dog belonging to Marion Etling; that neither Marion Etling nor Lidia Etling, his wife, nor any other person, was present, or took any part or interest whatever in what then occurred; and that when the dog was about to bite Ball, he, in order to protect his person from injury, shot the dog, but did not kill it. Appellants further alleged that the shooting of the dog was the only charge upon which proof was offered or heard upon the trial; that Ball was found guilty only of having shot a dog, which did not constitute a breach of the peace nor any violation of the terms of the bond; and that Ball had not provoked the dog, in any way, to make the attack upon him. By an amended answer, appellants alleged there was no evidence introduced showing that Ball was guilty of or had committed any additional offense, or any of the offenses charged in the warrant upon which he was tried, except that of "discharging deadly weapons" and "shooting a dog," neither of which was done in the presence of any other person, or in such a way or manner as to commit a breach of the peace. The circuit judge sustained a demurrer to the answer as amend-ly raise a stick to strike him, and that these things, if done in anger, were "a menace of violence," and were "calculated to excite alarm or to provoke a breach of the peace," and constituted a breach of a bond to keep the peace, under §§ 1238, 1239, Penal Code 1895 of Georgia. Rumsey v. Bullard, 5 Ga. App. 802, 63 S. E. 921.

In Reg. v. Harmer, 17 U. C. Q. B. 555, a sci. fa. was brought on a recognizance (with sureties) with condition that Harmer "should keep the peace, and be of good behavior towards her Majesty and all her liege subjects, and specially towards Henry Muma, of the township of Blenheim, for the term of one year," an assault and threatening language and manner being alleged as a breach. On the trial it was shown by record that Harmer was convicted of the charge that he did "assault Henry Muma, of, etc., by using insulting and abusive language to him in his own office and in the public street, and by using his fist in a threatening and menacing manner to the face and head of the said Henry Muma." The court stated that the using his fist in a threatening manner to the head and face amounted to an assault, and said: "The sci. fa. charges that the defendant broke the peace by assaulting Muma, and also that he did not observe the condition to be of good behavior, which is a more comprehensive engagement than the other. The defendant pleaded in answer that he did not assault Muma, and did not break the peace; taking no notice of that charge against him by which, if proved, the recognizance would equally have been forfeited: namely, the not being of good behavior. This plea was therefore not a good bar. Still the Crown has taken issue upon what is pleaded, and we must determine upon this rule whether the verdict should be for the Crown or for the defendant, upon the issue joined and the evidence given at the trial. It was unquestionably proved on the part of the Crown that the defendant did, after entering into the recognizance, break the peace towards Muma, for he has been convicted by a jury of using threatening language to Muma in his presence, accompanying it by threatening gestures, all which tended to a breach of the peace, and was also a breach of the condition to be of good behavior." (It was also held in this case that the statute, relieving the defendant, who had been summarily convicted and punished, from being afterwards convicted and punished in any proceeding, civil or criminal, for the same offense, was no bar to the sci. fa. on the recognizance.)

But not mere unseemly words will breach a bond for good behavior. Thus in Rex v. Heyward, Cro. Car. 498, it is reported that upon a recognizance "of the good behavior, the breach was assigned first, because Heyward said to a constable, in executing his office, 'Thou art a lying rascal.' Secondly, because he said to another who threw down his hedges, 'One of you is dead of the plague, and I hope I shall see more of you to die of the plague.' Thirdly, because he said to a woman that 'she was a whore and jade,' and other foul words concerning her incontinency. Fourthly, because he said to one in the churchyard, after evening prayer, that 'he was a foresworn knave,' and 'a perjured knave.' The defendant pleaded not guilty. And upon evidence at the Bar, it appeared by one witness that he spake to the constable, because he affirmed that the defendant used to carry picklocks about him, 'Thou art a lying rascal.' And the other witnesses on the behalf of the King did not prove that these words were in disturbance of the execution of his office, or for any act about the executing of his office. And for all the other words, they were words of heat and intemperance: but none of them tended to the breach of peace, or to the terror of any; nor was there any act done, but only evil words, and of those words the persons against whom he spake them gave the occasion. And although the manner of speaking may be good cause in discretion to bind one to his good behavior yet one being bound, words only which tend not to the breach of peace, or terrifying others, or unto sedition, etc., shall not be sufficient cause of forfeiture of a recognizance, for then by such pretense of words a man should be in danger of his recogni-ed, and, the appellants having failed to further amend their answer, the trial court gave judgment for the commonwealth against Ball and his sureties for the sum of $5,000; and from that judgment they prosecute this appeal.

The sufficiency of the petition is the first question to be determined; and if it be found to be insufficient it will be unnecessary to consider the matters of defense set forth in the answer. A sufficient petition must show upon its face a state of facts which, in law, constitute a breach of the terms of the peace bond by which appellants covenanted that Ball "would not be guilty of a felony, or any offense involving a breach of the peace" during the year.

Section 382 of the Criminal Code of Prac-zance, which would be inconvenient. Wherefore it was left to the jury to consider of the verity and validity of the evidence, and of the manner of speaking them; whereupon they, being a substantial jury, considering thereof, gave their verdict for the defendant, that he was not guilty."

In Crabbell's Case, Leon. pt. 2, p. 166, Crabbell was bound by recognizance to his good behavior; upon which the Queen brought a scire facias, and surmised that after the recognizance acknowledged, the said Crabbell was arrested and taken by the constable for suspicion of felony, and of his own wrong escaped. It was objected on the part of Crabbell, because it is not alleged by matter in fact, that a felony was committed. But the whole court was of a contrary opinion; for it is not material if the felony were committed or not; for if a subject be arrested by a lawful officer, it is not lawful for him to escape; but he ought to stand to the law, and to answer unto the matter with which he is charged. And so Crabbell was forced to answer.

In King's Case, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 86, while nothing was decided, there is an interesting discussion on breaches of "good behavior." King was indicted for that whereas he was bound by recognizance to be of good behavior, he had said to one Kirton, that "he was a pelter, and a teller of lies, and a drunkard; and that he would make him a poor Kirton; and that he had entered and broke the close of Kirton;" for which an action of trespass vi et armis lieth. And the question was moved by Coke, if these be causes of the breach of his recognizance? for it is a common course in such cases to indict men, which will be evidence in a scire facias upon the recognizance. Wray and Gawdy conceived at first that they are no causes of the breach of the recognizance; for the party doth not break his good behavior except he doth something in act or shew which tends to the breach of the peace; as if he goeth in warlike manner with weapons, or is in company of riotous malefactors, although nothing be done; or threatens another to beat him, or to fight with him. These (although nothing be done) are tice provides as follows: "A person may be arrested for the purpose of requiring of him security to keep the peace, or for his good behavior, in the following cases:

"1. Upon the complaint on oath, of a person threatened, to a magistrate, that the defendant has threatened to commit an offense against his person or property, and upon the magistrate being satisfied, by examination on oath of the complainant or others, that there are reasonable grounds to fear the commission of the offense threatened.

"2. Upon information given on oath to a magistrate, by any person, that the defendant is about to commit violence endangering human life, or is about to commit an offense amounting to a felony, and the breaches of the good behavior. But when he speaks only words of reproach, which may procure another to break the peace, this is no breach of the good behavior. And they held clearly, that the entry into the close was no breach, being done peaceably; and he might pretend title to it; although in an action it is supposed to be vi et armis, and contra pacem. And Wray said that nothing shall be said a breach of the recognizance but that which sounds to the hurt of another, and by intentment may be a breach of the peace; as assault, menace, etc. And he said, if one be leading of his horse, and he that is bound to his good behavior doth take it from him, this peradventure may be a breach of the good behavior; for it is an assault upon his person, although he take it peaceably. Clench, contra. For the words being spoken in disdain and reproach shall be said a breach of the recognizance; for it may be cause of the breach of the peace, as well as carrying of weapons, or having a great company following him, as 2 Hen. VII. is; and the words, being malicious and opprobrious, gave occasion of blows; but the entry into the close is no breach. Schute doubted of the words, because they were opprobrious and spoken in malice, and do provoke another to break the peace.

It may be noted that in Crump v. People, 2 Colo. 316, the question as to what would have been a breach of the peace in the bond was not reached, owing to a default in filing papers.

A breach of the peace without the jurisdiction will not breach the bond. Key v. Com. 3 Bibb, 495, where the obligor undertook that a certain person should appear on a certain day, and that he should in the meantime be of good behavior towards all the citizens of the commonwealth, particularly towards A and B; and it appeared that the person whose good behavior was thus vouched for went with B across the border into the state of Ohio, and there fought a duel with him, and then both returned the same day, and it was held that an act of violence in another state was no breach of the peace bond.

magistrate being satisfied, by an examination on oath of the informant or others, that there are reasonable grounds for apprehending the commission of such violence or felony.

"3. If a magistrate or court be satisfied, by the conduct or words of a person in the presence of such magistrate or court, or from proof given before such magistrate or court, that there are reasonable grounds for apprehending that such person will commit an offense against the person or property of another."

And § 391 of the Criminal Code of Practice specifies breaches of the bond as follows:

"The following are breaches of the bond required in this chapter:

"1. The failure of the defendant to appear in the circuit court, if the bond require such appearance, or departing therefrom before he is lawfully discharged.

"2. A judicial conviction of the defendant of an offense involving a breach of the peace, within the period specified in the bond.

"3. A judicial conviction of the defendant of a felony within the time specified in the bond, if the bond be for his good behavior."

It will be noticed, while § 382, which specifies the grounds upon which a bond may be required, seems to rest that requirement upon violence, the endangering of human life, or some offense against the person or property of another, subsection 2 of § 391, supra, makes a judicial conviction of the defendant of an offense involving the mere breach of the peace an infraction of the bond. It is insisted, therefore, by appellee, that a conviction of any offense which amounts to a mere breach of the peace, in its broadest sense, is sufficient to sustain a forfeiture of the bond. This broad interpretation of the statute has not, however, been adopted by this court.

In Rankin v. Com. 9 Bush, 553, Rankin was tried and fined on the double accusation of "drunkenness" and "disorderly conduct," and upon the strength of that conviction his former recognizance to keep the peace was forfeited by the trial court. Rankin insisted, however, that a conviction for drunkenness and disorderly conduct did not amount to a breach of the obligation of his bond, and, the trial court having ruled against him, he appealed. In construing § 387 of the old Code, which is identical in terms with subsec. 2 of § 391 of the present Criminal Code of Practice, above quoted, we said: "We are of the opinion that, if the order of forfeiture can be sus-

As to whether a conviction for breach of the peace must precede action on the bond, this is sometimes covered or deemed to be covered by the statute. Thus, in Com. v. Williams, 104 Ky. 308, 47 S. W. 214, where it was alleged in a petition to recover the penalty upon a recognizance to keep the peace that the principal committed a breach of the peace, and when forcibly resisting arrest therefor was shot and killed by the sheriff, it was held that a demurrer to the petition was properly sustained, inasmuch as, under the statute, it was a prerequisite of the petition that there must have been a judicial conviction of the defendant of an offense involving a breach of the peace or of a felony within the period specified by the bond.

But compare State v. Dismukes, 101 Tenn. 694, 49 S. W. 756, where the statute provided: "An undertaking to keep the peace is forfeited by the commission by the defendant of any offense upon the person or property of another, which may be ascertained by a jury without the conviction of the defendant therefor in the circuit court, upon ten days' notice to the parties against whom the forfeiture is sought. The court said: "We think it clear that under this section the court may proceed to determine whether the terms of the bond have been breached by the defendants, whether they have been tried or convicted of any offense or not, and without waiting for such trial. There is more difficulty as to the manner in which the court may proceed. The defendant is clearly entitled to a trial by jury of the question as to whether he has breached his bond or not, and is also entitled to ten days' notice that a forfeiture will be sought. . . . We are of opinion that the statute contemplates a formal proceeding before a forfeiture can be declared, at which the defendant is allowed to present all his defenses, and have a jury for their determination, if he desires. The proper practice is therefore to require a suggestion, made in open court and entered upon the minutes of the court, that the bond has been given and returned into court and has been breached; and, upon this suggestion, which should be made at the instance of the district attorney general, the court will, if it think proper, direct a scire facias to issue, returnable after ten days, requiring the defendant to appear and show cause why the forfeiture should not be taken."

In Respublica v. Cobbet, 3 Yeates, 93, the condition of the recognizance was that the principal "shall be of good behavior towards the aforesaid commonwealth and all the liege people until the next court," etc., and it had been taken in a case of libel before conviction; the breach alleged was for libel, and it was held that the conviction of the defendant on these libels need not precede an action on recognizance, or on peace bonds, or good behavior bonds, and that the jury might find whether he was guilty of libel or not.

The following cases, while not strictly within the scope of the note, are of interest in this connection:

The people cannot be required to defer tained at all in this case, it is by virtue of the second subdivision of § 387 of the Criminal Code of Practice, which declares substantially that 'a judicial conviction of the defendant of an offense involving a breach of the peace within the period specified in the bond' shall be a breach of the bond. And the city court was not authorized, as a consequence of its last judgment convicting Rankin, to order a forfeiture of his recognizance previously taken, unless that conviction imported with reasonable certainty a breach of the condition to 'keep the peace and be of good behavior toward all good citizens.' It does not appear whether the conviction in the second proceeding against Rankin was for drunkenness merely, or for some form of disorderly conduct, or for both offenses, which, under particular and distinct ordinances, are separately punishable in the city of Louisville; but certainly either or both offenses might have been committed without violence or injury to any individual, without which the undertaking of the appellant could not have been broken, as we construe the recognizance."

The same rule was applied in Com. v. Mahoney, 2 Ky. L. Rep. 314. And in Cornett v. Com. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1769, 78 S. W. 858, where it was attempted to forfeit Cornett's peace bond, upon the ground that he had been convicted of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors in a local-option territory, this court said: "By § 382 of the Criminal Code, if the defendant had threatened to commit an offense against the person or property of another, and there are reasonable grounds to fear the commission of the offense threatened, or if he is about to commit violence endangering human life, or is about to commit an offense amounting to a felony, and there are reasonable grounds for apprehending such violence or felony, the defendant may be required to give surety to keep the peace or for his good behavior. By § 391 a judicial conviction of the defendant for an offense involving a breach of the peace, or for a felony within the time specified in the bond, is a breach of the bond. Under these provisions it has been held that a conviction of the defendant of an offense not amounting to felony, and not involving a breach of the peace, is not a breach of the bond. Rankin v. Com. and Com. v. Mahoney, supra. The conviction, therefore, for selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors in violation of the local prohibitory law was not a breach of the bond."

That a breach of the peace implies the proceeding upon the bond until the expiration of the time during which the peace is to be kept. Crump v. People, 2 Colo. 316.

A punishment suffered for the breach of the peace is no bar to a prosecution on the bond. Thus, in Com. v. Braynard, 6 Pick. 113, upon a case stated it appeared that the defendant was indicted and convicted of an assault and battery on one Rice, and sentenced to pay a fine and costs, and to give security by recognizance to keep the peace as to all citizens, and especially Rice, for one year; and that he complied with the sentence. Within the year he committed another assault and battery upon Rice, for which he was again indicted and convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine and costs, and he complied with this sentence. And it was held that an action to recover the amount of the recognizance was sustainable.

More, together with Turner and Smith, enter into a recognizance to the King, upon condition for the good behavior of More; then More is indicted, for that he, being so bound, did assault J. S., and so he hath forfeited his recognizance; and on motion the indictment was quashed because More ought to have been prosecuted by scire facias, and not by indictment. Rex v. More, T. Raym. 196.

In Crump v. People, 2 Colo. 316, it was held that in an action upon a peace bond the amount of the entire penalty was recoverable, and no computation or assessment was required.

See also to the same effect, Shirley v. Terrell, 134 Ga. 61, 67 S. E. 436. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Com. v. McNeill, 19 Pick. 127, where the peace bond bound the principal defendant to appear, and his appearance was only by attorney, by whom he asked leave to answer, it was held that the bond was properly forfeited. But the court having power under the statute to remit, it was held on the petition of the sureties that the recognizance should be reduced from $5,000 to $1,000, the purpose of it in the first place having been to prevent the fighting of a duel, the principal having left the state, and no duel having been fought.

In State v. San Miguel, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 182, 23 S. W. 389, the court held that no error unless it was an error of substance in a peace bond would be available to the obligors under the statute providing: "No error of form shall vitiate such bond, and no error in the proceedings prior to the execution of the bond shall be available as a defense in an action thereon."

In Hutchins v. Periam, 3 Bulstr. 220, after a verdict against the defendant in scire facias upon a recognizance to keep the peace, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment that there was no vi et armis charged, although a battery was laid; but the court said that there was contra pacem, and the allegation that he did beat such a man, and so had broken his recognizance, and that this was well enough without vi et armis.

But in Rex v. Hutchings, Cro. Jac. 412, which may be another report of the same case, the contrary result is reported as to a recognizance for good behavior. B. B. B.

use of physical force against another was also expressly held in Embry v. Com. 79 Ky. 440. In that case Embry was indicted, as Ball was first indicted, for having unlawfully confederated with others for the purpose of intimidating another; the offense specified in Embry's Case being a threat to prosecute Pearson for selling whisky without a license. In holding that there was no offense charged, the court said: "The mischief the legislature intended, by the statute, to provide a remedy against, was the confederating and banding together of disorderly and evil-disposed persons for the purpose of unlawfully, and by the use of physical force, or threats of force and violence, overawing and injuring the persons and property of obnoxious and defenseless individuals, to the disturbance of public tranquillity and order. 'Intimidating,' 'alarming,' and 'disturbing,' in the sense the words are obviously used by the legislature, as well as according to their legal signification, imply the use of physical force or menace, and involve a breach of the peace." See also Johnson v. Clem, 82 Ky. 86.

This court is therefore committed to the doctrine that before a peace bond can be forfeited there must have been a conviction of an offense which is either a felony, or a breach of the peace which imports violence or injury to an individual or his property; a mere breach of the public peace and order is not sufficient. This construction conforms to the earlier view upon the subject, rather than the later view, which would make any act of public indecorum or disorder a breach of the peace.

In treating of the Anglo-Saxon law, in Pollock & Maitland's History of English Law, it is said: "All criminal offenses have long been said to be committed against the king's peace; and this phrase, along with the 'king's highway' has passed into common use as a kind of ornament of speech, without any clear sense of its historical meaning. The two phrases are, indeed, intimately connected; they come from the time when the king's protection was not universal, but particular, when the king's peace was not for all men or all places, and the king's highway was in a special manner protected by it. Breach of the king's peace was an act of personal disobedience, and a much greater matter than an ordinary breach of public order; it made the wrongdoer the king's enemy." Vol. I., p. 44.

And, in speaking of the same subject under the law after it had become settled and known as the common law, the same work says:

"We may think that every crime can be esteemed a breach of the king's peace; but 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) breach of the king's grid or mund had no such extensive meaning. It only covered deeds of violence done to persons, or at places, or in short seasons that were specially protected by royal power." Vol. II., p. 453.

"The words about the king's peace have had a definite meaning; they point to a breach of the king's grid or mund,—a crime which at all events deserves the heavy wite of a hundred shillings, and which, when coupled with homicide, has been unemendable." Vol. II., p. 463.

We conclude, therefore, that under § 391 of the Criminal Code, supra, a conviction of a felony, or of an offense involving a breach of the peace, is a prerequisite to the forfeiting of a peace bond; and, under § 382, the breach of the peace contemplated by § 391 must be an offense against the person or property of another. Following this construction, it was held, in Rankin v. Com. supra, that drunkenness was not a breach of the bond, and in Cornett v. Com. supra, that illegally selling liquor was not a breach of the bond, since neither act amounted to a felony, or an offense against the person or property of another.

From this it follows that if appellant was tried and convicted merely for some public disorder, like the shooting of a dog, he is not within the rule which requires that he should have committed some act of violence or injury to an individual or his property before he can be said to have committed a breach of the peace which would forfeit his peace bond.

The petition alleges that Ball was convicted of the offense of a breach of the peace by (1) being disorderly, (2) insulting to Marion Etling and his wife, (3) discharging deadly weapons, and (4) shooting a dog. Conceding that Ball was tried and convicted upon each of these four specifications, it is, nevertheless, apparent that he has not been convicted of such a breach of the peace that could, under the definition above given, sustain a forfeiture of his peace bond, since no one of the offenses includes a charge of violence or injury to persons or property. Either of them might have been committed without violence or injury to the person or property of anyone. The nearest approach to a sufficient charge is the second, which alleges that Ball was insulting to Etling and his wife; but that language is too general in its terms to carry the idea of violence or injury to either of them upon Ball's part. And, if it be urged that the fourth charge is sufficient, because a dog is property under our law, it is a sufficient answer to say that it is not charged that the dog belonged to anyone. From this view of the authorities, we conclude that the circuit judge erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the petition.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF MARYLAND EX REL. FRANK M. EBERT, Appt.,
v.

DANIEL J. LODEN, Justice of the Peace.

(— Md. —, 83 Atl. 564.)

Moving picture operator — license — validity.

1. Requiring one to secure a license after

Note. — Regulation affecting moving pictures.

As to whether operation of moving pictures is prohibited by Sunday laws, see note in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 465.

The power to regulate places of amusement and shows extends to moving picture shows. 38 Cyc. 258.

In People v. Samwick, 127 App. Div. 209, 111 N. Y. Supp. 11, in construing a section of the Penal Code which provides that one shall be guilty of a misdemeanor who admits to, or allows to remain in, any place of entertainment injurious to health or morals, any child under sixteen unless accompanied by parent or guardian, the court said: "The word 'guardian' does not there mean a guardian appointed by a court. If children be sent or taken to the theater by a person other than one of their parents or their legal guardian,—by their elder brother or sister, or by a neighbor or friend, for instance—he or she is their guardian for the time being within the meaning of the said statute, if not excluded in some way or for some reason by law. Courts and police officials should not strain criminal statutes, or try to be better in the administration of the law than the law itself is."

License.

Moving pictures are within the contemplation of a municipal ordinance regulating a license fee for a kinetoscope. Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 409, 119 Pac. 953.

Under city ordinances which enact that certain businesses must be duly licensed, and name among such "common shows," and which provide that a "common show" shall be deemed to include Ferris wheel, gravity steeple chase, chute . . . and all other shows of like character," a license may be required for a free moving picture show in an ice cream saloon and candy store to draw trade. Weistblatt v. Bingham, 58 Misc. 328, 109 N. Y. Supp. 545. The court said that while moving picture was not within term "other shows of like character," it is included in words "common shows."

examination before operating a moving picture machine in a large city does not deprive him of his liberty or property without due process of law.

Same — discrimination — allowing time to secure license.

2. A statute requiring any person desiring to engage in the business of moving picture machine operator to secure a license is not rendered discriminatory and invalid because it gives those engaged in the business at the passage of the statute sixty days in which to secure their licenses.

Statute — construction — meaning of language.

3. That a section of a statute requiring any "such person" desiring to engage in the business of moving picture machine operator follows a section dealing with persons engaged in the business at the passage that "it shall not be lawful to exhibit to the public in any building, garden, or grounds, concert room, or other place or room within the city of New York, any interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, ballet, play, farce, minstrelsy, or dancing, or any other entertainment of the stage, or any part or parts therein, or any equestrian circus or dramatic performance, or any performance of jugglers or rope dancing, or acrobats, until a license for the place of such exhibition for such purpose shall have been first had and obtained as hereinafter provided," a license is not required for a free moving picture show in an ice-cream saloon and candy store to draw trade. Ibid.

The power of a mayor to grant a license to maintain a moving picture show is discretionary, and not mandatory, under an ordinance which requires that common shows, etc., must be licensed, and which provides that all licenses shall be granted on authority of the mayor. People ex rel. Moses v. Gaynor, 137 N. Y. Supp. 196.

In State v. Morris, — Del. —, 76 Atl. 479, it was held that one who operates a moving picture show is required to procure a license under a statute which provides that "no person or persons, firm, company, or corporation, without having first obtained a proper license therefor . . . shall . . . be engaged in, prosecute, follow, or carry on any trade . . . that is to say . . . exhibiting circuses . . .," and which further provides that "every building, tent, space, or area where feats of horsemanship or acrobatic sports or theatrical performances are exhibited shall be deemed a circus within the meaning of this act."

Where an ordinance designates all the conditions under which a permit for a license shall be issued, a requirement that a license shall issue only after a permit therefor has been granted is not invalid as delegating legislative powers. Laurelle v. Bush, supra.

An ordinance which requires a permit for exhibition of moving pictures is not unconstitutional because none is required for stereopticon or other stationary pictures.

of the act does not confine the operation of the statute to such persons and thereby make it discriminatory, where the introductory language of the statute shows that it is to apply to all who wish to engage in such business.

Block v. Chicago, 239, Ill. 251, 130 Am. St. Rep. 219, 87 N. E. 1011.

Because of possibilities in moving picture shows to degenerate and require policing, it was held in Higgins v. Lacroix, — Minn. —, 137 N. W. 417, that a license fee of $200 for a permanent moving picture show in a growing village of 1,000 was not so unreasonably high as to manifestly show an abuse of power or any unlawful purpose or result.

Nor was the ordinance imposing such a fee a prohibition under the guise of license or regulation, because of the fact that one was unable to make any particular profit out of the venture, as that fact did not prove that others might not be able to make a success thereof. Ibid.

Place of exhibition.

An ordinance making it unlawful to operate a moving picture show within a certain district of a city is a valid exercise of an express power conferred upon cities by the legislature to license, tax, regulate, restrain, or prohibit theatrical and other amusements. Dreyfus v. Montgomery, — Ala. —, 58 So. 730.

An ordinance prohibiting the operation of moving picture shows in a certain section of a city is valid and operative as against one who at the time is operating such a show under a license from a city. Ibid.

Because of manifest menace by fire and panic likely to result to school children and church congregations, it was held in Laurelle v. Bush, supra, that prohibiting the location of moving pictures within a distance of 200 feet from the front line of any church or school, or within 100 feet of the property line of the sides or rear of any church or school, is not invalid as prescribing unreasonable or unnecessary conditions.

And in People ex rel. Moses v. Gaynor, supra, it was held that there was no abuse of discretion under a city ordinance requiring common shows to be licensed, in denying a license to maintain a moving picture show on premises which immediately adjoin a large public school and is opposite the parish and other buildings of a church.

Requirement that applicant for a new permit to conduct moving picture exhibitions shall specify by street and number the place where the proposed moving picture exhibition is to be located is a reasonable and necessary expedient, intended to aid in a competent and effective enforcement of an ordinance. Laurelle v. Bush, supra.

Character of pictures.

A city may by ordinance forbid exhibitions of immoral, obscene, or otherwise 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Same — title — sufficiency — moving picture machine operator.

4. A title, "An Act to Add a New Article to the Code of Public Local Laws to Be Known as 'Moving Picture Machine Operators,' Subtitle 'Baltimore City,' and Be criminal moving or stationary pictures. 33 Cyc. 258.

An ordinance which provides that a permit shall not issue for the exhibition of any immoral or obscene moving pictures is within the police power of a city. Block v. Chicago, supra. The court said: "The ordinance applies to 5 and 10-cent theaters such as the complainants operate, and which on account of the low price of admission are frequented and patronized by a large number of children as well as by those of limited means who do not attend the production of plays and dramas given in the regular theaters. The audiences include those classes whose age, education, and station in life especially entitle them to protection against the evil influence of obscene and immoral representations. The welfare of society demands that every effort of the municipal authorities to afford such protection shall be sustained, unless it is clear that some constitutional right is interfered with."

Moving pictures, such as "James Boys," "Midnight Riders," which portray exhibitions of crime, are immoral though illustrating experiences connected with the history of the country, within the meaning of an ordinance prohibiting the exhibition of obscene and immoral pictures. Ibid.

Censorship of films.

An ordinance which gives to the chief of police power to determine whether a picture or series of pictures is immoral or obscene is not unconstitutional as delegating to him legislative and judicial powers. Block v. Chicago, supra.

Nor is such ordinance unconstitutional as discriminating, because some of the same scenes displayed by the moving pictures are shown in theaters, where the scenes are enacted upon the stage, and there is no requirement that the show shall be given before the chief of police and a permit obtained. Ibid.

Revocation of license.

A license to maintain a moving picture show is revocable at pleasure of authorities granting same. Dreyfus v. Montgomery, supra.

But the exercise of power must be reasonable, and so the fact that many placed had inadequate fire protection, and many of the pictures shown were vulgar and licentious and representations of lawlessness and crime, did not warrant a general order revoking all licenses granted to moving picture shows. William Fox Amusement Co. v. McClellan, 62 Misc. 100, 114 N. Y. Supp. 594 J. H. B.

Numbered," is sufficient to cover matter providing for the appointment of examiners to license persons wishing to engage in the business of moving picture machine operators, and the fixing of their compensation.

Legislature — delegation of power — license of moving picture machine operator.

5. The legislature may delegate to a board power to license moving picture machine operators, and provide for the revocation of their licenses.

Justice of the peace — jurisdiction — absence of jury.

6. The legislature may confer upon justices of the peace final jurisdiction to hear and determine, without a jury, prosecutions for violation of a statute forbidding the operation of moving picture machines without a license.

APPEAL by relator from an order of the Baltimore City Court quashing a writ of certiorari directing appellee, police justice, to send and certify to said court the record of the proceedings had before him in an action in which relator was the defendant for an alleged violation of the moving picture statute. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. Wallace Bryan and Watson E. Sherwood, with Messrs. Lemmon & Clotworthy, for appellant:

The act of 1910, chapter 693, is unconstitutional in that it arbitrarily and unreasonably discriminates against the relator and all other persons in like situation with him who were engaged in the vocation of moving picture machine operator in Baltimore city at the time the act was passed, and thus deprives him and them of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, and denies him and them the equal protection of the law.

The act is in further violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it unjustly discriminates against operators in Baltimore city in favor of those in the rest of the state, and denies to the former the equal protection of the law.

Messrs. Emory L. Stinchcomb and Isaac Lobe Straus for appellee.

Pattison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the relator, Frank M. Ebert, on the 22d day of October, 1910, was arrested upon a warrant charging him with having unlawfully operated a moving picture machine in the city of Baltimore without having first secured a license in accordance with the provisions of chapter 693 of the Acts of 1910 of the general assembly of Maryland, and when carried before the respondent, a police magistrate of that city, he protested against and denied the jurisdiction and authority of the magistrate to find him guilty of any punishable offense upon the facts alleged in the warrant, for the reason that said alleged act of assembly which he was charged with having violated was unconstitutional and void. The case was from time to time postponed until on the 6th day of December, 1910, the relator, after unsuccessfully protesting against the jurisdiction of the magistrate for the reason stated above, asked for a jury trial, which was refused him; but the justice took his recognizance for his appearance before him at a later day therein named. Before the case was heard, however, the relator filed his petition in the Baltimore city court, alleging the facts as we have stated, and further alleging therein: First. That the said act of 1910 violates the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States by unjustly, arbitrarily, and unreasonably discriminating against the petitioner and all others in like situation with him, who were engaged in the vocation of moving picture machine operator in the city of Baltimore at the time of the passage of said act, by depriving him and all others in like situation with him of his and their liberties and property without due process of law, and denying to him and them the equal protection of the laws. Second. That the said act is also void for the reason that it violates the Constitution of Maryland: (1) For the reasons assigned above, by which it is alleged it contravenes the Federal Constitution. (2) "Because it embraces more than one subject, and its subject-matter is not sufficiently described in its title." (3) It assumes unlawfully to delegate to a certain board of examiners attempted to be created therein legislative powers and discretion, contrary to article 8 of the Bill of Rights of the state of Maryland. (4) Because as interpreted it vests complete summary jurisdiction in police magistrates and justices of the peace of Baltimore city to try and punish violations under it, without providing for trial by jury or for any appeal to a higher court.

The petition then prays the court to issue its writ of certiorari commanding the justice, Daniel J. Loden, to send and certify to such court the record of the proceeding in the case, together with the writ that the jurisdiction of the magistrate might be inquired into. The writ was issued as prayed, to which a return was made and filed by the justice of the peace termed the defendant in the certiorari proceedings, and by him a motion was made to quash the writ. The court after hearing argument held that the petitioner having prayed a jury trial was, under the act, entitled to a trial by jury, and thus passed an order quashing the writ and remanding the case to the justice of the peace for further proceedings to be had in conformity with his opinion therein expressed. It is from this order that the relator has appealed.

The title of the act of 1910, chap. 693, is: "An Act to Add a New Article to the Code of Public Local Laws, to Be Known as 'Moving Picture Machine Operators,' Subtitle 'Baltimore City,' and Be Numbered." Following the title are several "whereas" clauses in which attention is called to the danger to life and property incident to the use of explosives in the operation and management of moving picture machines by careless and incompetent operators, and to the necessity for the enactment of a law "by which none but persons who are skilled in the avocation of operating moving picture machines or electrical projecting apparatus should be allowed to pursue that calling, and to that end a board of examining moving picture machine operators should be created, whose duty it shall be to examine moving picture machine operators desiring to follow that trade, and give such as may possess the proper requisites a proper certificate of proficiency." Thereafter follow the seven sections of the act. The first section is the enacting clause. The second section defines the meaning of the term "moving picture machine."

The third section provides that the governor "shall biennially appoint in and for Baltimore city three persons, one from the board of fire underwriters' association, one master electrician to represent the building inspector's office of the city of Baltimore, and one moving picture machine operator, all of whom have had not less than five years' experience at the business and who have resided in Baltimore city, state of Maryland, for a period of not less than two years next preceding their appointment, who shall be known as 'the board of examining moving picture machine operators.'"

Section 4 provides that "all persons who at the time of the enactment of this act are engaged in the business of a 'moving picture machine operator' in the city of Baltimore, as described in § 2 of this act, shall within sixty days after the first day of May, 1910, comply with all the provisions of this act; otherwise they shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction before a justice of the peace or a police justice, be fined a sum not less than $10, nor more than $50, for each day or fraction thereof that they shall pursue the business 'moving picture machine operator' in the city of Baltimore, and, if said fine is not paid, he shall be subject to imprisonment for ninety days, or both, at the discretion of the judge."

By § 5 it is provided that "if any such person desires to engage or continue in said business of 'moving picture machine operator' after the passage of this act, he shall apply to the board provided for in § 3 of this act for a license, and submit to an examination as to his qualification before said board; and . . . if the said board shall find after due examination, that the said applicant for a license possesses a reasonable knowledge of the 'moving picture machine operator' business and electricity, then the said board shall, upon the payment of the fee herein provided for, issue to said applicant a license for a term of not more than one year, and shall keep a record of all licenses so issued; and no person shall be granted a license who has not reached the age of twenty-one years and makes oath to such fact, and has served at least one year with a licensed moving picture machine operator in the business. . . . No person granted a license under the provisions of this act shall operate a moving picture machine or electrical projecting apparatus after the expiration of said license or after said license shall have been suspended or revoked as herein provided, unless the said license or renewal of same shall have been received as herein provided. This action also names an original as well as the renewal fee to be paid for licenses so granted."

Section 6 vests in the board of examining moving picture operators the power to suspend or revoke the license of any operator who is negligent in the operation of his machine, or who operates it in a manner dangerous to the safety of life or property, but this power is to be exercised only after full opportunity is afforded the party charged to be present in person, or by counsel, and make any defense he may have, and then only subject to the restriction and limitation therein named.

Section 7 states the amount to be paid to the board of examiners for their services, and directs that it, together with certain expenses therein named, be paid out of the funds received from the issuance of licenses; and further directing that the surplus, if any, from such source be paid over to the state treasurer. It also provides for the times of meeting of said board and the notice to be given by them of such meeting.

Taking up the objections urged against the validity of this statute, which the defendant is here charged with having violated, we will first consider the objection that it contravenes the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and the twenty-third article of the Bill of Rights of this state, both of which declare that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. These constitutional safeguards have been so fully considered and discussed not only by the Supreme Court of the United States, but by this court as well, that the proper construction to be placed thereon when attempted to be applied in cases of this character seems to be well settled and established. Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730; Powell 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 253, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 992, 1257; Singer v. State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L.R.A. 551, 19 Atl. 1044; State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L.R.A. 433, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 771; Scholle v. State, 90 Md. 729, 50 L.R.A. 411, 46 Atl. 326; State v. Hyman, 98 Md. 596, 64 L.R.A. 637, 57 Atl. 6, 1 Ann. Cas. 742; Watson v. State, 105 Md. 650, 66 Atl. 635.

It is plain that the act in question was passed for the purpose of protecting the public from the consequent injury and loss to life and property resulting from the operation of moving picture machines by incompetent persons.

In the case of Singer v. State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L.R.A. 551, 19 Atl. 1044, similar requirements and restrictions were by statute imposed upon plumbers of Baltimore city. There the court said: "As to the common and ordinary occupations of life, little or no legislation may be necessary; but if the occupation or calling be of such a character as to require a special course of study or training or experience, to qualify one to pursue such occupation or calling with safety to the public interests, no one questions the power of the legislature to impose such restraints and prescribe such requirements as it may deem proper for the protection of the public against the evils resulting from incapacity and ignorance. And neither the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, nor article 23 of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of this state, was designed to limit or restrain the exercise of this power. . . . We all know that in a large city like Baltimore, with its extensive system of drainage and sewerage, the public health largely depends upon the proper and efficient manner in which the plumbing work is executed. And, this being so, the legislature not only has the power, but it is eminently wise and proper that it should provide some mode by which the qualification of persons engaged in that business shall be determined. . . . Such an act is but the ordinary exercise of the police power of the state, and does not violate in any sense the constitutional rights of the traverser."

The danger to life and property incident to the use of moving picture machines when operated by incompetent persons is known to all. The films used in connection with the machine are highly explosive and dangerous in their character, and if not properly managed and cared for are liable to explode.

In large cities compactly built like Baltimore, there exist possibilities of immense loss of property by fire, as was shown by the great fire of 1904, which swept the business section of the city and destroyed property worth many millions of dollars. Moreover, in large cities moving picture machines are usually operated in large, crowded rooms or halls filled with a constantly changing assemblage, largely composed of women and children, and where, in the event of explosion or fire, excitement and panic usually follow, resulting in great loss of life. Therefore every reasonable and proper precaution and safeguard should be taken to prevent or lessen the possibilities of fires so destructive and disastrous in their consequences. It was to prevent or lessen explosions and fires, and to avoid the consequences mentioned, that this act was passed, providing a mode by which the qualification of moving picture machine operators operating machines in the city of Baltimore shall be determined. The act was to protect the people of Baltimore city against the consequences resulting from the work of incompetent moving picture machine operators, and was passed in the exercise of the police power of the state, and does not in our opinion violate either the Federal or state Constitution. Singer v. State, supra; State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L.R.A. 433, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 771.

It is contended, however, by the relator, that the act complained of, as construed by him, applies only to those persons who were at the time of the passage of the act engaged in the business of moving picture machine operators of Baltimore city, and not to those who were not at the time of its passage engaged in said business, but who have since become engaged therein, or who may now or hereafter wish to engage in said business; and by reason of this alleged discrimination between the classes mentioned, which classification he alleges is unreasonable and arbitrary, the act is in violation of both the Federal Constitution and the Bill of Rights of this state. We cannot adopt the contentions of the relator, for in our opinion he improperly construes the statute in holding that it does not apply to both classes of persons mentioned by him.

It is true that § 4 of the act applies only to those persons who were engaged in the business of moving picture machine operators at the time of its enactment, and by its provisions they were given sixty days after the 1st day of May 1910 (from and after which date the statute became effective), within which to procure the license required by the succeeding section of the act. These persons were permitted to continue in said business, without violating the statute, if they at any time before the expiration of the said sixty days procured such license. It was only upon their failure to obtain the license within that time that their continuance in business thereafter, without such license, was made a misdemeanor by the statute, subjecting them upon conviction to the payment of a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $50 for each day or fraction thereof that they thereafter pursued said business.

Before a license could be procured, it was made necessary by the statute that the applicant should submit to an examination to be made by the board of examiners. The applicant therefore was subject to all the necessary delays incident to such examination before a license could be obtained by him, if successful in his examination. Thus a provision such as is found in § 4 of this act would seem to be necessary, for without it places of amusement where moving picture machines were operated at the time of the enactment of the statute would have to be closed immediately upon the act becoming effective and before a license could be procured under the act. It was to prevent this, no doubt, that this provision was inserted in the statute, and thus it had application only to those persons who were in the business at the time of the enactment of the statute. But, as we construe the statute, § 5 applies to both classes; that is, to those that were in business at the time of its enactment as well as to those not at that time in business, but who thereafter wished to engage therein.

Section 5 provides that "if any such person desires to engage or continue in said business of 'moving picture machine operator' after the passage of this act he shall apply to the board provided for in § 3 of this act, for a license, and submit to an examination as to his qualification before said board," etc. The relator in construing the language of this section contends that by "such person" is meant such persons only as are included within the provisions of the immediately preceding section of the act, or § 4, and, as that section applies only to those persons who were in business at the time of the enactment of the statute, this section likewise applies only to that class of persons, and not to those who should thereafter desire to engage in said business and who were not in such business at the time of the enactment of the statute. This, we think, is not a proper construction of this section of the act.

The preamble or "whereas" clauses of the act point out the danger to life and property resulting from the use of moving picture machines when operated by careless and incompetent persons, and then declares, as we have said before, "that a law (should) be enacted by which none but persons who are skilled in the avocation of operating moving picture machines or electrical projecting apparatus should be allowed to pursue that calling, and to that end a board of examining moving picture machine operators should be created, whose duty it shall be to examine moving picture machine operators desiring to follow that trade, and give such as may possess the proper requisites a proper certificate of proficiency." From this language it is shown that all classes of moving picture machine operators were intended to be included within the provisions of the act. "None but persons skilled in the avocation" were by it permitted to pursue that calling, and all operators are required to submit to the examination provided for by this statute, and to obtain a license before engaging or continuing in such avocation. Moreover, the language is: "If any such person desire to engage or continue in said business" he shall apply for license as the statute directs. It will thus be seen that it embraces within its provisions, not only those that desire to continue in the business, but includes as well those who desire to engage in such business. In our opinion this language is sufficiently comprehensive to include all classes of moving picture machine operators, and is not confined to that class of operators who were in business at the time of the enactment of the statute, as claimed by the relator.

It is also urged against the statute that its title is insufficient because (1) it embraces more than one subject, and (2) that the subject-matter of the act is not sufficiently described in the title. We have already in this opinion set out the title in full, and have given at least the substance of the provisions of the statute, and therefore it is unnecessary for us to do so again. The requirement of the constitution (art. 3, § 29) in respect to this objection is that "every law enacted by the general assembly [of Maryland] shall embrace but one subject, and that shall be described in its title."

In Baltimore v. Reitz, 50 Md. 574, this court in construing this section of the Constitution said: "If several sections of the law refer to and are germane to the same subject-matter which is described in its title, it is considered as embracing but a single subject and as satisfying the requirements the Constitution in this respect. While the title must indicate the subject of the act, it need not give an abstract of its contents, nor need it mention the means and method by which the general purpose is to be accomplished." Applying this rule of construction to the title of the act here involved, we do not find it defective for either of the reasons urged against it

As to the third objection made against the act, which objection is not referred to or mentioned in the brief of the appellant, we think it unnecessary to do more than refer to the case of Downs v. Swann, 111 Md. 53, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 739, 134 Am. St. Rep. 586, 73 Atl. 653, and the cases there cited. In that case the court, speaking through the late Judge Schmucker, said: "It has been also settled by numerous decisions that the state may delegate the police power to subordinate boards and commissions, and that the reasonable and just exercise by them of the delegated power will be upheld." Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 47 L. ed. 563, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390; Singer v. State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L.R.A. 551, 19 Atl. 1044; State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L.R.A. 433, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 771; State v. Knowles, 90 Md. 646, 49 L.R.A. 695, 45 Atl. 877; Scholle v. State, 90 Md. 729, 50 L.R.A. 411, 46 Atl. 326; Watson v. State, 105 Md. 650, 66 Atl. 635.

We have now reached the fourth and last objection urged against the act, which is, that it vests summary jurisdiction in the police magistrates and justices of the peace of Baltimore city to try and punish violations under it, without providing for trial by jury or for an appeal to a higher court. We find this subject fully discussed in the case of State v. Glenn, 54 Md. 572. In that case the defendant was, by a justice of the peace of this state, convicted upon the charge of being a vagrant, habitually disorderly person, and was by the justice sentenced to the Maryland House of Correction for the period of six months. The defendant was afterwards discharged from the institution to which she had been sentenced, under a writ of habeas corpus; the judge discharging her, holding that the jurisdiction under which she had been convicted was unconstitutionally conferred, and therefore the conviction was a nullity. When the case reached this court, one of the questions presented was whether the legislature could confer upon the justices of the peace of this state summary jurisdiction to try and convict a party of an offense such as that with which the prisoner was charged. Judge Alvey in discussing the question thus presented, after referring to similar statutes in England by which summary jurisdiction was given to justices of peace to try like offenses, and where the punishment prescribed by such statute was imprisonment and hard labor, said: That "the exercise of the summary jurisdiction, therefore, is not, in England at least, regarded as being in violation of the fundamental guaranties of the rights and liberties of the people; and the personal liberty of the subject at this day is as well and jealously protected in England as in any other country where the principles of Magna Charta and of the common law are enforced." The judge then, after naming a number of the English statutes that conferred summary jurisdiction upon justices of the peace, stated that "these statutes have been in force here from our earliest history and are still in force, and we are not aware that it has even been supposed that their provisions were in any way restrained or controlled by the declaratory provisions in the Declaration of Rights. There are a great many statutes upon the statute book relating to a great variety of subjects, prescribing fines, penalties, and forfeitures as punishment, for doing or omitting to do certain things, and by many of those statutes jurisdiction has been given to justices of the peace, from whose judgments no appeal was provided for until within a comparatively recent period." The opinion also refers to the act of 1777, chap. 6, known as the "fines and penalties act," which was passed at the first session of the state legislature after the adoption of the Declaration of Rights and the Constitution of 1776; and also the statutes of 1781, chap. 13, and 1785, chap. 47, in regard to bastardy, and in which reference it says of them that "these statutes have all coexisted with the several Constitutions of the state; and in the various cases that have occurred, involving their provisions, we have never heard it contended that the proceedings thereby authorized were not constitutional, because the trial by jury was not provided for, either in the first instance or by an appeal."

In State v. Ward, 95 Md. 121, 51 Atl. 848, the defendant was convicted before a justice of the peace for violation of certain sections of the public local laws of Anne Arundel county, amended by chapter 582 of the Acts of 1892, which regulated the shooting of wild fowl in said county. The statute provided for the obtaining of licenses to place blinds and shoot therefrom, and also made it unlawful to establish blinds nearer to other blinds than the distance therein given, and, upon conviction before a justice of the peace for the violation of any of the foregoing provisions, the statute imposed a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $25 for each offense, with the additional fine upon the owner of the blind placed nearer to the already established blind than the distance allowed in the statute, the sum of $5 for each week such blind remained, after due notice given to such owner by the owner of the previously established blind to remove the same. No right of appeal was given by the statute, and this court in that case said: "Where the jurisdiction has been conferred by special statute, the alleged offender has no legal right to call for a jury . . . unless there is something in the act directing to the contrary. There being nothing in the act . . . that confers upon the party charged the right to demand of the justice a jury trial, it follows that the justice has jurisdiction to hear and finally determine the charge set out in the warrant."

Upon the authority of the cases cited we are unable to find that the jurisdiction conferred upon justices of the peace by the statute here questioned violates the constitutional provisions mentioned by the relator in this his fourth contention. The justice of the peace before whom the relator was carried had jurisdiction to finally hear and determine the charge under which he was arrested, but we do not think the relator was entitled to a jury trial as prayed by him. Therefore the learned court below, in our opinion, erred in holding that he was so entitled, and in remanding the case to the justice, with directions to him that he "grant unto the petitioner his prayer for a trial by jury."

The counsel of the relator have urged other objections to the validity of this statute, and have pointed out a number of alleged defects and omissions therein, all of which we have carefully considered, but we do not think they go to the extent of rendering the statute void, although they show a great want of thought and skill in the drafting of the bill. We therefore suggest, inasmuch as the legislature is now in session, that the statute be amended by supplying the omissions and by removing therefrom the uncertain features or provisions of the act so that it may be more easily understood and enforced.

As the order of the court below not only quashes the writ of certiorari and remands the case to the justice of the peace, but also directs him to grant unto the petitioner his prayer for a trial by jury, we will affirm in part and reverse in part the order of the lower court and remand the case.

Order affirmed in part and reversed in part, and case remanded. The appellant, Frank M. Ebert, to pay the costs above and below.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Statement by Brooke, J.:

Complainants are, respectively, the widow and daughters of Frederick J. Swaine, who died intestate on April 14, 1897. Deceased had for many years prior to his death been engaged in the malting business in the city of Ypsilanti. Defendant, who was at that time cashier of the Ypsilanti Savings Bank, was appointed, first special, and later general, administrator of the estate. As such administrator, he continued the business of the deceased from April, 1897, to November, 1903, when his final account was allowed and his bond canceled. Complainants signed a waiver of notice of hearing upon defendant's final account, and at the same time executed a power of attorney authorizing him to continue the business, which he did until November, 1904, when it was closed out. At that time there remained due from the estate to the Ypsilanti Savings Bank the sum of $4,000. The bill of complaint sets out at length the dealings of defendant with the estate, and avers that it was complainants' expressed desire that the business should be continued only so long as it was profitable; that defendant, without informing them, continued to run it at loss, and that he fraudulently secured their consent to his discharge as administrator and the cancellation of his bond as such. Complainants pray that the order allowing the final account and discharging defendant as administrator be set aside because procured by fraud, and that his bond be reinstated; that defendant be held liable for all losses occasioned by the conduct of the business, and ordered to reimburse com-

I. Introduction,

The general question covered by this note is that of the right of an executor, administrator, testamentary trustee, or guardian to carry on, after the death of the person he represents, a trade or business belonging to him, or to embark the funds of the estate in trade or business, as well as the question of the individual liability of the personal representative, etc., and that of the estate he represents, where he does carry on such a business. The investment by a personal representative, etc., or a guardian, of the funds of an estate in shares of a mercantile corporation, as well as in the personal representative's own business, or the completion of building contracts, etc., held by a decedent at the time of his death, are questions not covered by this note.

It is a general rule, widely recognized, that it is not within the ordinary duties of an executor, administrator, testamentary trustee or guardian, to carry on a trade or business on behalf of the estate he represents, unless expressly empowered to do so by will, or by the commands of articles of copartnership, except speedily to wind up the business in order to settle the estate.

If a personal representative or guardian does carry on such a trade or business, he becomes answerable to those interested in the estate for all losses sustained; while the profits, if any, belong to the estate. In some states there are statutes that permit the carrying on of a trade or business by a personal representative or guardian; or continuing farming operations in order to mature and harvest crops growing at the time of the death of the person he represents. It is also held in some cases that a court of chancery, or a court having jurisdiction of the administration, has power to direct a personal representative or guardian to engage in trade or business on behalf of the estate he represents. Although there are other decisions to the contrary.

In the absence of authority from a court duly empowered, an executor, administrator, testamentary trustee, or guardian who carries on a business belonging to an estate without being specially authorized by will or articles of copartnership is individually liable for all the debts contracted by him while engaged in such trade or business. In some cases debts contracted, as well as the expenses of conducting the business, have been allowed from the estate, especially where the business resulted in a profit. Where a trade or business is carried on without express authority, those beneficially interested in the estate may, at their election, hold the personal representative answerable for the value of the assets embarked in the trade, together with interest thereon; or they may claim the profits of the business; or they may charge the personal representative with the rental of real estate used in carrying on the business.

But where there is clear and express testamentary authority for carrying on a trade or business, or it is conferred by articles of partnership (a parol direction made before the death of a trader to the person who becomes his executor or administrator being insufficient), the personal representative will be relieved from individual liability for losses sustained from carrying on the business, excepting from such as are the result of his own negligence.

There is some conflict upon the question whether testamentary power conferred upon an executor to carry on a trade or business on behalf of an estate passes to an administrator cum testamento annexo or de bonis non.

The weight of authority is to the effect that the executor, even though he carries on a trade or business pursuant to testamentary authority, is individually liable to creditors for all debts contracted by him while so engaged; and that the creditors cannot proceed against the estate in order to satisfy their claims. But the executor will be indemnified for such personal liability from the assets embarked by his testator in the trade or business, or from the income therefrom; the general assets of the estate not being bound by such debts unless the testator has evinced such an intention by clear and unequivocal language. However, there are a few decisions which hold that the general assets of an estate are answerable for such debts. But in order that an executor may be indemnified for such individual liability, he must not be indebted or in default to the estate, or conduct the business for a longer time, than may be specified in the will.

Persons who become creditors while an executor is carrying on a trade or business may be subrogated to the former's right of indemnity. Some courts also hold that creditors may, in the first instance, proceed in equity to collect their claims from the trade assets, especially when the executor is insolvent or not responsible.

Where a business or trade is carried on by virtue of a statute permitting it, or by an order of a competent court a personal representative, etc., is relieved from individual liability for losses, or for debts contracted by him while so engaged.

The heirs or those beneficially interested in an estate, as well as such creditors of the intestate as expressly consent thereto, may estop themselves from questioning the conduct of a personal representative in carrying on a trade or business, or from holding him answerable for resulting losses, where the business was carried on at their request or solicitation, or with their knowledge, no objection to his conduct being made by them.

Brooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record conclusively shows that at the death of Frederick J. Swaine his personal estate amounted to $16,261.01, and that included in this sum were notes of the Ann Arbor Brewing Company for $4,485.79 and note and account of Kolb Brothers for $7,300. Swaine at that time was indebted in the sum of $16,132.14, $10,500 of which he owed to the Ypsilanti Savings Bank. If all the assets of the personal estate had been collectable, they would barely have equalled the liabilities. By carrying on the business for nearly eight years, the Kolb Brothers account was collected in full and the Ann Arbor Brewing Company account was reduced so that the final loss upon it was less than $2,500. The personal estate in the hands of defendant was increased shortly after Swaine's death by the payment to him by the widow of $5,450, which she had re-

II. Power of personal representative, testamentary trustee, or guardian to carry on business on behalf of estate.

a. In general.

1. Executor, or administrator, or testamentary trustee.

The doctrine that it is no part of an administrator's duty to carry on a business belonging to an intestate is recognized and applied in the following cases: Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608; Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224; Eufaula Nat. Bank v. Manassas, 124 Ala. 379, 27 So. 258; Re Moore, 72 Cal. 335, 13 Pac. 880; Hallock v. Smith, 50 Conn. 127; Grace v. Seibert, 235 Ill. 190, 22 L.R.A. Va. 276, 1 S. E. 280.

And the same rule applies to an executor who is not expressly empowered by will to carry on a trade or business. Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608; Eufaula Nat. Bank v. Manassas, 124 Ala. 379, 27 So. 258; Smith v. Preston, 170 Ill. 179, 48 N. E. 688, affirming 67 Ill. App. 613; Grace v. Seibert, 235 Ill. 190, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 301, 85 N. E. 308; Gilligan v. So, the personal representative of a decedent has no authority to invest the assets of an estate in trade on its behalf. Ward v. Tinkham, 65 Mich. 695, 32 N. W. 901.

And it was said in Alexander v. Herring, — Miss. —, 55 So. 360, and Billingslea v. Young, 33 Miss. 95, that in order to justify the carrying on of a business by an administrator there must be statutory authority therefor.

So, an administrator cannot, without an order of a proper court, carry on the business of a warehouseman in a building owned by his decedent, notwithstanding he is entitled to the possession thereof for the payment of debts. Griffin v. Bland, 43 Ala. 542.

As to the power of courts in general to permit a personal representative or guardian to carry on a trade or business on behalf of an estate, see infra, II. h.

It has been said that it is a breach of trust for an executor or administrator to carry on a trade or business on behalf of an estate in the absence of express testamentary power to do so. Grace v. Seibert, 235 Ill. 190, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 301, 85 N. E. 308; Butler v. Butler, 164 Ill. 171, 45 N. E. 426, affirming 61 Ill. App. 51; Warren v. Union Bank, 157 N. Y. 259, 43 L.R.A. 256, 68 Am. So, an administrator who continues the interest of his intestate in a partnership of which he was a member commits a breach of trust. Ex parte Watson, 2 Ves. & B. 414; Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224; Morrow v. Morrow, 2 Tenn. Ch. 549.

And a testamentary trustee may be removed from his trust if, without express direction contained in a will, he continues a business belonging to his testator. Re Hutchinson, 27 N. Y. Week. Dig. 218, 10 N. Y. S. R. 10.

ceived as insurance on her husband's life, and as a legacy from a brother. This money was used by defendant to liquidate, in part, the obligations of the estate. During the entire time defendant ran the business he paid to complainants the sum of $9,493.88. He likewise paid for improvements to the real estate at complainant's request the sum of $1,578.66, and during the whole period the residence of complainants was heated at the expense of the business, and one of the men employed at the plant did various odd jobs about complainant's home. According to a statement from defendant's books, conceded to be correct by complainants, it appears that the net loss on manufacturing account for the whole period of eight years was $1,685.65, or a little over $200 per year. The continuation of the business probably facilitated the collection of doubtful or slow assets of the estate. We do not think it can be said that complainants would have been better off than they are had the entire matter been closed up at once upon the death of Swaine. Some profit appears to have been realized in each of the first three years. Thereafter the statement shows losses in three of the years and profits in two. The losses during the latter part of the operation appear to have been caused in part, if not wholly, by competition with large manufacturers of malt, who sold at prices so low that this small plant could not make a profit if it met them. We think the record shows with sufficient certainty that the business was

2. Guardian.

Some courts hold that a guardian cannot carry on a business belonging to his ward. Re Neasmith, 77 C. C. A. 402, 147 Fed. 160; Harter v. Miller, 67 Kan. 468, 73 Pac. 74; *Warren v. For a guardian to carry on a business or trade for the benefit of his ward is illegal, and amounts to a devastavit. Warren v. Union Bank, 157 N. Y. 259, 43 L.R.A. 256, 68 Am. St. Rep. 777, 51 N. E. 1036, reversing 28 App. Div. 7, 51 N. Y. Supp. 27.

So, the conservator of an incompetent person cannot, without an order of the probate court, borrow money with which to purchase an interest in a business for the benefit of his ward. Church v. Rosenstein, 85 Conn. 279, 82 Atl. 568.

But it was held in Remington v. Field, 16 R. I. 509, 17 Atl. 551, that a guardian might work a farm belonging to his ward, where it was provided by statute that guardians might improve a ward's estate, and apply the profit and income to the support of the latter.

And the right of a guardian to continue the business of his ward was recognized in Racouillat v. Requena, 36 Cal. 651.

It was said in Campbell v. Faxon, 73 Kan. 675, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1002, 85 Pac. 760, that, in the absence of a testamentary authority to continue a trade or business, it was the duty of an administrator to wind it up.

But it is not within the power of a personal representative to continue a farming business belonging to a decedent longer than necessary to care for and harvest the crops sown at the time of his death. See Harrison v. Harrison, 39 Ala. 489; Hallock v.

continued with the consent and at the solicitation of all of the complainants. Lizzie Swaine, the widow, seems to have taken an active and somewhat unusual interest in its prosecution. There is no claim made that defendant has not kept a proper and correct account of his dealings with the estate, nor that he has failed to account for every dollar which has come into his possession as administrator. The continuation of the business after the third year was probably an error of judgment, but it was one for which defendant should not alone be held responsible. Mrs. Swaine's brother, a business man of Kansas City, frequently visited with and advised the complainants.

Upon this question, the testimony of F. B. Worden, who was foreman of the malt house, under Mr. Swaine in his lifetime, and who occupied the same position under the administrator, is in part as follows:

The malt house is about a mile from Mr. Hemphill's office. At Mr. Swaine's death, I told Mrs. Swaine I would not run the business if I was in her place. She said her brother thought it ought to be run, and she thought he knew. Her daughters were not present at this conversation. Mrs. Swaine came quite often to the malt house. Her daughters came also, every few days. Mr. George came from Kansas City every fall. We started buying barley to be manufactured into malt in the fall.

Q. And about every fall Mr. George would come from Kansas City?

A. I think nearly every fall. I would not say sure every fall.

It was said in Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608, that a personal representative of a deceased person did not represent the latter in respect to a trade or business, except in so far as necessary to wind it up, unless empowered to do so by will, or an order of a court of chancery.

So, a testamentary trustee who is not empowered by will to continue a business must close it with reasonable despatch. Re United States Mortg. & T. Co. 114 App. Div. 532, 100 N. Y. Supp. 12.

Where it is impossible immediately to sell a business, it has been held that a year is a reasonable time for an executor to close it up, where he was directed by will to collect the testator's personal property with all convenient speed. Garrett v. Noble, 6 Sim. 504, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 159.

And in Fleming v. Kelly, 18 Colo. App. 23, 69 Pac. 272, it was held that it could not be assumed that a business was not run for the purpose of closing it up, from the fact that an administrator carried it on for three years under an order of the probate court.

But an executor cannot continue a business for the purpose of profit to the estate. Chancellor v. Brown, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 42, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 443, 51 L. T. N. S. 33, 32 Week. Rep. 465.

c. Testamentary power.

An executor is without authority to continue a mercantile business belonging to a testator unless expressly and unequivocally empowered by will to do so, since the death of a trader puts an end to any business in which he was engaged at the time of his death. And a testamentary command to the effect that a certain portion of a testator's estate which was invested in a partnership business should remain therein after his death is not sufficient to justify an executor becoming interested in the business and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Swaine's knowledge of the business, this witness further testified: "The trust had a bad effect on the business and on some of our customers. I think we received one or two letters asking us to join the trust. Kolb Brothers, of West Bay City, was one of our best customers. We never lost a customer by the trusts. We had to sell cheaper. Kolb Brothers informed us they could buy their malt from Milwaukee at 4 or 5 cents less a bushel than they could buy it of us. The last few years we had to meet that price in order to sell, and I presume that had something to do with the loss the last year or two. In the fall we go and buy barley, and then if you had a competitor that would sell it cheaper than you could afford to sell it, you couldn't help but make a loss out of it. We certain-carrying it on. Travis v. Milne, 9 Hare, 141, 20 L. J. Ch. N. S. 665.

So, testamentary directions to manage the testator's estate, and to convey it at discretion, are not sufficient to permit an executor to join in carrying on a particular business of which the deceased was a member. Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ligon, 59 Miss. 305.

And testamentary power to manage and dispose of a testator's property until a child became of age, as the executor deemed best, will not permit the executor to continue a partnership trade or business. Malone v. Kelley, 54 Ala. 532.

But a testamentary direction to carry on a legitimate trade or business for the benefit of a son of the testator is sufficient to permit the executor to embark a portion of an estate in trade. Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 586, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434.

d. Under express power in articles of partnership.

A personal representative may continue a partnership trade or business of which a testator was a member where the articles of partnership expressly provided that he might do so upon the death of a partner. Blodgett v. American Nat. Bank, 49 Conn. 9; Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150; Laughlin v. Lorenz, 48 Pa. 275, 86 Am. Dec. 592; Re Dillenkofer, 34 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 303.

And it was held in Blodgett v. American Nat. Bank, supra, that an executor who was the testator's surviving partner might carry on the business under a provision in the articles to the effect that the partnership should not be dissolved by the death of the testator, but that his executor should act in his stead, and perform his stipulations contained therein.

But an executor who was also the testator's surviving partner is not empowered to continue the latter's interest in the partnership business by a provision of the articles of partnership to the effect that, on the death of either partner, the survivor should ly had to sell at the price made by the Milwaukee concern, or could not sell. We had to compete with Milwaukee the last few years. We had to meet this competition. Malt sold for 50 cents a bushel, and some we would get at 54 and 55. We never lost a bushel of malt through its being damaged or having it returned to us. Mrs. Swaine kept a book showing what we paid for the barley and all the prices. She never passed two or three days without coming to the plant. In the fall she inquired as to how much barley was bought, and took my book and checked it off as it was drawn in, and knew how much was bought. She kept an account of the malt that was sold. She would get that out of the book by the scales.

This book showed how much was being sold and to whom, and the price obtained, and she knew this during the time the business was conducted. The home was heated from the malt house. One of the men from the malt house would hitch up the carriage for Mrs. Swaine. The men in the malt house fixed up the yard. The residence was not more than 100 feet from the malt house, and complainants must have known the number of men employed at the malt house. Always four employed."

Defendant is charged with fraud in procuring the consent of complainants to the allowance of his final account. We think the method he pursued while thus dealing with three women, who were not advised by counsel, is not to be commended, but, as settle the business as soon as convenient, either by selling or continuing it, as might be mutually agreed between the survivor and the personal representative of the deceased. Leavitt's Case, 28 Abb. N. C. 457, 20 N. Y. Supp. 58.

And where it was provided by articles of partnership that if A., a skilled brewer, should live for nine years after the formation of the business, it should continue for twenty-one years thereafter, and that upon the death of the other partner his executor might carry it on, upon A's death after the beginning of the twenty-one-year term, his executor, who was not skilled as a brewer, was not entitled to join in carrying on the business. Pearce v. Chamberlain, 2 Ves. Sr. 33.

e. Under parol power.

A parol direction made before his death by a person to his executor, or the one who becomes his administrator, to continue a business after his decease for the benefit of his family or estate, will not justify such personal representative in doing so. Malone v. Kelley, 54 Ala. 532; Raynes v. Raynes, 54 N. H. 201; Re McCollum, 80 App. Div. 362, 80 N. Y. Supp. 755; Re Corbin, 101 App. Div. 25, 91 N. Y. Supp. 797; Re Tisdale, 110 App. Div. 857, 97 N. Y. Supp. 494.

The continuance of the funds of an estate in a partnership of which a deceased person was a member cannot be justified by a parol direction given by the latter before his death, to the person named as his executor. Malone v. Kelley, supra.

f. Right of administrator c. t. a. or d. b. n. to carry on business under testamentary power.

Testamentary power conferred upon an executor to carry on a trade or business belonging to a testator has been held to be a personal power that cannot be exercised by an administrator c. t. a. or d. b. n. Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 180; Schlickman v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 139 Ky. 268, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 264, 129 S. W. 823; Creech 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Grainger, 106 N. C. 213, 10 S. E. 1032; Best's Estate, 22 Lanc. L. Rev. 6; Lambert v. Rendle, 3 New Rep. 247.

Thus, testamentary power conferred on an executor to carry on a testator's business for a certain number of years, at the end of which the executor had an option of purchasing it, is a personal power, and such business cannot be carried on thereunder by an administrator d. b. n. Best's Estate, 22 Lanc. L. Rev. 6.

Nor can an administrator c. t. a. carry on a trade or business under power conferred upon an executor, notwithstanding it was provided by statute that such an administrator should be clothed with the same powers and duties as the executor. Creech v. Grainger, 106 N. C. 213, 10 S. E. 1032.

And it was held in Schlickman v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 139 Ky. 268, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 264, 129 S. W. 823, that an administrator de bonis non cannot carry on a decedent's business by virtue of a purely personal power conferred upon the executor to manage the testator's business and do all things concerning his estate which he might do if living, without giving bond, leaving it to his discretion whether the business should be continued and how his estate should be managed, and vesting him with power to sell and convey any or all of the estate if, in his judgment, desirable to do so.

But, on the other hand, it has been held in some cases that such a testamentary power might be exercised by an administrator c. t. a. or d. b. n.

Thus, it was said in Palmer v. Moore, 82 Ga. 177, 14 Am. St. Rep. 147, 8 S. E. 180, that such a power was not a personal trust, but one that could be performed by an administrator c. t. a. under a statute conferring upon the latter all of the powers belonging to an executor, except those manifestly arising from a personal trust and confidence.

And it was held in King v. Talbert, 36 Miss. 367, and Brannon v. Ober & Sons Co. 106 Ga. 168, 32 S. E. 16, that an administrator c. t. a. might carry on a farm-the account itself has in this proceeding been subjected to scrutiny and found to be correct, we are unable to see how complainants were injured by its allowance and the discharge of the bond, unless it should be held that defendant is liable for the losses sustained by reason of continuing the business.

No reason is apparent or indicated by complainants why defendants should have wished to continue the business at a loss. By a forced liquidation of the entire estate at the time of Swaine's death it is probable that the debt due to the bank of which he was cashier would have been paid. His compensation as administrator was small and the labor connected with the office considerable. It is said the bank profited largely through the discount of the paper of the estate during the period. It does not appear that the bank charged more than the usual rate of discount. Moreover, the bank accepted some $3,000 worth of bonds of the Ann Arbor Brewing Company, in lieu of notes for that amount upon which the estate was indorser, reducing the contingent liability of the estate to that extent. These bonds, if not entirely worthless, are of little value.

We are of opinion that it was the conviction of all the complainants, as well as of Mr. George, the widow's brother, in whose judgment the family had confidence, that it was best to continue the business in the hope that it might be disposed of as a going concern. Changes and improve-ing business under testamentary power conferred upon an executor.

So, in Hagan v. Barksdale, 44 Miss. 186, an administrator d. b. n. was permitted to exercise a testamentary power conferred upon an executor to keep all of a testator's property together until the latter's youngest child became of age, and to carry on a farming business belonging to the estate, and to apply the proceeds in the purchase of slaves and other property necessary for the business.

As to the personal liability of an administrator de bonis non for debts contracted while carrying on a business under a power conferred on an executor, see infra, III. b.

g. Statutory power to carry on business.

There are statutes in a number of states permitting the personal representative of a deceased person to continue the mercantile or farming business belonging to his estate.

Thus, it is provided by statute in Texas that the personal representative may, if for the best interests of the estate, carry on the plantation, manufactory, or business of a decedent when not specifically disposed of by will, or required immediately to pay debts, in the same manner as the deceased had done. See Reinstein v. Smith, 65 Tex. 247; Dwyer v. Kalteyer, 68 Tex. 554, 5 S. W. 78; Altgelt v. Sullivan, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 333; Altgelt v. Alamo Nat. Bank, 98 Tex. 252, 83 S. W. 6, reversing — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 582; Altgelt v. Oliver Bros. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 86 S. W. 28.

And the statute has been held to embrace a mercantile business. Dwyer v. Kalteyer, 68 Tex. 554, 5 S. W. 78.

It was assumed in Dwyer v. Kalteyer, 68 Tex. 554, 5 S. W. 75, that such statute would not prevail over an express direction in the will to discontinue the business permanently; but in view of the circumstances, the direction in the will that the testator's "mercantile affair shall be immediately brought to a stop" was construed to mean 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

merely a temporary stoppage of the business until the executrix could arrive from abroad and therefore not to interfere with her power under the statute to carry on the business.

But such statute does authorize a personal representative to carry on a partnership business in which a deceased person was interested. Altgelt v. Sullivan, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 333; Altgelt v. Alamo Nat. Bank, 98 Tex. 252, 83 S. W. 6, reversing — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 582.

By statute it is provided in Alabama and Georgia, the personal representative of one who dies after January 1st may continue his servants and slaves on a plantation until December 31 next, for the purpose of completing the crops. See Loeb v. Richardson, 74 Ala. 311; Pinckard v. Pinckard, 24 Ala. 250; Taylor v. Bush, 75 Ala. 432; Eubank v. Clark, 78 Ala. 73; Naftel v. Osborn, 96 Ala. 623, 12 So. 182; Harding v. Evans, 3 Port. (Ala.) 221, 29 Am. Dec. 256; Stephens v. James, 77 Ga. 139, 3 S. E. 160; King v. Johnson, 96 Ga. 497, 23 S. E. 500.

By the terms of some statutes, the personal representative of a deceased person, in order to carry on a business belonging to his estate, must first obtain an order from the court having jurisdiction of the administration. See Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608; Craig v. McGehee, 16 Ala. 41; Gerald v. Bunkley, 17 Ala. 170; Pickens v. Pickens, 35 Ala. 442; Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 194; Fleming v. Kelly, 18 Colo. App. 23, 69 Pac. 272; Poullain v. Brown, 82 Ga. 412, 9 S. E. 1131; Farley v. Hord, 45 Miss. 102; Emanuel v. Norcum, 7 How. (Miss.) 150; Re Osborn, 36 Or. 8, 58 Pac. 521.

By statute the court of probate in Mississippi may authorize a personal representative to cultivate the lands of a decedent from year to year until the settlement of the estate. Farley v. Hord, 45 Miss. 102; Emanuel v. Norcum, 7 How. (Miss.) 150.

So, it was held in Remington v. Field, 16 R. I. 509, 17 Atl. 551, under a statute permitting a guardian to improve his ward's estate and to apply the profits and income to the latter's support, that the guardian ments in the method of manufacturing malt and large combinations of malting interests made it impossible to realize this hope. It would be unjust and inequitable to now compel this defendant to bear the loss occasioned by this course of action.

The duty of administrators generally to liquidate estates without undue delay is not questioned, nor can it be doubted that they cannot leave estates at the risk of business disaster by continuing without authority to operate business ventures in which the estates are invested when they come into their hands. The authorities cited by complainants clearly establish this doctrine, and executors or administrators who violate the rule, even if acting in the utmost good faith, are held strictly liable for all losses incurred, and are not even permitted to offset the profits against the losses. Ward v. Tinkham, 65 Mich. 695, 32 N. W. 901; Warren v. Union Bank, 167 N. Y. 259, 43 L.R.A. 256, 68 Am. St. Rep. 777, 51 N. E. 1036; Mattocks v. Moulton, 84 Me. 545, 24 Atl. 1004; Lucht v. Behrens, 28 Ohio St. 238, 22 Am. Rep. 378; Guthrie v. Wheeler, 51 Conn. 207.

There seems to be no doubt, however, that, when all those interested in an estate agree that a certain course should be followed, the executor or administrator will be relieved from personal liability if disaster follows. Schouler on Executors, p. 422, lays down the rule as follows: "We may presume that the personal representative can never be strictly justified in might carry on a farming business for the benefit of the ward.

Under the Oregon statute providing that the court may order an administrator to sell all the personal property or any article thereof at private sale, it may, at its discretion, order a stock of merchandise belonging to a decedent to be sold in the usual course of trade. Re Osburn, 36 Or. 8, 58 Pac. 521.

But the court under such statute has no authority to permit the administrator to purchase goods to replenish such stock. Ibid.

And in Tell City Furniture Co. v. Stiles, 60 Miss. 849, it was held, under a similar statute, that the court cannot permit the sale of a stock of merchandise in the usual course of trade by an administrator, since the statute authorized only a sale in bulk.

Statutory power permitting an administrator to deal with growing crops and cultivate the land of an intestate will not justify an order by a court of chancery, permitting an administrator to operate a sawmill belonging to an estate. Alexander v. Herring, — Miss. —, 55 So. 360.

And a court of probate does not acquire power to permit a guardian to carry on a trade or business on behalf of his ward from a statute providing that guardians may manage their wards' estates under the direction of such court, and lease their lands and loan their money, and do all other acts which the court may deem for the benefit of their wards. Harter v. Miller, 67 Kan. 468, 73 Pac. 74.

h. Power of court to permit carrying on business.

1. Courts of chancery.

Some cases hold that a court of chancery may empower the carrying on of a business by the personal representative of a decedent. See Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224; Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150; Carroll v. Davidson, 23 La. Ann. 428; Morrow v. Morrow, 2 Tenn. Ch. 549; Arnold v. Smith 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

[1896] 1 Ch. 171, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 269, 74 L. T. N. S. 14, 44 Week. Rep. 280; Tinkler v. Hindmarsh, 2 Beav. 348; Barker v. Parker, 1 T. R. 295, 1 Revised Rep. 201, Perry v. Perry, Ir. Rep. 3 Eq. 452.

It was said in Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608, that the personal representative of a decedent did not represent the latter in respect to a trade or business belonging to him, except in so far as necessary to wind it up, unless empowered to do so by will or an order of a court of chancery.

And it was held in Arnold v. Smith [1896] 1 Ch. 171, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 269, 74 L. T. N. S. 14, 44 Week. Rep. 280, that the court would permit an executor to continue a business for two years, where a will permitted him to dispose of it with all convenient speed.

But the power of a court of chancery to empower a personal representative of a decedent to carry on a business belonging to his estate was denied in Alexander v. Herring, — Miss. —, 55 So. 360.

And it was held in Field v. Colton, 7 Ill. App. 379, that a court of equity could not, without the consent of the cestui que trust, confer power upon an executor to invest the funds of the estate in goods necessary to continue a commercial business of a decedent.

So, a court of chancery will not permit an administrator to carry on a business belonging to an estate where infants are interested therein. Land v. Land, 43 N. J. Ch. N. S. 311; but see contra, Perry v. Perry, — Ir. Rep. 3 Eq. 542.

2. Courts having jurisdiction of administration.

In Fleming v. Kelly, 18 Colo. App. 23, 69 Pac. 272, it is held that among the incidental powers of county courts by virtue of their express power to regulate and control the settlement of estates is the power, in a proper case, to order the continuance of the business by the administrator temporarily, at least, so as to dispose of stock on hand to the best advantage; and in such cases the purchase of some goods may be deviating from the line of bailment or fiduciary duty. But in case of doubt as to his proper course, he may protect himself by prudently pursuing in advance one of two courses: (1) He may procure the advice and assent of all the parties in interest; or (2) he may take the direction of the court. . . . He may prosecute or defend suits. Compromise claims upon the estate, or deal with the estate in a peculiar way, not usual or strictly legal, as by continuing the property in business; and those parties in interest by whose request or assent it has been done will not be permitted to impute it as maladministration,"—citing Pool v. Munday, 103 Mass. 174; Perry v. Wooton, 5 Humph. 524; and Watkins v. Stewart, 78 Va. 111.

necessary for the purpose of aiding in the sale of the goods on hand.

And such power is apparently assumed in Gordon-Tiger Min. & Reduction Co. v. Loomer, 50 Colo. 409, 115 Pac. 717.

So it was held in State use of Lancaster v. Jones, 89 Mo. 470, 1 S. W. 355 (one justice dissenting), overruling Michael v. Locke, 80 Mo. 548, s. c. 10 Mo. App. 582; and Western Cement Co. v. Jones, 8 Mo. App. 373, that under power to make orders for the "management of" the estate of an insane person, the probate court was vested with large discretion, and could empower a guardian to carry on a commercial business belonging to his ward.

By express statute in Alabama, the orphans' court may empower a personal representative to keep together the assets of a decedent, and manage the same for a term not exceeding ten years. See Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608; Craig v. McGehee, 16 Ala. 41; Gerald v. Bunkley, 17 Ala. 170; Pickens v. Pickens, 35 Ala. 442; Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224; Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 194.

And the power of courts having jurisdiction of decedents' estates, to carry on a business belonging to the estate, is apparently assumed in Roberts v. Weimer, 227 Ill. 138, 81 N. E. 40; Miller v. Didisheim, 95 Ill. App. 321; Starling v. Wyatt, — Miss. —, 27 So. 526; and Re Hodges [1899] 1 I. R. 480; but whether this is by virtue of their inherent or implied power, or is the result of an express statute, does not appear from a report of the cases.

On the other hand, it has been held that courts of probate are without jurisdiction to empower a personal representative to carry on a business on behalf of an estate. Alzheimer v. Hunter, 55 Ark. 159, 19 S. W. 496; Tompkins v. Weeks, 26 Cal. 50.

So, it was held in Harter v. Miller, 67 Kan. 468, 73 Pac. 74, that a court of probate did not acquire power to permit a guardian to carry on a trade or business on behalf of his ward from a statute providing that guardians might manage the estates of their wards under the direction of such court, lease their lands, loan their

1 Perry on Trusts, 5th ed. § 454, contains the following: "So trustees are not bound to continue the capital in such trade, and they ought not to do so against their judgment. But if all the cestuæ que trust are sui juris, and capable of acting for themselves, and they desire an executor, administrator, or trustee to continue the business of the testator a few months, in order to preserve it for his son, and the executor acts in accordance with their request, and uses his best skill and judgment in the conduct of the trade, he will be allowed for the loss in his accounts." In French v. Davis, 38 Miss. 167, it is said: "It is certainly true that it is competent for adult heirs at law to consent or agree that the property of the intestate should money, and do all other acts which the court might deem for the benefit of their wards.

And in Jones's Estate, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 513, it was held that the orphans' court was without authority to permit an administrator to operate mines belonging to an estate, except with the consent of the intestate's creditors.

As to the power of a court of probate, under statutory authority, to permit a personal representative to carry on a farming business belonging to an estate, see supra, II. g.

And Powell v. North, 3 Ind. 392, 56 Am. Dec. 513, is authority for the rule that a court of probate, possessing equitable powers, may empower a guardian to carry on a business of his ward.

In order to protect a personal representative from individual liability while carrying on a trade or business under statutory authority, it is necessary, under some enactments, that he receive authority from the court to do so. See Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608; Craig v. McGehee, 16 Ala. 41; Gerald v. Bunkley, 17 Ala. 170; Pickens v. Pickens, 35 Ala. 442; Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 194; Fleming v. Kelly, 18 Colo. App. 23, 69 Pac. 272; Poullain v. Brown, 82 Ga. 412, 9 S. E. 1131; Farley v. Hord, 45 Miss. 102; Emanuel v. Norcum, 7 How. (Miss.) 150; Re Osburn, 36 Or. 8, 58 Pac. 521.

III. Individual Liability of personal representative or testamentary trustee for carrying on business on behalf of estate.

* a. When done under testamentary power.

1. In general.

And a testamentary trustee who continues a business according to the command of a will is not liable for losses sustained, where the business was honestly managed. Bennett v. Rhodes, 58 Md. 78.

An executor who carries on a farming be kept together for the support of their mother, or for any lawful purpose, and such consent will justify the administrator, in the absence of creditors, or so far as the distributees are concerned, in conforming his action to their wishes on this subject." The case of Mathews v. Sheehan, 76 Conn. 654, 100 Am. St. Rep. 1017, 57 Atl. 694, cited by complainants, reiterates the familiar rule as to the duty of administrators generally, but adds: "Where an administrator or an executor, acting in good faith and with ordinary care and prudence for the good of the beneficiaries of the estate, deviates, with their consent and approbation, from the strict line of his duty, and loss results therefrom,—as, for instance, by continuing the property in business without authority,—the consenting beneficiaries cannot charge the representative of the estate with such loss." See also Pearson v. Gillenwaters, 99 Tenn. 446, 63 Am. St. Rep. 844, 42 S. W. 9, 199, and 18 Cyc. p. 243, note 75. In Brown v. Forsche, 43 Mich. 492, 5 N. W. 1011, Mr. Justice Cooley said: "Formal proceedings for the settlement of an estate are never necessary if all parties concerned can agree to dispense with them [citing cases]. Family arrangements for this purpose, it is said, business under a testamentary direction to do so until a child of the testator becomes of age will be charged with the proceeds received, less the expenses incurred, notwithstanding the farm was operated at a loss during a time of great depression. Allen v. Shanks, 90 Tenn. 359, 16 S. W. 715.

As to the allowance in general from an estate, as a cost of administration, of expenses incurred by an executor while carrying on a trade or business on behalf of an estate, under testamentary authority, see infra, V. f, 7.

An executor is answerable for the profits of a business which he carries on in behalf of an estate, pursuant to a testamentary direction. See Re Rumsey, 45 N. Y. S. R. 453, 18 N. Y. Supp. 402; Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150.

And the same rule will be applied where the business is carried on by virtue of the provisions of articles of partnership, or the order of a court of chancery. Merritt v. Merritt, supra.

So, what an executor should have made from a farming business had it been prudently managed, which he conducted on behalf of an estate under a testamentary direction, will be charged against him, after allowing him the value of his services. Burgess v. Green, 7 Bush, 263.

And an executor who joins in carrying on a partnership business in which his testator was a member is answerable for the portion of the estate so invested, notwithstanding he was empowered by the will to permit a certain portion of the estate to remain in such business, since such power did not justify his conduct. Travis v. Milne, 9 Hare, 141, 20 L. J. Ch. N. S. 665.

As to the liability in general of a personal representative for the rental or value of property embarked in trade, or interest, or the profits of the business, see infra, III c, 3.

2. For losses sustained.

(a) In general.

Where, by the express terms of a will, an executor is empowered to continue a testator's business, he will not be answerable for resulting losses if the business is prudently managed. Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150; Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434; Re Froelich, 50 Misc. 103, 100 N. Y. Supp. 436, affirmed in 122 App. Div. 440, 107 N. Y. Supp. 173, which was affirmed in 192 N. Y. 566, 85 N. E. 110; Boulle v. Tompkins, 5 Redf. 472; Cline's Appeal, 106 Pa. 617; Allen v. Shanks, 90 Tenn. 359, 16 S. W. 715.

It was said in Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434, that the authorization of an executor by will to continue a trade or business belonging to a testator, or to employ the assets of his estate therein, if strictly pursued, is a protection to the executor from individual liability to those claiming under the will.

This doctrine has been applied where, without the fault or negligence of an executor, but as the result of competition, a loss of $2,000 was sustained while carrying on a business under a testamentary direction to do so as long as a yearly profit of $5,000 could be made, since the executor was entitled to a reasonable latitude in order to determine whether the business would produce the profit specified. Re Froelich, 122 App. Div. 440, 107 N. Y. Supp. 173 (affirming 50 Misc. 103, 100 N. Y. Supp. 436), and affirmed without opinion in 192 N. Y. 566, 85 N. E. 1110.

And an executor is not answerable for the loss sustained, where he carried on a business under a testamentary direction to do so for two years if it could be done at a profit, but to be closed as soon as practicable at the expiration of that time, or sooner, if conducted at a loss, where for eighteen months a profit was realized, and the last six months a small loss was sustained, but a substantial profit was realized as the net result of his management, since he had the right to continue the business until a loss became apparent and the business was not to be closed at the first appearance of loss, but as soon as practicable thereafter. Re Moore, 69 Misc. 535, 127 N. Y. Supp. 884.

So, a loss of $1,100 will not be charged to an executor who carried on a business under a testamentary direction to do so for the life of the testator's widow, where he col-are favorites of the law, and, when fairly made, are never allowed to be disturbed by the parties, or by any others for them. . . . Such an arrangement may be made after an administrator is appointed as well as before, and if the administrator is afterwards summoned to render his accounts, the court will accept as satisfactory, so far as it goes, the settlement the parties concerned have made." It is to be noted that no complaint is made of the continuation of the business during the first three years, while it was making a profit. During these years the youngest daughter attained her majority, and had then a right, as well as her mother and elder sister, to demand its discontinuance. This neither she nor they did. The brother of the widow went over the books of the estate from time to time and advised with complainants.

We think it must be held that complainants themselves authorized defendant's acts, and that, if the estate is a loser thereby (which is not at all certain), they must bear the loss.

The decree is affirmed, with costs to defendant.

Ostrander, Ch. J., and McAlvay, Blair, and Stone, JJ., concur.

lected money due at the death of the testator and used it in the business, which could not be successfully carried on without cash, and during the time he continued the business the profits, as well as interest on the money collected, were paid the widow, since it was apparently the testator's intention that the outstanding accounts should be used in carrying on the business. Boulle v. Tompkins, 5 Redf. 472.

And an executor who was directed by will to continue a business with a designated person as manager will not be charged with a loss arising from a sale made in good faith, on credit, without security, to a person who had been a customer during the lifetime of the testator, and whose credit did not appear to be impaired at the time of sale, and it was not shown that the executor, who did not actively control the business, was negligent, or whether he or the manager extended the credit. Cline's Appeal, 106 Pa. 617.

So, bad debts of a business will not be charged against an executor who continued a business under testamentary directions to the effect that he should pay all necessary expenses and charges of the business. Re Jones, 103 N. Y. 621, 57 Am. Rep. 775, 9 N. E. 493, affirming 37 Hun, 430, and 2 Dem. 602.

As to the allowance of the expenses of a business from an estate as costs of administration, see infra, V. f, 7.

So, a loss sustained in opening a mining shaft will not be charged an executor who, in good faith, completed it, where the testator, who was an experienced owner and operator of coal lands, in opening it before his death, had discovered a "fault" that would require a large sum of money to overcome, and by will directed his executor to continue, until they could be sold to advantage, his colliery interests in the same manner as he might have done if living and managing and conducting the same. Waddell's Estate, 196 Pa. 294, 46 Atl. 304.

And an executor is not answerable for a loss sustained by him while working a farm in a prudent manner during a period of great depression, under a testamentary direction to operate it until the testator's child became of age. Allen v. Shanks, 90 Tenn. 359, 16 S. W. 715.

So, an executor will not be surcharged with a loss who carried on a manufacturing business, where, during an unprosperous time which was the result of a business depression, when unexpected difficulties arose, at the urgent solicitation of those interested in the estate, in good faith, and as an exercise of ordinary discretion, he borrowed money for use in the business, the beneficiaries receiving the profits of the business so long as there were any. Whitman's Estate, 195 Pa. 144, 45 Atl. 673.

The personal representative of a deceased copartner may carry on the business without assuming personal liability where the articles of copartnership provide that in the event of the death of one of the parties to the agreement, his personal representative may continue the business. Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150; Re Dillenkofer, 34 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 303.

Where a widow, upon her husband's death, agreed with his surviving partner to continue the former's interest in the business, and that the survivor should pay for it as soon as possible, with interest, and nine years later, upon the former becoming insolvent, she was appointed administratrix of her husband's estate, she will not be charged, at the instance of a daughter of the deceased, to whose support the interest paid was devoted, as it appeared that her course was prudent, and that the allowance for the daughter's support absorbed all of her share in the estate. Browne v. Bedford, 4 Dem. 304.

Where a contract of partnership provided that the interest of one partner should, at his death, be divided among the survivors, upon their giving indemnity to his estate to secure the payment therefor in instalments, the executors, who were the surviving partners, upon a beneficiary becoming of age, are not answerable for not taking such indemnity, or for permitting the instalments to remain in the business, where an accurate account thereof was kept. Vyse v. Foster, L. R. 7 H. L. 318, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 37, 31 L. T. N. S. 177, 23 Week. Rep. 355, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 693.

But it was held in Bennett v. Rhodes, 58 Md. 78, that an executor or testamentary trustee was answerable for resulting losses, where by will it was directed that the money invested in a business should be continued therein for three years after testator's death, and then wound up and the capital returned to his estate, since it was clearly the testator's intention that the original capital should remain unimpaired.

(b) When due to negligent management.

An executor, however, is personally answerable for losses sustained when the result of his fault or negligence in carrying on a business under authority conferred by will. Burgess v. Green, 7 Bush, 263; Luers v. Brumjes, 5 Redf. 32; Re Rumsey, 45 N. Y. S. R. 453, 18 N. Y. Supp. 402.

So, an executor who, although empowered by will to carry on a farm of decedent's, does so in an imprudent manner, will be charged with what should have been made by prudent management thereof, although he will be allowed the true value of his services. Burgess v. Green, 7 Bush, 263.

And executors are personally answerable for losses growing out of their neglect of duty where by will they were directed to cause the value of the testator's interest in a partnership to be ascertained and transferred to the surviving partners, upon security being given for the payment of the value thereof to the testator's son when he became of age, and the executors, who were the surviving partners, neglected to take such security until the firm became insolvent, when they received a mortgage upon property already encumbered. Luers v. Brunjes, 5 Redf. 32.

But where a surviving partner, who, by will, was given the sole management of the partnership business until the testator's youngest child became of age, and two others became the executors, the latter are not liable for losses due to the reckless management of the business by the surviving partner, he alone being responsible therefor. Walker v. Walker, 88 Ky. 615, 11 S. W. 718.

(c) Where business carried on beyond period fixed by will.

Losses sustained in carrying on a business after the expiration of the period prescribed by will fall upon the executor individually. Allen v. Shanks, 90 Tenn. 359, 16 S. W. 715.

3. For debts contracted.

(a) In general.

The weight of authority sustains the rule that the indebtedness contracted by an executor while carrying on a trade or business on behalf of an estate by virtue of a testamentary direction is the individual liability of the executor, rather than of the estate he represents. Wade v. Pope, 44 Ala. 690; Steele v. Steele, 64 Ala. 438, 38 Am. Rep. 15; Vann v. Vann, 71 Ala. 154; Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224; Alzheimer v. Hunter, 56 Ark. 159, 19 S. W. 496; 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 492, 51 Pac. 695; Pitkin v. Pitkin, 7 Conn. 307, 18 Am. Dec. 111; Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 359; Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434; Willis v. Sharp, 115 N. Y. 396, 5 L.R.A. 636, 22 N. E. 149; Saperstein v. Ullman, 49 App. Div. 446, 63 N. Y. Supp. 626, affirmed in 168 N. Y. 636, 61 N. E. 553; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 44 Hun, 201, rehearing denied in 45 Hun, 589; affirmed without opinion in 112 N. Y. 673, 20 N. E. 416; Boulle v. Tompkins, 5 Redf. 472; Froelich v. Froelich Trading Co. 120 N. C. 39, 26 S. E. 647; Morrow v. Morrow, 2 Tenn. Ch. 559; Cutbush v. Cutbush, 1 Beav. 184, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 175, 3 Jur. 142; Barker v. Parker, 1 T. R. 295, 1 Revised Rep. 201; Liverpool Borough Bank v. Walker, 4 De G. & J. 24; Ex parte Garland, 10 Ves. Jr. 110, 1 Smith, 220, 7 Revised Rep. 352; Fairland v. Percy, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 217, 32 L. T. N. S. 405, 44 L. J. Prob. N. S. 11, 23 Week. Rep. 597; Re Johnson, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 548, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 745, 43 L. T. N. S. 372, 29 Week. Rep. 168; Re Morgan, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 93, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 834, 45 L. T. N. S. 183, 30 Week. Rep. 223; Owen v. Delamere, L. R. 15 Eq. 134, 27 L. T. N. S. 847, 42 L. J. Ch. N. S. 232, 21 Week. Rep. 218; Re Frith [1902] 1 Ch. 342, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 199, 86 L. T. N. S. 212; Braun v. Braun, 14 Manitoba L. Rep. 346; Moore v. McGlynn [1904] 1 I. R. 334.

But the executor is entitled to be indemnified by the estate for such liability. See infra, VI.

As to the right of creditors to proceed in equity where an executor is insolvent, see infra, VII.

Lord Eldon, in Ex parte Garland, 10 Ves. Jr. 110, 1 Smith, 220, 7 Revised Rep. 352, in speaking of the liability of an executor who carried on, by a testamentary direction, a business which proved a losing venture, said that the executor became personally responsible, to the extent of all his own property, for all debts contracted by him, and that he might be proceeded against as a bankrupt.

And it was said in Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434, that it is the settled doctrine of the courts of common law that a debt contracted by an executor after the death of his testator, while carrying on a trade or business belonging to the latter, although contracted as executor, binds him individually, and does not bind the estate which he represents.

So, those who become creditors while an executor is carrying on a trade or business under a testamentary direction to do so cannot proceed directly against the estate to collect their claims: they must proceed against the executor individually. Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224.

As to the right of creditors to proceed against the estate in order to collect such debts, see infra, VII.

But it was held in Eisenstadt Mfg. Co. v.

Copeland, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 713, that an executor who carried on a trade or business pursuant to a testamentary command, and who devoted the profits of the business to the payment of the trade debts contracted by him, as well as the support of the testator's family, was not individually liable at the suit of a creditor from whom he purchased goods for the business, for a misappropriation of the funds of the estate.

So, it was held in Re Morgan, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 93, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 834, 45 L. T. N. S. 183, 30 Week. Rep. 223, that an executor who carried on a business under a will, but in his own name, ostensibly as his own, could not be proceeded against as executor by one who gave him credit.

And an executor who was directed by the will of his wife to continue a business belonging to her for so long as he should remain sober and of good habits, so as to conduct it properly, becomes personally liable for debts contracted by him. Saperstein v. Ullman, 49 App. Div. 446, 63 N. Y. Supp. 626, affirmed in 168 N. Y. 636, 61 N. E. 553.

So, executors who carry on a business by directions of a will are personally liable upon a draft discounted by them in their official capacity, the proceeds of which were used in the business. Liverpool Borough Bank v. Walker, 4 De G. & J. 24. The court said in substance that if executors choose to carry on a business, it must be held that, as between them and the world at large, they carry on the business in the ordinary character of mere traders, whose contracts will bind them personally only.

So, an executor who carries on a business under the terms of a will permitting him to do so or to close it out becomes personally liable for debts contracted by him, and may be sued upon a note given by him as manager in the name under which the business was carried on. Froelich v. Froelich Trading Co. 120 N. C. 39, 26 S. E. 647.

It was said in substance in Wild y. Davenport, 48 N. J. L. 129, 57 Am. Rep. 552, 7 Atl. 295, that a personal representative who engaged in a partnership business becomes individually answerable for debts created while so engaged, notwithstanding he carried on the business in conformity with the articles of copartnership, or directions contained in a will.

And in Pitkin v. Pitkin, 7 Conn. 307, 18 Am. Dec. 111, it was said in effect that notwithstanding a provision of a will that a copartnership business should be continued after the testator's death, a creditor must pursue the executor for a debt arising after he began managing the business.

But it was held in Bantz v. Bantz, 52 Md. 686, and Clapp v. Clapp, 10 N. Y. S. R. 733, that an executor who carried on a trade or business by virtue of a testamentary command was not answerable for trade debts contracted by him, but that the estate was liable therefor.

A testamentary trustee who was authorized by will to continue a testator's interest 40. L.R.A. (N.S.) in a partnership business under the management of the surviving partner is not liable for debts subsequently contracted, where he did not in any manner join in the management of the business, nor exercise any control or supervision over it, nor receive any of the profits. Owens v. Mackall, 33 Md. 382.

So, where a brother of a testator took possession of a business devised to him, the executor, who did not take part in the management thereof, is not answerable for debts contracted by the former. Fleming v. Fleming, 204 Pa. 648, 54 Atl. 473.

Where a son to whom a business was bequeathed took possession thereof without guarantying the payment of the testator's outstanding debts, as the will required, and with the consent of the executor carried on the business on his own account, transacting all business in his own name as attorney, under power given him by the executor, the latter is not liable to one who gave credit to the son without knowledge of the facts, as a finding that the executor was not carrying on the business was warranted. American Tube Works v. Tucker, 185 Mass. 236, 70 N. E. 59.

So, where, by will, an interest in a business was given one who was to make designated monthly payments to the executor, the latter, who took no part in the management of the business other than to receive such payments, is not liable as a partner for debts contracted by the former in carrying on the business. McArdle v. West Philadelphia Title & T. Co. 7 Pa. Super. Ct. 328.

As to the allowance from an estate of expenses incurred by an executor while carrying on a trade or business on behalf of an estate under testamentary power, see infra, V. f, 7.

(b) Liability of executor for debts contracted by coexecutor where former did not participate in management of business.

It was held in Noyes v. Turnbull, 54 Hun, 26, 7 N. Y. Supp. 114, affirmed without opinion in 130 N. Y. 639, 29 N. E. 145, where a business was carried on by testamentary trustees under authority conferred by a testator, that one of the trustees was not liable, after his release by the court, for a debt contracted by the other, to whom credit was extended with knowledge of the fact that he was the sole trustee.

And an executor who did not join with his coexecutor in carrying on a business pursuant to the commands of a will is not liable for trade debts contracted by the latter. Eisenstadt Mfg. Co. v. Copeland, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 713.

4. For debts contracted after expiration of time fixed by will for carrying on business.

An executor who was empowered by will to carry on a trade or business until a designated person became of age cannot, after that event, bind the estate for trade debts. Crooke v. Hume, 139 Ky. 834, 109 S. W. 364.

As to the allowance from an estate of expenses incurred by an executor in carrying on a trade or business after the period fixed by will for doing so, see Allen v. Shanks, infra, V. 1, 7.

b. Liability of administrator c. t. a. or d. b. n. for debts contracted while carrying on business under testamentary power.

In Georgia it has been held that an administrator de bonis non who conducts a business under a power conferred by will upon an executor is not personally liable for debts necessarily contracted by him. Brannon v. Ober & Sons Co. 106 Ga. 168, 32 S. E. 16; Palmer v. Moore, 82 Ga. 177, 14 Am. St. Rep. 147, 8 S. E. 180.

But it was held in Fairland v. Percy, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 217, 32 L. T. N. S. 405, 44 L. J. Prob. N. S. 11, 23 Week Rep. 597, that where a will gave property to an executor in trust, for the benefit of the widow of the testator, with power to carry on a business during her widowhood, and upon the executor declining to act, she became administrator de bonis non, she was individually answerable for debts contracted by her while conducting such business.

As to the binding effect of debts contracted by an administrator c. t. a. or d. b. n. upon the trade assets, see infra, V. a, 3.

c. When business carried on without testamentary authority.

1. Liability for losses sustained.

(a) In general.

An executor is bound at his absolute risk to see that an estate shall not suffer loss or diminution by reason of his carrying on a trade or business in its behalf without testamentary authority. Gilligan v. Daly, — N. J. Eq. —, 80 Atl. 994.

And it was said in Smith v. Preston, 170 Ill. 179, 48 N. E. 688, affirming 67 Ill. App. 613, that an administrator who carries on a trade or business without testamentary authority does so at his own risk.

So it was said in Tompkins v. Weeks, 26 Cal. 50, that an administrator who carries on a trade or business on behalf of an estate is answerable for resulting losses.

A testamentary trustee who permits the funds of an estate to remain in a partnership of which the testator was a member, as was also his cotrustee, instead of withdrawing them and investing them, as directed by will to do, becomes individually liable to those beneficially interested in the estate, upon the failure of the co-partnership, for permitting the funds to accumulate therein, notwithstanding he did not have actual knowledge of the fact that the funds were being used by the firm, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

which he might easily have discovered, however, by making inquiry. Wilmerding v. McKesson, 103 N. Y. 329, 8 N. E. 665.

And since a testamentary direction to keep a certain portion of an estate invested in a partnership business in which the testator was interested does not empower an executor to become a partner by so doing, he becomes liable to answer for the portion of the estate so invested. Travis v. Milne, 9 Hare, 141, 20 L. J. Ch. N. S. 665.

So, an administrator who carries on a business belonging to an estate for eleven months, apparently for his own benefit, will be deemed to have elected to take it at its appraised value; and the creditors of the deceased may compel him to answer for the difference between it and what it brought at a sale. Wood's Estate, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 314.

As to liability of a personal representative for losses where a trade or business was carried on in order to wind it up, see infra, III. c, 4 (b).

Or where a trade or business is carried on under statutory authority, see infra, III. c, 5 (a).

Or when carried on under an order of court, see infra, III. c, 6 (a).

As to liability of a guardian for losses sustained while carrying on a trade or business, see infra, IV. b.

(b) In mercantile business.

As an administrator or an executor who is not empowered by will to do so is not justified in carrying on a business belonging to an intestate, he becomes personally liable for resulting losses. Re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 Pac. 86; Re Broome, — Cal. —, 122 Pac. 470; Poullain v. Brown, 82 Ga. 412, 9 S. E. 1131; Smith v. Preston, 170 Ill. 179, 48 N. E. 688, affirming 67 Ill. App. 613; Michels Co. v. Young, 150 Ill. App. 442; Campbell v. Faxon, 73 Kan. 675, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1002, 85 Pac. 760; Frey v. Eisenhardt, 116 Mich. 160, 74 N. W. 501; Gilligan v. Daly, — N. J. Eq. —, 80 Atl. 994; Thompson v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 619; Wilmerding v. McKesson, 103 N. Y. 329, 8 N. E. 665; Re Prescott, Tucker, 430; Re McGovern, 118 N. Y. Supp. 378; Munzor's Estate, 4 Misc. 374, 25 N. Y. Supp. 818; Re United States Mortg. & T. Co. 114 App. Div. 532, 100 N. Y. Supp. 12; Peterman v. United States Rubber Co. 221 Ill. 581, 77 N. E. 1108; Callaghan v. Hall, 1 Serg. & R. 241; Western Newspaper Union v. Thurmond, 27 Okla. 261, 111 Pac. 204, Ann. Cas. 1912 B. 727; Merkel's Estate, 131 Pa. 584, 18 Atl. 931; Shinn's Estate, 166 Pa. 121, 30 Atl. 1026, 1030; Allam's Estate, 199 Pa. 573, 49 Atl. 252; Re Dillenkofer, 34 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 303; Oram's Estate, 9 Phila. 358; Bowker's Estate, 12 Phila. 88; Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1; Hooper v. Hooper, 29 W. Va. 276, 1 S. E. 280; Gum v. Frost, 4 Fed. 745; Fidelity & D. Co. v. Moshier, 151 Fed. 806; Labouchere v. Tupper, 11 Moore, P. C. C. 198, 5 Week.

Rep. 597; Heathcote v. Hulme, 1 Jac. & W. 122, 20 Revised Rep. 248.

Thus, in Merkel's Estate, 131 Pa. 584, 18 Atl. 931, an administrator was surcharged with a loss due to his continuance of a business where the estate was insolvent.

And in Callaghan v. Hall, 1 Serg. & R. 241, an administrator was surcharged where he shipped merchandise to a foreign port, where it was sold at a loss.

So, testamentary trustees are personally liable for losses sustained where, in violation of the commands of a will as to the investment of the funds of an estate, they permitted it to remain for many years in a mercantile business. Kirkman v. Booth, 11 Beav. 273, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 25, 13 Jur. 525, 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 29.

And an administrator who continues a business belonging to his intestate is liable for losses sustained beyond the value of the assets embarked in the business at the latter's death. Allam's Estate, 199 Pa. 573, 49 Atl. 252.

So, an administrator is answerable for a loss sustained where, without an order of court, he expended a large sum of money in mining operations of a highly speculative character, notwithstanding they were begun by his intestate in his lifetime. Shinn's Estate, 166 Pa. 121, 30 Atl. 1026, 1030.

And an executor is personally liable for losses sustained by making sales on credit without security, as required by statute, although in good faith he continued to operate a manufacturing business belonging to the estate. Peterman v. United States Rubber Co. 221 Ill. 581, 77 N. E. 1108.

And the executor is not relieved from liability for such losses by reason of the fact that his management of the business resulted in a net profit, since it was his duty to save the estate from such losses. Ibid.

And a sister of an intestate is chargeable with losses sustained both before and after her appointment as administratrix, where, at the request of the other heirs, she took possession of and ran a business belonging to the estate for four months before her appointment as administratrix. Re McGovern, 118 N. Y. Supp. 378.

As to the liability of a personal representative for losses where a trade or business is carried on in order to wind it up, see infra, III. c. 4 (b).

Or where a trade or business is carried on under statutory authority, see infra, III. c. 5 (a).

Or when carried on under an order of court, see infra, III. c. 6 (a).

As to the liability of a guardian for losses sustained while carrying on a trade or business, see infra, IV. b.

(c) In partnership business.

An administrator or executor, unless authorized by will to do so, who actively participates in conducting a partnership business of which deceased was a member, becomes personally liable for losses sustained. Thompson v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 619; Wilmerding v. McKesson, 103 N. Y. 329, 8 N. E. 665; Gibson v. Stevens, 7 N. H. 357.

In Wilmerding v. McKesson, 103 N. Y. 329, 8 N. E. 665, the liability of an executor, who was also a testamentary trustee, for losses sustained, was conceded, where he continued the funds of the estate in a partnership business in which the testator was interested.

So, where testamentary trustees contrary to command of a will that the estate should be invested in good securities, permitted it to remain for a number of years in a partnership business which had been carried on by the testator and his brother, who was also one of the two trustees, during the former's lifetime, the other trustee is answerable to the estate for losses sustained, where, notwithstanding he did not actively participate in the management of the business, he was frequently about the establishment, and was aware of the manner in which the business was conducted. Booth v. Booth, 1 Beav. 125, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 39, 2 Jur. 938.

As to the liability of a personal representative for losses where a trade or business was carried on in order to wind it up, see infra, III. c. 4 (b).

Or where a trade or business is carried on under statutory authority, see infra, III. c. 5 (a).

Or when carried on under an order of court, see infra, III. c. 6 (a).

As to the liability of a guardian for losses sustained while carrying on a trade or business, see infra, IV. b.

(d) In farming business.

A personal representative is answerable for losses resulting from continuing a farming business belonging to an estate where he was not empowered to do so. Sparrow's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 696, 2 So. 501.

And an administrator is personally liable for losses sustained where he carried on a plantation for the year in which his intestate died, notwithstanding he would have been relieved by statute had he first obtained leave of court to continue such business. Poullain v. Brown, 82 Ga. 412, 9 S. E. 1131.

But the contrary was held in Lawton v. Fish, 51 Ga. 647, where an executor, without an order from the court, cultivated a crop planted by his testator, and a resulting loss was due to an unpropitious season.

As to the liability of a personal representative for losses sustained while carrying on a farming business under statutory authority, see infra, III. c. 5 (a).

And in Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1, it was said that an administrator who worked the farm of an intestate would not be liable except for losses due to gross neglect, where he fairly accounted for the proceeds.

So, where an administrator, in the exercise of good discretion, worked his decedent's farm for four months, he will not be chargeable with losses sustained. Walker's Estate, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 515.

And an administrator is not liable for failure to make adequate crops on a plantation belonging to the succession, which was not due to his fault or negligence. Myrick's Succession, 38 La. Ann. 611.

Nor is he liable for the value of domestic animals that died without his fault, while working such plantation. Ibid.

Nor will he be charged with the value of horses that died without his fault or negligence, where he is chargeable with their hire, at the election of those interested in the estate. Harrison v. Harrison, 39 Ala. 489.

2. Liability for debts contracted.

(a) In mercantile business.

An executor or administrator who carries on a trade or business on behalf of an estate without being empowered by will to do so becomes individually answerable for all debts contracted by him while so engaged.

Eufaula Nat. Bank v. Manassas, 124 Ala. 379, 27 So. 258; Re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 Pac. 86; Hallock v. Smith, 50 Conn. 127; Campbell v. Faxon, 73 Kan. 675, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1002, 85 Pac. 760; Carroll v. Davidson, 23 La. Ann. 428; Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ligon, 59 Miss. 305; Avery v. Myers, 60 Miss. 367; Doolittle v. Willet, 57 N. J. L. 398, 31 Atl. 385; Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 586, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun. 434; Keynon v. Olney, 31 N. Y. S. R. 839, 15 N. Y. Supp. 416; Re Sharp, 5 Dem. 516; Re Tisdale, 110 App. 857, 97 N. Y. Supp. 494; Western Newspaper Union v. Thurmond, 27 Okla. 261, 111 Pac. 204, Ann. Cas. 1912 B, 727; Re United States Mortg. & T. Co. 114 App. Div. 532, 100 N. Y. Supp. 12; Corr's Estate, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 209; Morrow v. Morrow, 2 Tenn. Ch. 549; Hooper v. Hooper, 29 W. Va. 276, 1 S. E. 280; Rich v. Sowles, 64 Vt. 408, 15 L.R.A. 850, 23 Atl. 723; Labouchere v. Tupper, 11 Moore P. C. C. 198, 5 Week. Rep. 597; Re Evans, L. R. 34 Ch. Div. 597, 56 L. T. N. S. 768, 35 Week. Rep. 586; M'Aloon v. M'Aloon [1900] 1 I. R. 367.

It was said in Morrow v. Morrow, 2 Tenn. Ch. 549, that a personal representative who carried on a trade or business on behalf of an estate, when not empowered by will or an order of a court of chancery, becomes individually answerable for all debts contracted by him while so engaged.

And it was held in Corr's Estate, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 209, that an administrator who carried on a business belonging to an estate, as well as the beneficiaries thereof, who had knowledge thereof, and assented to his so doing, are answerable for goods purchased therefor.

So, an executor who, without authority, for five years, operated a mill belonging to his decedent, will be charged with the cost of extensive permanent repairs 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

made by him, as well as with the cost of new machinery installed in the mill. Re Tisdale, 110 App. Div. 857, 97 N. Y. Supp. 494.

And an administrator is answerable for such debts, although contracted by an agent employed by him to run the business. Campbell v. Faxon, 73 Kan. 675, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1002, 85 Pac. 760.

But it was said in Re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 Pac. 86, that debts contracted by an administrator while carrying on a trade or business belonging to an estate might be paid from the income of the business if the estate did not suffer a loss therefrom.

As to the liability of a personal representative for debts contracted while carrying on a trade or business in order to wind it up, see infra, III, c, 4 (c).

Or while carrying on a trade or business under statutory authority, see infra, III, c, 5 (b).

Or under an order of court, see infra, III, c, 6 (b).

As to the liability of a guardian for debts contracted while carrying on a trade or business, see infra, IV, c.

(b) In partnership business.

The personal representative of a decedent, who, without testamentary authority, actively participates in the management of a partnership business of which the decedent was a member, becomes personally liable as a partner for all debts subsequently contracted. Edgar v. Cook, 4 Ala. 588; Alsop v. Mather, 8 Conn. 584, 21 Am. Dec. 703; Frey v. Eisenhardt, 116 Mich. 160, 74 N. W. 501; City Nat. Bank v. Stone, 131 Mich. 588, 92 N. W. 99; Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ligon, 59 Miss. 305; Avery v. Myers, 60 Miss. 367; Thompson v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 619; Wightman v. Townroe, 1 Maule & S. 412, 14 Revised Rep. 475.

It was said obiter in substance in Gibson v. Stevens, 7 N. H. 357, that if an executor, without testamentary authority, undertakes the joint management of a partnership business in which a testator was a member, he lays the foundation for a personal liability.

And this rule will be applied where the executor actively participates in the management of the partnership affairs through the agency of the surviving partner. Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ligon, 59 Miss. 305.

So, an administrator is liable as a partner for debts incurred in carrying on a partnership business under an agreement with the surviving partner, whereby the latter continued the business for the benefit of himself and the estate. City Nat. Bank v. Stone, 131 Mich. 588, 92 N. W. 99.

And it was held in Alsop v. Mather, 8 Conn. 584, 21 Am. Dec. 703, that an executor of a deceased partner, who carried on a business with the surviving partner, became individually liable as a partner for all debts subsequently contracted in the business.

So, an executor and his partner are not justified in sending a vessel belonging to the estate, which had been partitioned among the distributees, upon a voyage, and they are personally liable for necessary repairs made during the voyage. Muntz v. Broom, 11 La. Ann. 472.

And an executor who was not empowered by will to carry on a business is personally liable for money borrowed by him for the use of a partnership of which his testator was a member. Johnson v. Kellogg, 26 N. Y. Week. Dig. 467, 8 N. Y. S. R. 413.

So, it was held in Edgar v. Cook, 4 Ala. 588, that a clause in articles of copartnership, to the effect that it should continue for a definite time after the death of a partner, rendered an executor individually liable for debts contracted by the surviving partner, where the former joined in carrying on the business.

As to the allowance as an expense of administration for money advanced by an administrator for the use of a partnership of which his testator was a member, see Tompkins v. Weeks, infra, V. f, 1.

But an executor is not personally liable for debts created, notwithstanding he permitted the assets of the testator to remain in a partnership for more than two years, where he did not take part in the management thereof, but repeatedly demanded that the surviving partner should wind up the business, and neither he nor the estate derived any benefit from the business, and he did not hold himself out as a partner, nor was he so regarded by the surviving partner. Avery v. Myers, 60 Miss. 367.

And an administrator of a part owner of a vessel, who took no part in its operation after the death of his intestate, is not personally liable for debts contracted by the surviving owners for necessary supplies therefor. Gum v. Frost, 4 Fed. 745; Stedman v. Feidler, 20 N. Y. 437, affirming 25 Barb. 605.

So, an executor who did not personally engage in carrying on a partnership business after the death of his testator is not liable as a partner for debts subsequently contracted, notwithstanding the articles of copartnership provide that upon the death of one of the partners his capital shall remain in the business until the expiration of the partnership. Wild v. Davenport, 48 N. J. L. 129, 57 Am. Rep. 552, 7 Atl. 295.

And an executor who permits the capital of a testator to remain in a banking business in which he was interested in his lifetime is not, upon the subsequent insolvency of the bank, liable as a partner, although he had received as executor profits on the investment. Tisch v. Rockafellow, 209 Pa. 419, 58 Atl. 805.

So, an executor does not become liable as a partner for the debts of a partnership of which his testator was a member, created after his death, merely because he lent money to the surviving partner for the benefit of the business, notwithstanding the will of the deceased partner declared that such business should be continued by the 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

survivor for five years after the death of either of the members. Stewart v. Robinson, 115 N. Y. 328, 5 L.R.A. 410, 22 N. E. 160, 163.

And where articles of copartnership provide that the business should be continued by the survivor for five years after the death of either, the executor of one of them, who lends money to the survivor for the benefit of the business, is not liable as a partner for debts contracted by the latter, the estate embarked in the business only being liable. Ibid.

As to the liability of a personal representative for debts contracted while carrying on a trade or business in order to wind it up, see infra, III. c, 4 (c).

Or while carrying it on under statutory authority, see infra, III. c, 5 (b).

Or under an order of court, see infra, III. c, 6 (b).

As to the liability of a guardian for debts contracted while carrying on a business, see infra, IV. c.

(c) In farming business.

A personal representative who, without being empowered by will, works a plantation or farm belonging to an estate long after harvesting the crops growing at the death of his intestate, becomes personally liable for all expenses incurred. Hallock v. Smith, 50 Conn. 127; Florsheim Bros. v. Holt, 32 La. Ann. 133; Carroll v. Davidson, 23 La. Ann. 428; Miltenerberger v. Taylor, 23 La. Ann. 188; Sparrow's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 696, 2 So. 501; Jaquett's Estate, 13 Lanc. Bar. 13; Rich v. Sowles, 64 Vt. 408, 15 L.R.A. 850, 23 Atl. 723.

And an administrator who, without an order of the court, but with the concurrence of the widow and majority of the heirs continues a plantation business long after the crop thereon at the time of the death of his intestate had been harvested, becomes personally liable for debts incurred. Maxwell-Yerger Co. v. Rogan, 125 La. 1, 51 So. 48.

So, an administrator who operates a farm belonging to an estate is personally liable for a horse purchased by him for use thereon. Rich v. Sowles, 64 Vt. 408, 15 L.R.A. 850, 23 Atl. 723.

Or for a yoke of oxen purchased, notwithstanding they were afterwards sold and the proceeds used in the employment of necessary labor for carrying on the farm business. Hallock v. Smith, 50 Conn. 127.

As to the liability of a personal representative for debts contracted while carrying on a farming business in order to wind it up, see infra, III. c, 4 (c).

Or while carrying on such business under statutory authority, see infra, III. c, 5 (b).

Or under an order of court, see infra, III. c, 6 (b).

As to the liability of a guardian for debts so contracted, see infra, IV. c.

As to the payment from an estate of the expenses incurred by an administrator in carrying on a farming business without authority, see infra, V. 1, 2.

As to the right of a personal representative to indemnity from an estate for liability incurred while carrying on a trade or business without authority, see infra, VI.

(d) By executor de son tort in carrying on business.

An administrator de son tort who continues a banking business of a decedent is personally liable on certificates of deposit issued by him. Kelley v. Kelley, 84 Fed. 420.

And a parent who took possession of and conducted a business belonging to his deceased son for a year before becoming administrator of his estate will not be allowed an accounting for money advanced by him for the purchase of goods for such business; "although," said the court, "had the estate been benefited by it, the administrator would be allowed therefor." McKee v. Mobley, 3 S. C. 242.

3. Liability for rental or value of property embarked or used in business; interest; profits.

An administrator is not answerable to those beneficially interested in an estate for the net profits of a trade or business carried on by him, when done with their tacit consent. French v. Davis, 38 Miss. 167.

But interest will be charged a testamentary trustee on losses sustained where he left funds of an estate in a partnership business in which his testator was interested, instead of withdrawing them and investing them as the testator directed. Wilmerding v. McKesson, 103 N. Y. 329, 8 N. E. 665.

So, an executor to whom a business was devised subject to the payment of the debts of the testator in the event of the balance of the estate proving insufficient, who took possession of the business and carried it on for his own benefit, will be required, upon a deficiency of assets, to account for the property embarked in such business, or its value, including the good will and interest, as well as for the rental of the premises in which the business was carried on, which belonged to the estate. Re Van Houten, 18 App. Div. 301, 46 N. Y. Supp. 190.

And an executor or administrator who carries on a trade or business on behalf of an estate without being empowered to do so by will is answerable to those beneficially interested in the estate for the value of the assets employed in the business, together with interest thereon. Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608; Campbell v. Faxon, 73 Kan. 675, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1002, 85 Pac. 760; Gilligan v. Daly, — N. J. Eq. —, 80 Atl. 994; Re United States Mortg. & T. Co. 114 App. Div. 532, 100 N. Y. Supp. 12; Robinett's Appeal, 36 Pa. 174; McDonald v. Richardson, 5 Jur. N. S. 9, 1 Giff. 81; Heathcote v. Hulme, 1 Jac. & W. 122, 20 Revised Rep. 248.

So, the same rule is applicable to a testamentary trustee, who continues a business without testamentary authority. Re United States Mortg. & T. Co. 114 App. Div. 532, 100 N. Y. Supp. 12.

And an administrator will be held answerable for the value of a business, as well as the profits, which he carried on under an order of a court, where he sold it to a corporation of which he was the largest stockholder, paying the legatees therefor in the worthless stock thereof. Roberts v. Weimer, 227 Ill. 138, 81 N. E. 40.

And an executor to whom property was devised in trust, who carries on a business for the period prescribed by will, at a loss, is answerable for the profits of the business, or, at the election of those interested in the estate, for interest on the sum embarked therein. Docker v. Somes, 2 Myl. & K. 655, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 200.

And, when moved by special circumstances, annual rests will be made. Ibid.

Or, at the election of those beneficially interested in an estate, a personal representative who carries on a trade or business on behalf of an estate may be charged with the net profits of the business. Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608; McCreelias v. Hinkle, 17 Ala. 459; Harrison v. Harrison, 39 Ala. 489; Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 180; French v. Davis, 38 Miss. 167; Merchant v. Comback, 41 N. J. Eq. 349, 7 Atl. 633, affirming 39 N. J. Eq. 506; Gilligan v. Daly, — N. J. Eq. —, 80 Atl. 994; Re Sues, 37 Misc. 459, 75 N. Y. Supp. 938; Robinett's Appeal, 36 Pa. 174; Halloway's Estate, 13 Phila. 317; Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1.

And an administratrix who permits her husband to continue a business belonging to an intestate is liable for the net profits thereof. Re Sues, 37 Misc. 459, 75 N. Y. Supp. 938.

While other cases say he shall be charged with the "profits" of the business. Re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 Pac. 86; Re McGovern, 118 N. Y. Supp. 378; Munzor's Estate, 4 Misc. 374, 25 N. Y. Supp. 818; Re Maloney, 233 Pa. 614, 82 Atl. 958; Oram's Estate, 9 Phila. 358; Nivens v. Nivens, 66 C. C. A. 145, 133 Fed. 39; Heathcote v. Hulme, 1 Jac. & W. 122, 20 Revised Rep. 248; Palmer v. Mitchell, 2 Myl. & K. 672, note; McDonald v. Richardson, 5 Jur. N. S. 9, 1 Giff. 81.

Thus, an executor is liable for profits where he continues a partnership business of which the testator was a member, until the expiration of the term fixed by the articles of copartnership. Re Maloney, 233 Pa. 614, 82 Atl. 958.

And in Re United States Mortg. & T. Co. 114 App. Div. 532, 100 N. Y. Supp. 12, it was held that a testamentary trustee who carried on a business without authority was answerable for the profits.

So, in Walker v. Woodward, 1 Russ. Ch. 107, 25 Revised Rep. 9, an administrator who carried on decedent's farm was charged with the profits therefrom, with interest at annual rests, where he did not keep an account of the business.

And an administrator who carries on a trade or business at a profit will be charged therewith, less the reasonable expenses of the business. Robinett's Appeal, 36 Pa. 174.

But an administrator who carried on a blacksmithing business pending the settlement of an estate is not answerable for the profits thereof to one to whom a subsequently discovered will devised such business. Flannigan's Estate, 28 Pa. Super. Ct. 487.

And the net profits of a business will not be charged an administrator who carries on a business at a loss, in order to close it out. Re Sharp, 5 Dem. 516.

But where an executor, who was invested with absolute discretion to postpone the sale of the property of an estate, for twenty-two years paid to a life tenant the income from a business carried on by him, as directed by will, he is not answerable to a remote legatee for the profits of such business. Re Crowther [1895] 2 Ch. 56, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 537, 13 Reports, 496, 72 L. T. N. S. 762, 43 Week. Rep. 571.

Where an administrator is chargeable with the profits of a business, in establishing them, only those resulting from the capital of the estate should be included, due allowance being made for the business skill of the administrator in carrying on the business. Gilligan v. Daly, — N. J. Eq. —, 80 Atl. 994.

Where a farming business was carried on without authority, the beneficiaries may, after deducting the expense of the business, elect to charge the administrator with the hire of a slave belonging to the estate, which he employed thereon. McCreeliss v. Hinkle, 17 Ala. 459.

And where a plantation was operated without authority, the beneficiaries may elect to charge the administrator with the rental thereof, or the profits; and if the latter are taken, the administrator is entitled to a deduction for his reasonable expenses of carrying on the business. Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 180.

Circumstances may arise which will justify taking profits for one period and interest for another. But notice of the dissolution of a partnership, unaccompanied by a settlement of the accounts or a transfer of the property, is not sufficient. Heathcote v. Hulme, 1 Jac. & W. 122, 20 Revised Rep. 248.

Where profits of a business are claimed, burden of showing there were any rests upon the claimants. Re Suess, 37 Misc. 459, 75 N. Y. Supp. 938; Munzor's Estate, 4 Misc. 374, 25 N. Y. Supp. 818; Re United States Mortg. & T. Co. 114 App. Div. 532, 100 N. Y. Supp. 12.

And the burden rests on the claimants to show that greater profits were earned than accounted for by the personal representative. Re Peck, 79 App. Div. 296, 80 N. Y. Supp. 76, affirmed without opinion in 177 N. Y. 538, 69 N. E. 1129.

Where an executor or administrator without authority carries on a farming business belonging to an estate, he may be charged, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) at the option of those beneficially interested in the estate, with the rental of the property used by him in the business. Harrison v. Harrison, 39 Ala. 489; Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 180; Sparrow's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 696, 2 So. 501.

An administrator who, without authority, continues planting operations for several years, without attempting to lease the plantation, becomes liable for the rental value thereof during such time. Sparrow's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 696, 2 So. 501.

So, an administrator is answerable, at the election of the beneficiaries, either for the profits or the rental of a plantation belonging to a decedent, which he carried on without having obtained an order from the court, as the statute required. Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608.

And an administrator de bonis non who continues the plantation business of an intestate is personally answerable to distributees for the net profits or the rent of the property employed, with interest. Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 180.

So, an administrator who keeps an estate together without an order of court, as required by statute, and works a plantation belonging to an estate for a number of years, is liable, at the election of the distributees, either for the rental of the land and hire of the slaves of the estate, employed thereon, and interest, or they may take the net proceeds of the crops raised. Harrison v. Harrison, 39 Ala. 489.

Or, he may be charged, at the election of those interested in the estate, with the value of the services of slaves belonging to the estate, which he employed in working the plantation. Ibid; McCreeliss v. Hinkle, 17 Ala. 459.

So, an executor who, without authority, keeps an estate together and works a plantation of the decedent, is liable, at the election of the distributees, for the crops raised thereon, or for the hire of the slaves of the estate employed thereon. Billingslea v. Young, 33 Miss. 95.

And after the death of a widow, who, as administratrix of her husband's estate, formed a copartnership with the children of full age and others, and employed the slaves of the estate in working a plantation, the minor heirs may recover from the surviving partners for the services of the slaves. Guille v. Gassen, 14 La. Ann. 5.

But an administrator who improperly carried on a farming business, upon being charged by the distributees with the hire of slaves belonging to the estate, which he worked on the farm, will be allowed compensation for caring for those who were helpless. Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608.

And an administrator will be charged with the value of the services of domestic animals belonging to the estate, which he employed on such plantation. Harrison v. Harrison, supra.

So, in Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1, an administrator who re-chartered a ferry belonging to his intestate was charged with the rents and profits thereof.

While the personal representative may, at the election of those interested in the estate, be charged with either such rental or the net profits realized by him, they cannot have both. McCreeless v. Hinkle, 17 Ala. 459.

As to the liability of a guardian for the profits of a business or rental of the property employed therein, see infra, IV. d.

4. Liability incurred in winding up business.

(a) In general.

As to the allowance from an estate of the expenses incurred by a personal representative while winding up a trade or business, see infra, V. f, 3.

An administrator is not answerable for the net profits of a business which he carried on at a loss, in order to wind it up. Re Sharp, 5 Dem. 516.

(b) For losses sustained.

Losses sustained as a result of a personal representative's continuing a mercantile business in order to dispose of it will not fall upon him. Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150; Re Semple, 189 Pa. 385, 42 Atl. 28, reversing 28 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 431; Orne's Estate, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 337; Greiner's Estate, 14 Pa. Dist. R. 348; Wright v. Beatty, 2 Alberta L. Rep. 89; Garrett v. Noble, 6 Sim. 504, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 159.

This doctrine has been applied where an executor, to whom was bequeathed a half interest in personal property used in a hotel business, without an order of the court, in good faith, carried on the business for a year or more at a loss, until it could be sold to advantage, the business having been a losing one during the lifetime of the testator. Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150.

And it has been applied where a personal representative at a loss conducted a hotel business in order to affect a sale and preserve its lease, continually advertising it for sale, since the loss will be considered an expense of administration, even against creditors of the testator who assented to and acquiesced in the conduct of the executor. Wright v. Beatty, 2 Alberta L. Rep. 89.

So, it has been applied where an administrator, in the exercise of that degree of care and caution that a prudent man would have employed, continued a manufacturing business for about six months during a period not propitious for a sale, and then disposed of it for less than its inventory value. Orne's Estate, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 337.

And an administrator who, in good faith, continued a business belonging to an estate, continually advertising it for sale, will not be charged with a loss resulting therefrom. Greiner's Estate, 14 Pa. Dist. R. 348.

So, executors are not answerable for a loss sustained by the operation for a year of a business belonging to an estate, where it was impossible to sell it sooner, and 10 L.R.A. (N.S.)

they acted in good faith, under a direction of the will to collect the personal property of the testator with all convenient speed. Garrett v. Noble, 6 Sim. 504, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 159.

And an administrator is not answerable for a loss, where he carried on a business for several years, paying from the proceeds about a quarter of a million dollars in debts of the decedent, and afterwards selling the business for $48,000 less than its appraised value, it appearing that the stock was old, and that the administrator tried repeatedly to sell it, and also that it would have been impossible to obtain a better price than he did. Re Semple, 189 Pa. 385, 42 Atl. 28, reversing 28 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 431.

So, an executor is not answerable for a loss where, in good faith, he continued a boarding school, which the testator had carried on for many years, for the balance of the term in which the testator died, where there were many contracts for tuition for the full term. Re Benedict, 13 Abb. N. C. 67, 1 Dem. 547.

An executor who, without testamentary authority, continued in good faith, for three years, in order to wind it up, a business which required skill and judgment in its management, and from the proceeds he paid all of the testator's debts, will not be charged with the difference between the appraised value of the business and the price he obtained therefor, where an immediate sale would have resulted in a heavy loss. Bowker's Estate, 12 Phila. 88.

So, an administrator who, in good faith, carried on a business, continually advertising it for sale, will not be charged with a resulting loss. Greimer's Estate, 14 Pa. Dist. R. 348.

As to the right of a personal representative to indemnity from an estate for losses sustained while carrying on a trade or business without authority, in order to wind it up, see Wright v. Beatty, infra, VI.

(c) For debts contracted.

As to the allowance as cost of administration of expenses incurred by personal representative in winding up a trade or business, see infra, V. f, 3.

Or when done under statute, see infra, V. f, 5.

And when done under an order of court, see infra, V. f, 6.

Within reasonable limits, the personal representative may, if for the best interests of the estate, purchase goods to replenish the stock and incur liabilities without incurring individual responsibility therefor. Re Sharp, 5 Dem. 516.

But for a case holding the contrary, see Re Osburn, infra, III. c, 5 (b).

5. Liability when acting under statute.

(a) For losses sustained.

A personal representative who works a farm belonging to his decedent under a statutory provision permitting it is not answerable for a loss sustained, unless the result of his own mismanagement or negligence. Harding v. Evans, 3 Port. (Ala.) 221, 29 Am. Dec. 255; Taylor v. Bush, 75 Ala. 432; Stephens v. James, 77 Ga. 139, 3 S. E. 160; King v. Johnson, 96 Ga. 497, 23 S. E. 500; Lawton v. Fish, 51 Ga. 650.

And an executor who, under a statute permitting him to do so, continued a business belonging to his testator, does not become liable for resulting losses unless due to a failure to exercise reasonable discretion, notwithstanding the will directed that such business should be closed immediately upon the death of the testator. Dwyer v. Kalteyer, 68 Tex. 554, 5 S. W. 78.

But an administrator is personally liable for resulting losses where he carried on a plantation business for the year in which his intestate died without a necessary order from the court, as required by statute. Poullain v. Brown, 82 Ga. 412, 9 S. E. 1131.

And he will not be answerable for losses sustained as the result of an unpropitious season, where, without such an order of court, a plantation was cultivated by him for the season in which his intestate died. Lawton v. Fish, 51 Ga. 647.

(b) For debts contracted.

As to the right of a personal representative to indemnity from an estate under such circumstances, see infra, VI.

Notwithstanding that an executor may, by statute, where his intestate dies after January 1st, cultivate his plantation for the current year, he becomes personally liable for debts contracted in so doing. Stephens v. James, 77 Ga. 139, 3 S. E. 160; Harding v. Evans, 3 Port. (Ala.) 221, 29 Am. Dec. 255.

However, if such indebtedness was properly incurred, it may be allowed by the court against the estate, and retained by the executor, notwithstanding the business resulted in a loss, unless due to his own mismanagement or fault. Ibid.

But if a personal representative continues to carry on a plantation after the expiration of the year provided by statute, he becomes personally liable for all expenses thereafter incurred. Eubank v. Clark, 78 Ala. 73; Johnson v. Parnell, 60 Ga. 661; King v. Johnson, 96 Ga. 497, 23 S. E. 500.

Since a statute permitting the personal representative to carry on the business of a decedent does not include a partnership business, the former becomes personally liable on a note given by him for purchases made in behalf of such partnership, where his conduct led the payee to believe that he was a partner. Altgelt v. Sullivan, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 333.

So, he may bind himself by paying interest on such a note. Altgelt v. Alamo Nat. Bank, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 582.

trade or business he is closing up under an order of a court, granted pursuant to a statute, since his power under such order did not extend to the purchasing of goods to replenish the stock. Re Osburn, 36 Or. 8, 58 Pac. 521.

As to the allowance as a cost of administration, from an estate, of expenses incurred by an administrator while carrying on a trade or business under statutory authority, see infra, V. f, 5.

6. Liability when acting under order of court.

(a) For losses sustained.

It was said in Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150, that an executor who carries on a trade of the testator by a decree of a court of chancery is not answerable for losses sustained.

The selling by an administrator of a stock of goods at private sales at retail, according to the ordinary course of merchandising, under the orders of the court, though not a regular proceeding by law, is not fraudulent per se, but any resulting loss to the estate will authorize an inquiry into the bona fides of the transaction. McLeod v. Griffiths, 45 Ark. 505.

(b) For debts contracted.

It is perhaps intimated in Fleming v. Kelly, 18 Colo. App. 23, 69 Pac. 272, and Carroll v. Davidson, 23 La. Ann. 428, that a personal representative would not be even primarily personally liable for debts properly contracted while carrying on a business under order of the court, though neither is full authority to that effect.

In Alexander v. Herring, — Miss. —, 55 So. 360, it was said that if there was any liability under a contract made by the administrator while operating a sawmill under an order of the court which it had no power to make, it was a personal liability, and not a liability of the estate.

As to the allowance from an estate of the expenses incurred by a personal representative while carrying on a trade or business under an order of court, see infra, V. f, 6.

IV. Liability of guardian for carrying on business for benefit of ward.

a. In general.

Where, with the consent of all persons interested in the estate, a guardian carried on a manufacturing business belonging to his ward at a profit, building a necessary warehouse upon land belonging to the wife of his ward, upon the court refusing to allow the guardian the cost thereof, he was allowed rent from the estate for the use of the building. Murphy v. Walker, 131 Mass. 341.

b. For losses sustained.

And a guardian who neglects his ward's farm, and does not cultivate it as a prudent farmer would his own, will be required to make good the loss, as well as the depreciation, where his conduct impoverished the land. Willis v. Fox, 25 Wis. 646.

So, the guardian of an insane person, having no right to carry on a mercantile business belonging to his ward, is individually liable for all losses incurred. Corcoran v. Allen, 11 R. I. 567. But, said the court, had the business been conducted at a profit, undoubtedly the ward would not have been permitted to reap the benefit without discharging the burden.

c. For debts contracted.

It was held in Re Neasmith, 77 C. C. A. 402, 147 Fed. 160, that conceding, for the sake of the argument, that a guardian had no power to involve her ward's estate in a copartnership, she might become individually liable as a partner for the debts of the concern.

So, the conservator of an incompetent person, having no authority to purchase a business for the benefit of his ward, is individually liable for money expended by him for that purpose. Church v. Rosenstein, 85 Conn. 279, 82 Atl. 568.

And debts contracted by a guardian while carrying on a trade or business on behalf of his ward, without authority so to do, are binding upon the former individually, and not upon the estate of the ward. Warren v. Union Bank, 167 N. Y. 259, 43 L.R.A. 256, 68 Am. St. Rep. 777, 51 N. E. 1036, reversing 28 App. Div. 7, 51 N. Y. Supp. 27.

But the committee of a lunatic, when authorized by the court to carry on the latter's business, is not personally liable for supplies purchased, which were not charged to the committee, but in the name under which the lunatic did business, it not appearing that credit was given to the committee, or that he made any false representations as to the position he occupied. Isaacs v. Chinery, 74 L. T. N. S. 320.

As to the allowance from an estate of the expenses incurred by a guardian while carrying on a trade or business for his ward's benefit, see infra, V. f, 4.

d. For profits of business or rental of property embarked or used in business.

A guardian who works a farm belonging to his ward without obtaining a necessary order from the court under a statute permitting it, and who appropriates the proceeds to his own uses, is liable to the ward for the reasonable rental of the land. Parlin v. Webster, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 631, 43 S. W. 569.

Where an executor and the guardian of minor heirs, after the expiration of a partnership in which the testator was a partner, in accordance with the stipulation of the articles of partnership, continue the property of the estate therein, the executor is answerable to the heirs for the profits thereof. Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 240 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Keen, 722, affirmed in 4 Myl. & C. 42, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 177, 3 Jur. 596.

V. Liability of estate for debts contracted and expenses incurred by personal representative or testamentary trustee in carrying on business.

a. When business carried on under testamentary power or that in articles of partnership.

1. Liability of general assets of estate.

A mere testamentary direction to an executor to continue a business belonging to his testator is insufficient to bind the general assets of his estate for trade debts contracted by the former. Alzheimer v. Hunter, 56 Ark. 159, 19 S. W. 496; Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 359; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 44 Hun, 201, rehearing denied in 45 Hun, 589, affirmed without opinion in 112 N. Y. 673, 20 N. E. 416; Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 586, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705.

The creditors in such case can only pursue the assets embarked in the trade at the death of the testatrix. Willis v. Sharp, supra.

Thus, executors who carry on a business by direction of a will cannot bind the estate for money lent them for use therein by a delivery of the title deeds to realty not used in such business. M'Neillie v. Acton, 4 DeG. M. & G. 744, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 11, 17 Jur. 1041, 2 Eq. Rep. 21.

But such mortgage will be valid as to the interest in the realty belonging to one of the executors. Ibid.

An executor, although directed by will to continue a business of the testator, cannot charge the trust estate for debts created by him, unless express power to do so is conferred by will. Steele v. Steele, 64 Ala. 438, 38 Am. Rep. 15.

And directions to an executor to carry on a trade belonging to the testator do not authorize the embarking therein of additional property of the estate. M'Neillie v. Acton, supra.

So, a testamentary direction to continue an interest of a testator in a partnership will not permit the investment by an executor of other funds of the estate therein. Smith v. Ayer, 101 U. S. 320, 25 L. ed. 955.

So, the fact that executors delay the disposal of a testator's interest in a partnership does not warrant an inference of an election by them to continue the estate in trade, as the will permitted them to do, so as to make the testator's estate liable for partnership debts subsequently contracted. Bacon v. Pomeroy, 104 Mass. 577.

While an executor who was empowered by will to conduct a business until a designated person arrived at a certain age might, during such period, bind the estate for money borrowed for use in the business, he could not do so thereafter, since his right to carry on the business terminated when the former became of age. Crooke v. Hume, 139 Ky. 834, 109 S. W. 364.

And the general assets of an estate are not liable for debts contracted by an executor while carrying on a business pursuant to a testamentary direction to conduct some legitimate business for the benefit of the testator's son. Re Sharp, 5 Dem. 518.

But the rule sustained by the weight of authority is that the general assets of an estate will be subject to the payment of debts contracted by an administrator while carrying on a business in behalf of an estate, pursuant to a testamentary direction, where the will shows clearly and unequivocally that it was the intention of the testator that his general assets should be bound therefor. Dimmock v. Dimmock, 52 L. T. N. S. 494; Ferris v. Van Ingen, 110 Ga. 102, 35 S. E. 347; Morrow v. Morrow, 2 Tenn. Ch. 549; Lambert v. Rendle, 3 New Reports, 247; Burwell v. Cawood, 2 How. 572, 11 L. ed. 383; Davis v. Christian, 15 Gratt. 11; Furst v. Armstrong, 202 Pa. 348, 90 Am. St. Rep. 653, 51 Atl. 996; Waddell's Estate, 196 Pa. 294, 46 Atl. 304; Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434; Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 359; Alzheimer v. Hunter, 56 Ark. 159, 19 S. W. 496; Cutbush v. Cutbush, 1 Beav. 184, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 175, 3 Jur. 142.

Such a clear and unequivocal intention to charge the general assets of an estate is shown by a testamentary direction to an executor to sell all of an estate in order to carry on a trade or business (Davis v. Christian, 15 Gratt. 11); or to hold all of a testator's property in trust, in order to apply the income to the support and education of his children, and also to carry on some legitimate business for their benefit, with power to sell or make such other disposition of the real and personal property as the safe conduct of the business should require (Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434).

And a testator's entire estate will be bound for trade debts where an executor was given power to conduct a business for such time as he might deem fit. Furst v. Armstrong, 202 Pa. 348, 90 Am. St. Rep. 653, 51 Atl. 996.

And in Morrow v. Morrow, 2 Tenn. Ch. 549, an estate was held liable for debts contracted by an executor who conducted a business under the terms of a will which declared that all of the testator's property should be responsible for debts contracted by his executor.

So, in Waddell's Estate, 196 Pa. 294, 46 Atl. 304, it was held that an executor might embark the general assets in a business, where he was directed by will to continue a testator's trade of business interests until they could be sold to advantage, in the same manner as the testator might do if living and managing the business.

So, the whole of an estate is bound by debts contracted by an executor, who was the testator's surviving partner, in continuing a partnership business under power to continue such business, make sales, purchase goods, negotiate loans, employ labor, renew and extend existing commercial obligations, make notes and contracts, and to do and perform all other acts necessary to the successful conduct thereof. Ferris v. Van Ingen, 110 Ga. 102, 35 S. E. 347.

And it was held in Blodgett v. American Nat. Bank, 49 Conn. 9, that the general assets of an estate were bound by trade debts contracted after the death of the testator by his executor, who was his surviving partner, and who carried on the partnership business under the provisions of the articles of partnership to the effect that the business should not be dissolved on the testator's death, but that his executor should continue it and act in his stead, and perform all of his stipulations contained in the articles.

And the assets of an estate are answerable for debts contracted by an executor while carrying on a trade or business under testamentary power, where the beneficiaries of the estate did not object to his conduct. Levi's Estate, 224 Pa. 233, 73 Atl. 334.

So, in Crawford v. Hays, 27 Pittab. L. J. 226, it was held that a judgment was properly rendered against an executor, who carried on a business by direction of a will, on a contract made by him, pertaining to the business.

And in Bantz v. Bantz, 52 Md. 686; and Clapp v. Clapp, 10 N. Y. S. R. 733, it was held that the estate, and not an executor who carries on a business by virtue of the terms of a will, is answerable for the trade debts contracted by him.

So, it was held in Reakirt v. Flanagan, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 402, that a creditor might have execution against an estate which had been benefited by goods sold an executor, who was directed by will to carry on a business and who was unable to pay such debts.

And it was held in Hankey v. Hammond, Buck, Bankr. 210, that if the trade assets were insufficient to pay the debts created by an executor who carried on a business under authority conferred by will, they were payable from the general assets of the estate.

It was held in Laughlin v. Lorenz, 48 Pa. 275, 86 Am. Dec. 592, that where neither the covenants of articles of copartnership nor the provisions of a will permitting an executor to continue a trade or business limited the fund to be made liable for the contracts of the executor in carrying on the business, the testator's general estate was liable therefor.

But the general assets of an estate are not bound by trade debts contracted by an executor who carried on a business under a testamentary direction contained in the will of a married woman, to the effect that the executor, her husband, should, after her death, continue a mercantile business belonging to her, so long as he should remain sober and of good habits, so as properly to conduct it. Saperstein v. Ullman, 49 App.

Div. 446, 63 N. Y. Supp. 626 (two judges dissenting, however, on the ground that the will was sufficient to render the assets embarked in the business liable at least), affirmed in 168 N. Y. 636, 61 N. E. 553, Vann, J., dissenting for the same reason.

And an executor cannot bind an estate for supplies furnished for working a plantation which he carried on under testamentary authority to retain all of the testator's property in his hands until the former's youngest child became of age, and also to cultivate the lands of the estate, and to apply the proceeds, after the payment of the necessary expenses, to the support and education of the children of the testator, and to devote the surplus to the purchasing of negroes and other property, since the power conferred upon the executor justified the use of the income only for the purposes specified. Hagan v. Barksdale, 44 Miss. 186.

So, a mortgage cannot be enforced where given by executors on lands of their testator, in order to obtain money with which to pay a judgment rendered against them personally for goods purchased by them while carrying on a business under testamentary authority to do so as long as they should judge it best for the estate, notwithstanding the mortgage was authorized by a court of chancery. Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 359.

And an executor cannot be held liable in his representative capacity for coal furnished him for the operation of a manufacturing plant he managed under testamentary power to continue it for ten years from the death of the testator, and to use the capital then invested as well as the proceeds and profits of the business, since no authority to bind the general assets of the estate was thereby conferred upon him. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 44 Hun, 201, rehearing denied in 45 Hun, 589, affirmed without opinion in 112 N. Y. 673, 20 N. E. 416.

Nor may a judgment for goods purchased by an executor for use in a business carried on by him under the terms of a will be rendered against him in his representative capacity, under a statute permitting actions to be maintained against executors and administrators as such except it is sought to charge them personally, since the executor is personally liable. Ibid.

Nor are the general assets of an estate liable for the payment of trade debts created by an executor who was empowered by will to continue a partnership business after the death of the testator. Pitkin v. Pitkin, 7 Conn. 307, 18 Am. Dec. 111.

And the general assets of an estate are not bound by debts contracted by an executor who joined in the management of a partnership business with the surviving partner, since testamentary directions to manage the testator's estate and to convey it at discretion, without reference to such partnership, was insufficient to permit him to join in carrying on such business. Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ligon, 59 Miss. 305, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So, securities belonging to an estate cannot be pledged by an executor who was authorized by will to retain the testator's interest in a partnership, for debts created subsequent to the death of the testator. Smith v. Ayer, 101 U. S. 320, 25 L. ed. 955.

And directions in a will to carry on a business with the testator's surviving partner do not authorize the executor to borrow money therefor, and mortgage the realty of the estate to secure its payment. Smith v. Smith, 13 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 81.

As to the liability of the general assets of an estate for debts contracted by a personal representative while carrying on a trade or business without testamentary authority, see infra, V. b.

And as to the liability of the assets of an estate where a trade or business is carried on under a statutory power, or by virtue of an order of court, see infra, V. c, d, e; or by a guardian, supra, IV.

As to the power of a personal representative to mortgage trade assets, see infra, V. a, 2.

2. Liability of assets embarked in trade.

A person who extends credit to an executor while carrying on a trade or business on behalf of an estate is entitled to satisfaction of his claim from the assets embarked by the testator in such trade or business, which is a remedy in addition to the individual liability of the executor. Altheimer v. Hunter, 56 Ark. 159, 19 S. W. 496; Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 359; Barber v. Murphy, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 236, 62 S. W. 894; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 44 Hun, 201, rehearing denied in 45 Hun, 589, affirmed without opinion in 112 N. Y. 673, 20 N. E. 416; Boulle v. Tompkins, 5 Redf. 472; Re Hickey, 34 Misc. 360, 69 N. Y. Supp. 844; Re Sharp, 5 Dem. 516; Froelich v. Froelich Trading Co. 120 N. C. 39, 26 S. E. 647; Wadsworth, H. & Co. v. Arnold, 24 R. I. 32, 51 Atl. 1041; Morrow v. Morrow, 2 Tenn. Ch. 559; Burwell v. Cawood, 2 How. 572, 11 L. ed. 383; Jones v. Walker, 103 U. S. 444, 26 L. ed. 404; Owens v. Delamere L. R. 15 Eq. 134, 27 L. T. N. S. 647, 42 L. J. Ch. N. S. 232, 21 Week. Rep. 219; Thompson v. Andrews, 2 L. J. Ch. N. S. 46, 1 Myl. & K. 116; Ex parte Richardson, 3 Madd. Ch. 138, Buck, Bankr. 202, 18 Revised Rep. 204; Ex parte Garland, 10 Ves. Jr. 110, 1 Smith, 220, 7 Revised Rep. 352; Cutbush v. Cutbush, 1 Beav. 184, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 175, 3 Jur. 142.

Thus, it was said in Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434, that a testamentary power to carry on a trade or business belonging to a testator, or to continue his interest in a firm of which he was a member, without anything more, amounts to authority to do so with the fund already invested at the time of the death of the testator, and to subject such fund only, and not the general assets of his estate, to the hazards of the trade.

The expenses of cultivating a crop are a charge upon the income therefrom, where an executor carries on a farming business by virtue of a testamentary command. Hardee v. Cheatham, 52 Miss. 41.

So, only the assets embarked in the trade at the testator's death are answerable for trade debts contracted by an executor who was directed by will to conduct some legitimate business for the benefit of the testator's sons. Re Sharp, 5 Dem. 516.

And the assets embarked in a business may be bound by an executor who was also a surviving partner, for money borrowed for use therein, where he was empowered by will to continue such business not exceeding three years, until it could be sold to advantage. Barber v. Murphy, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 286, 62 S. W. 894.

So, it has been held that realty upon which a business is carried on under a testamentary power may be mortgaged by an executor to secure the payment of money borrowed for use in such business, since such realty is to be regarded as a trade asset. Devitt v. Kearney, Ir. L. R. 13 Eq. 45.

And such a mortgage has been sustained under testamentary direction to an executor to carry on the testator's business, and to employ therein all the capital invested, and to increase the capital, if necessary, as if he were absolutely entitled thereto. Dimmock v. Dimmock, 52 L. T. N. S. 494.

So, a testamentary trustee may mortgage the realty upon which a commercial business is conducted in order to secure the payment of money borrowed by him for use therein, where he was empowered by will to conduct, manage, and control the business and investments of an estate as he might see fit. Roberts v. Hale, 124 Iowa, 296, 99 N. W. 1075, 1 Ann. Cas. 940.

As to the power of a personal representative to mortgage the general assets of an estate to secure trade debts, see supra, V. a, 1.

Where an executor, who carried on a business under the terms of a will, gave a note to one who extended him credit in the name of the concern, signed by him as manager, the executor, as well as the trade assets, is liable therefor. Froelich v. Froelich Trading Co. 120 N. C. 39, 26 S. E. 647.

But it was held in Fairland v. Percy L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 217, 32 L. T. N. S. 405, 44 L. J. Prob. N. S. 11, 23 Week. Rep. 597, that a creditor must proceed against an executor individually to collect such a trade debt before resorting to the trade assets.

In some cases it is held that a creditor must resort to an equitable action in order to subject the trade assets to the satisfaction of an indebtedness contracted by an executor who carries on a business under a testamentary direction. See infra, VII.

As to the liability of the assets embarked in trade or business for debts contracted by a personal representative while carrying 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) on a business without testamentary authority, see infra, V. b, 1.

3. Liability where business is carried on by administrator c. t. a. or d. b. n.

It was held on Schlickman v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 139 Ky. 268, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 264, 129 S. W. 823, that an administrator de bonis non could not bind an estate for money borrowed for use in a business carried on by him under power conferred on an executor to manage, without giving bond, the testator's business in the same manner as if he were living, and leaving to the executor's discretion whether he should continue the business.

But, on the other hand, it was held in Palmer v. Moore, 82 Ga. 177, 14 Am. St. Rep. 147, 8 S. E. 180, that an estate could be bound by an administrator de bonis non for necessary farm supplies, where he worked it under power directing an executor to keep an estate together and manage it so long as profitable or advantageous to do so, since by statute, an administrator de bonis non was clothed with all the powers of an executor, excepting those manifestly arising from a purely personal trust and confidence.

And in Brannon v. Ober & Sons Co. 106 Ga. 168, 32 S. E. 16, it was held that an administrator d. b. n. was relieved from personal liability for debts contracted while conducting the testator's plantation under a will providing that the executor should keep together his property during the widowhood of his wife, and purchase any property deemed necessary for the estate.

In Fairland v. Percy, supra, it was held that creditors must first proceed against a widow, who became administrator de bonis non of her husband's estate, for the collection of trade debts contracted by her while carrying on a business under testamentary power conferred on the executor to carry on a business during the lifetime of the testator's widow, for her benefit.

b. When personal representative or guardian not empowered to carry on business.

1. Liability of general assets of estate.

The general assets of an estate are not answerable for debts contracted by a personal representative while carrying on a trade or business belonging to an estate without authority to do so. Re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 Pac. 86; Florsheim Bros. v. Holt, 32 La. Ann. 133; Miltnerberger v. Taylor, 23 La. Ann. 188; Carroll v. Davidson, 23 La. Ann. 428; Frey v. Eisenhardt, 116 Mich. 160, 74 N. W. 501; Avery v. Myers, 60 Miss. 367; Hardee v. Cheatham, 52 Miss. 41; Re United States Mortg. & T. Co. 114 App. Div. 532, 100 N. Y. Supp. 12; Farrelly v. Schaettler, 121 App. Div. 678, 106 N. Y. Supp. 445; Re Tisdale, 110 App. Div. 857, 97 N. Y. Supp. 494; Re Sharp, 5 Dem. 516; Lucht v. Behrens, 28 Ohio St. 231, 22 Am. Rep. 378; Corr's Es- tate, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 209; McMahan v. Harbert, 35 Tex. 451; Labouchere v. Tupper, 11 Moore, P. C. C. 108, 5 Week. Rep. 797, Lovell v. Gibson, 19 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 280.

Thus, an executor who operates a mill without being empowered by will to do so cannot bind the estate for permanent repairs and new machinery necessary in order to carry it on at a profit. Re Tisdale, 110 App. Div. 857, 97 N. Y. Supp. 494.

So, the general estate of a decedent is not answerable for money borrowed by the executor to carry on, without authority, a business belonging to it. Lucht v. Behrens, 28 Ohio St. 231, 22 Am. Rep. 378.

And the general assets of an estate are not answerable for expenses incurred in carrying on a farming business by a personal representative, without authority. Sparrow's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 690, 2 So. 501; Florsheim Bros. v. Holt, 32 La. Ann. 133; Hardee v. Cheatham, 52 Miss. 41; McMahon v. Harbert, 35 Tex. 451.

So, an estate is not bound by debts created by a partnership of which a decedent was a member, where his executor, without authority, participated in the management thereof. Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ligon, 59 Miss. 305; Avery v. Myers, 60 Miss. 367.

And an estate is not liable for money borrowed by an executor, who was not empowered to continue the business, for the benefit of a partnership of which the testator was a member. Johnson v. Kellogg, 26 N. Y. Week. Dig. 467, 8 N. Y. S. R. 413.

So, the request of an executor that goods be furnished a partnership in which his testator was a member does not bind the latter's estate, notwithstanding the executor promised that they should be paid for as soon as the estate was settled. Richter v. Poppenhausen, 42 N. Y. 373, affirming 57 Barb. 309.

And it was held in Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ligon, supra, that the interest of a deceased partner in firm property was not liable for debts created by an administrator while carrying on such business.

So, debts contracted by a partnership after the death of a member are not binding on his estate, where the business was carried on without authority, jointly by his executor and the surviving partner. Alsop v. Mather, 8 Conn. 584, 21 Am. Dec. 703.

So, an executor, de son tort who took possession of a business belonging to a deceased person and carried it on, cannot bind the estate by a lease made by him for a building in which the business was conducted. Grace v. Seibert, 235 Ill. 190, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 301, 85 N. E. 308.

And a testamentary trustee who was empowered by will to invest and keep invested, in his discretion, a trust fund, by purchasing, opening, and operating a coal mine commits a breach of trust; and a person who, with notice of such perversion of the trust fund, loans the former money with which to carry on such business, cannot recover from such fund. Butler v. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Butler, 164 Ill. 171, 45 N. E. 426, affirming 61 Ill. App. 51.

As to the allowance as a cost of administration, from an estate, of expenses incurred by a personal representative or guardian while carrying on a trade or business, see infra, V. f.

2. Liability of assets embarked in business.

Only the assets embarked in a trade or business, or those resulting therefrom, are answerable for debts contracted by an administrator in carrying on the business. Frey v. Eisenhardt, 116 Mich. 160, 74 N. W. 501. The court said that this is so even when the executor or administrator is authorized to carry on the business, though in that case there was no such authority.

And one who furnished supplies to an administrator so that he was able to sow a crop upon a plantation belonging to an estate may enforce a claim therefor on the crop when grown, where such business was carried on with the concurrence of the widow of the deceased and a majority of heirs interested in the estate. Maxwell-Yerger Co. v. Rogan, 125 La. 1, 51 So. 48.

Notwithstanding an estate is not liable for debts created by an administrator in conducting a business belonging to the estate, yet he may pay them from the income thereof, although he will be answerable if by so doing a loss results to the estate. Re Rose, 80 Cal. 166, 22 Pac. 86.

It was held in Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ligon, 59 Miss. 305, that the trade assets of a business were not answerable for debts contracted by an executor who carried on a partnership business without authority.

As to the allowance as a cost of administration, from an estate, of expenses incurred by a personal representative or guardian in carrying on a business, see infra, V. f.

c. When business carried on under statute.

In Texas, it has been held that an estate would be liable for debts contracted by an executor in carrying on a business under the terms of a will, where by statute an executor or administrator is permitted to continue a business belonging to a decedent, and bind the estate by contracts pertaining thereto. Primm v. Mensing Bros. 14 Tex. Civ. App. 395, 38 S. W. 382; McMillan v. Hendricks, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 46 S. W. 859.

So, the expense of caring for and gathering a copy by a personal representative is by statute in Alabama a charge upon the general estate of a decedent who dies after the beginning of a year. Pinckard v. Pinckard, 24 Ala. 250.

And where a statute permits an administrator to procure indispensable labor for care of live stock belonging to an estate, he may bind the estate by a contract for their board until the ensuing term of the probate court, and no longer, unless empowered by such court to do so. Powell v. Powell, 23 Mo. App. 365.

So, an estate may be bound for supplies purchased to carry on a business belonging to it where a personal representative conducted it under a statute permitting him to carry on a plantation, manufactory, or business of a deceased person when not disposed of by will, or required for the immediate payment of debts. Reinstein v. Smith, 65 Tex. 247; Altgelt v. Oliver Bros. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 86 S. W. 28.

And the estate is bound for necessary services rendered by a person in carrying on such business. Altgelt v. Oliver Bros. supra.

But since an executor is not permitted by such statute to carry on a partnership business in which his testator was interested, he cannot bind the estate for debts contracted after the death of the testator while carrying on such business. Altgelt v. Alamo Nat. Bank, 98 Tex. 252, 83 S. W. 6.

So, the general assets of an estate are not bound for debts for supplies furnished a personal representative in order to make a farm crop, notwithstanding he was duly empowered by the court to cultivate a decedent's land under a statute permitting it, since the creditor's only remedy was a lien on the crops and their proceeds. Farley v. Hord, 45 Miss. 102; Emanuel v. Norcum, 7 How. (Miss.) 150.

But where the proceeds of the crop have been appropriated for the payment of the debts of the deceased, such creditors are entitled to payment from other funds of the estate, even though the estate is insolvent, since it was benefited by a fund which rightfully belonged to such creditors. Emanuel v. Norcum, supra.

And an estate is chargeable for the amount of a note given by an executor, while carrying on a farming business belonging to his testator for feed for live stock, where a subsequently enacted statute validated all contracts made in good faith by executors for labor or services rendered for the benefit of an estate. Brightwell v. Jordan, 74 Ga. 486.

As to the allowance from an estate as a cost of administration, of the expenses incurred by a personal representative while carrying on a trade or business under statutory authority, see infra, V. f, 5.

d. When business carried on under order of court.

An administrator who, under an order of court, for the purpose of paying the debts of his intestate, carried on a plantation business for the year in which the latter died, may pledge the crops for advances made him in order to carry on the work. Starling v. Wyatt, — Miss. —, 27 So. 526.

But it was held in Altheimer v. Hunter, 56 Ark. 159, 19 S. W. 496, that an administrator who continued a mercantile business under an order of the probate court could not bind the assets of the estate for goods purchased, since such order, if the court had authority to make it, amounted only to a power equal to that contained in a will, which would permit creditors to resort only to the assets embarked in trade.

And it was held in Gordon-Tiger Min. & Reduction Co. v. Loomer, 50 Colo. 409, 115 Pac. 717, that an administrator who, under authority from the probate court to continue a business and replenish a stock of merchandise as necessity might require in order to make the whole stock more salable, carried it on more than four years, could not borrow money for use in the business and bind the estate therefor, since the power conferred on the administrator was not sufficient for that purpose.

As to the allowance as a cost of administration, of expenses incurred by a personal representative while carrying on a trade or business under an order of court, see infra, V. f, 6.

e. When business carried on by guardian.

A mortgage upon the real property of a ward to secure debts contracted by a guardian while carrying on a business belonging to the former cannot be authorized under a statute permitting the court to authorize such a mortgage where the personality and income from the real estate of a ward are insufficient for the payment of his debts or the maintenance or education of the ward or his family. Warren v. Union Bank, 157 N. Y. 259, 43 L.R.A. 256, 68 Am. St. Rep. 777, 51 N. E. 1036, reversing 28 App. Div. 7, 51 N. Y. Supp. 27.

And as a court of probate is without authority to authorize a guardian to embark his ward's estate in a mercantile business, the estate is not responsible for goods furnished the guardian for use therein. Harter v. Miller, 67 Kan. 468, 73 Pac. 74.

As to the allowance from an estate as costs of administration, of expenses incurred by a guardian while carrying on a trade or business, see infra, V. f, 4.

f. Allowance of expenses of business as costs of administration.

1. In general.

It was held in Newton v. Poole, 12 Leigh, 112, that where a testator went abroad, leaving his wife as his agent to manage his business and carry on a brick manufactory, and upon his death abroad, she completed all brick begun before his death, which, together with all the stock on hand, she sold before qualifying as executor, she will be allowed all expenses incurred in so doing.

And an administrator who rechartered a ferry which belonged to his intestate was allowed the expenses of operating it, where he was charged with the rents and profits therefrom. Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1.

But an administrator who, under an unauthorized order of the probate court, borrows money for the use of a partnership of which his decedent was a member, cannot have the amount thereof allowed on final accounting, where the conduct of the business resulted in a loss. Tompkins v. Weeks, 26 Cal. 50.

And the father of an intestate, who took possession of a business and carried it on for about a year before obtaining letters of administration, is not entitled, on accounting, to an allowance for money advanced by him to purchase merchandise for the business. McKee v. Mobley, 3 S. C. 242.

As to the individual liability of a personal representative who carries on a trade or business without authority, see supra, III. c. 2.

2. Of farming business.

The expenses of caring for and harvesting crops growing upon the lands of a decedent will be allowed an executor or administrator from the estate. Re Wing, 132 Iowa, 216, 109 N. W. 710; Wattles v. Hyde, 9 Conn. 10; Sullivan v. Tuck, 1 Md. Ch. 59; Lee v. Lee, 6 Gill & J. 318; Re Turpin, 7 Ohio N. P. 569, 5 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 410; Sparrow's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 696, 2 So. 501; Jaquett's Estate, 13 Lanc. Bar 13; Casner's Estate, 2 Kulp, 474; Percival v. Herbeumont, 1 McMull. L. 59.

And an administrator who carefully and prudently cultivates and harvests a crop planted by his intestate is entitled to an allowance for the expenses incurred in doing so, to be paid from the proceeds of the crops. Worley's Succession, 40 La. Ann. 622, 4 So. 570.

In Worley's Succession, supra, it was said that such expenses would be paid from the proceeds of the crops raised by the administrator.

So, an administrator who employs labor in gathering a growing crop on decedent's farm, which was sold for the benefit of the heirs, is entitled to credit for the expense of the labor. Re Turpin, 7 Ohio N. P. 569, 5 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 410.

And where an administrator expends a large sum in good faith for necessary plowing, cultivating, pruning, and irrigating of a vineyard, advancing the necessary funds therefor, he will be credited on accounting with the income therefrom, which was less than the expenses, since he was not engaging in business in the usual meaning of the term. Re Smith, 118 Cal. 462, 50 Pac. 701.

So, an administrator will be allowed the expense of caring for a large number of cattle, sheep, etc., belonging to an insolvent estate. Re Fernandez, 119 Cal. 579, 51 Pac. 851.

And an executor who had, as agent, before the death of his intestate, sowed a crop upon a plantation owned by the latter, and had continued to work the plantation during the current season, will be allowed the necessary disbursement, where it did 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not appear that the plantation could have been advantageously leased after the testator's death, and that it was for the best interest of the creditors and the distributees to make a crop, and no objection to his doing so was made until after the crop had been materially damaged. Wederstrandt's Succession, 19 La. Ann. 494. The court said that the parties opposing such allowance had their remedy, but chose to remain silent and acquiesce in the course pursued by the executor; and the fact that he did not call a meeting of the creditors of the estate, as required by statute, could not throw upon him all the expenses incurred in good faith, and at the same time make him pay over the proceeds of the crops.

So, an administrator may work the land of an intestate with slaves belonging to the estate, and will be allowed all necessary expenses thereof, except for losses due to gross neglect, where he fairly accounts for the crops raised. Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1.

And it was said in Byrd v. Wells, 40 Miss. 711, that undoubtedly an executor who kept the property of an estate together for several years, and worked a plantation belonging to it, would be entitled to an allowance for slaves hired by him to work thereon, where the estate received the benefit of their services.

So, the expense of carrying on a farming business will be allowed an executor where those interested in the estate assented to his doing so. Larroux v. Larroux, 2 Redf. 69.

See also Wederstrandt's Succession, infra, IX.

As to estoppel in general, see infra, IX.

But, as it is not an administrator's duty to gather crops other than those ready at the death of his intestate, he will not be allowed the expense of gathering a fall crop, which apparently was sold without condition that the purchaser was to harvest it. Casner's Estate, 2 Kulp, 474.

And the expense of operating a farm of a decedent by his executor without testamentary authority will not be allowed him unless he clearly shows that it resulted beneficially to the estate. Larroux v. Larroux, supra.

As to the individual liability of a personal representative for debts contracted in carrying on a farming business without authority, see supra, III. c. 2 (c).

3. Of winding up business.

Expenses necessarily incurred by a personal representative in closing out a business will be allowed him. Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150; Re Semple, 189 Pa. 385, 42 Atl. 28, reversing 28 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 431; Cornwell v. Deck, 2 Redf. 87, affirmed on other points in 8 Hun, 122.

So, rent paid for a hotel building by an executor, to whom was bequeathed a half interest in the personal property therein, will be allowed him, where, for more than a year, in good faith, he carried on at a loss, until it could be sold to advantage, a hotel business which was a losing venture during the lifetime of the testator. Merritt v. Merritt, 62 Mo. 150.

And the expense of a clerk employed to sell the goods in a country store will be allowed an administrator, where it did not appear that his conduct in carrying on the business was injudicious, or resulted in a loss to the estate, but was an exercise of fair discretion and judgment, and the interests of the estate, as well as if its creditors, were thereby best subserved rather than by a forced sale. Cornwell v. Deck, 2 Redf. 87, affirmed on other points in 8 Hun, 122.

But if continued for an unreasonable period after it does not pay, the administrator will not be allowed expenses incurred after the business should have been closed. Re Vida, 1 Haw. 89.

And an administrator who advances money to aid in carrying on a partnership business of which his intestate was a member cannot be allowed it as an expense of administration, since it was no part of his duty to aid in conducting such business. Tompkins v. Weeks, 26 Cal. 50.

As to the right of a personal representative to indemnity from an estate for expenses incurred in winding up a trade or business, see infra, VI.

4. Of business carried on by guardian.

It was held in Scarborough v. Scarborough, 44 La. Ann. 288, 10 So. 858, that debts contracted by a tutor while carrying on a mercantile and planting business belonging to minors, with the consent of the heirs of the decedent, will be allowed as a debt against the succession.

And in Re Cameron, 158 Mich. 174, 122 N. W. 564, it was held that a guardian who farms his ward's land at profit will be allowed the necessary expenses of so doing.

And where it did not appear that the estate had suffered any loss, a guardian will be allowed for expenses necessarily incurred in working his ward's farm, under a statute declaring that a guardian shall improve his ward's estate, and apply the income and profits to the latter's support. Remington v. Field, 16 R. I. 509, 17 Atl. 551.

So, an order of a probate court possessing equity powers, directing a guardian to invest his wards' money, without designating the amount, in completing an unfinished distillery, according to their interest therein, justifies the expenditure of a reasonable amount, and an administrator of the estate of the wards' parent, who advances the necessary amount upon the request of the guardian, will be allowed the amount thereof in the settlement of the estate. Powell v. North, 3 Ind. 392, 56 Am. Dec. 513.

As to the individual liability of a guardian for debts contracted while carrying 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) on a trade or business on behalf of his ward, see supra, IV. c.

5. Of business carried on under statute.

Indebtedness incurred by an administrator while carrying on a plantation business under an order of a court, granted under a statute, may be allowed and retained by him from the estate, notwithstanding the business resulted in a loss which was not due to his fault. Stephens v. James, 77 Ga. 139, 3 S. E. 160; Harding v. Evans, 3 Port. (Ala.) 221, 29 Am. Dec. 255.

So, where a farming business was carried on by a personal representative under statutory authority, expenses incurred will be allowed him from the estate. Ibid.

By an Alabama statute, a personal representative who works the plantation of a decedent who dies after the first of the year will be allowed all necessary expenses of caring for and gathering the crops. Loeb v. Richardson, 74 Ala. 311; Pinckard v. Pinckard, 24 Ala. 250; Taylor v. Bush, 75 Ala. 432; Eubank v. Clark, 78 Ala. 73; Naftel v. Osborn, 96 Ala. 623, 12 So. 182.

And he will be allowed such expenses notwithstanding they largely exceed the profits, by reason of the destruction of the crops by natural causes. Taylor v. Bush, 75 Ala. 432.

So, an administrator who cultivates a plantation under an order of court made under a statute permitting the assets of a decedent to be kept together and managed by his personal representative for a term not exceeding ten years will be allowed the cost of erecting buildings necessary for the successful carrying on of the business. Gerard v. Bunkley, 17 Ala. 170.

And an administrator may bind an estate for the board of live stock belonging to it until the next term of the probate court, under a statute permitting him to procure indispensable labor or care for live stock belonging to an estate. Powell v. Powell, 23 Mo. App. 365.

And where an administrator is authorized by a court to sell a stock of merchandise in the usual course of trade, under a statute permitting sales of personal property by administrators, all necessary expenses connected with the business will be allowed him. Re Osburn, 36 Or. 8, 58 Pac. 521.

But the salary of clerks and bookkeepers, or the cost of drayage, will not be allowed an administrator who carried on a business under a void order of a court, made under a statute permitting the court, in its discretion, to order the private sale of a stock of goods, wares, or merchandise of a decedent upon terms and conditions made known to the court, since such statute authorized only a sale in bulk, and not one in the ordinary course of trade. Tell City Furniture Co. v. Stiles, 60 Miss. 849.

As to the individual liability of a personal representative for debts contracted while carrying on a trade or business under statutory authority, see supra, III. c. 5.

6. Of business carried on under order of court.

Where, in order to close a manufacturing business, it was carried on under an order of the probate court for three years, at a profit, the administrator was allowed from the estate the costs of necessary materials purchased in order to carry on the business. Fleming v. Kelly, 18 Colo. App. 23, 69 Pac. 272.

So, where special authority is obtained from the court to carry on a plantation business during the time necessary for the settlement of an estate, the estate is liable for the current expenses. Carroll v. Davidson, 23 La. Ann. 428.

And debts and expenses contracted by a personal representative while carrying on a business, in order to close it up as speedily as possible, under an order of a court, will be allowed from the estate. Fleming v. Kelly and Carroll v. Davidson, supra.

But, on the contrary, it was held in Milner v. Didisheim, 95 Ill. App. 321, that an administrator, and not the estate he represented, became individually liable for goods purchased for a business carried on by the administrator under the order of the probate court, unless the creditor agreed to look to the estate for his pay.

And a charge for money borrowed by an administrator for the use of a partnership of which his intestate was a member, which he did under a void order of the probate court, will not be allowed him on final accounting, where the business was conducted at a loss. Tompkins v. Weeks, 26 Cal. 50.

So, expenses of carrying on a business will not be allowed an administrator when incurred under a void order of the court. Tell City Furniture Co. v. Stiles, 60 Miss. 849.

As to the individual liability of a personal representative for debts contracted while carrying on a trade or business under an order of court, see supra, III. c, 6 (b).

7. Of business carried on under testamentary power.

An executor will be allowed from an estate for the expenses of conducting a business, notwithstanding it resulted in a loss, where he was empowered by will to continue the testator's business for the benefit of the latter's widow during her lifetime, and he collected accounts due at the time of the testator's death, and used the proceeds in the business, which could not be successfully carried on without money, since it was clearly the testator's intention that they should be so used. Boulle v. Tompkins, 5 Redf. 472.

So, expenses of ordinary repairs to the buildings of an estate in which a trade or business is carried on by a personal representative were allowed an executor who was empowered by will to conduct a business and to pay all necessary expenses and charges pertaining thereto. Re Jones, 103 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

N. Y. 621, 57 Am. Rep. 775, 9 N. E. 493, affirming 37 Hun, 430, and 2 Dem. 602.

And this doctrine was applied in Boulle v. Tompkins, supra, where a mercantile business was carried on by an executor, pursuant to a testamentary direction.

And it has been held that expenses necessarily incurred by a personal representative while carrying on a farming business belonging to an estate, pursuant to the command of a will, are chargeable against the estate. Guthrie v. Wheeler, 51 Conn. 207; Bantz v. Bantz, 52 Md. 686; Johnson v. Henagan, 11 S. C. 93; Allen v. Shanks, 90 Tenn. 359, 16 S. W. 715.

Thus, an executor who managed a farm devised to him by will for sale, and who charged himself with the proceeds of all crops raised, will be allowed the cost of fertilizer purchased and used thereon. Bantz v. Bantz, 52 Md. 686.

And an executor who worked a plantation as directed by will will be allowed the necessary expenses of cultivating it and gathering the crops therefrom. Johnson v. Henagan, 11 S. C. 93.

So, an executor to whom the testator gave his property absolutely, subject to certain trusts, who purchased stock for decedent's farm, and from the income therefrom paid the legacies (such purchase being reasonable under the circumstances), will be allowed from the income for hay bought to feed the stock. Guthrie v. Wheeler, 51 Conn. 207.

And an executor may, under power contained in the will to manage and control an estate until a designated person becomes of age, rebuild a necessary ginhouse upon the plantation from the proceeds of crops raised, without obtaining an order of court therefor. Henry v. Henderson, 81 Miss. 743, 63 L.R.A. 616, 33 So. 960.

And an executor will be allowed the expenses of operating, in a prudent manner, a farm, under a testamentary direction, at a loss, during a period of great depression. Allen v. Shanks, 90 Tenn. 359, 16 S. W. 715.

But an executor who works a plantation, as directed by will, cannot be allowed the cost of slaves, a brood mare, and other property purchased for use thereon. Johnson v. Henagan, supra.

And expenses incurred in carrying on a business after the period fixed by will for doing so cannot be allowed an executor. Allen v. Shanks, supra.

VI. Right of personal representative to indemnity from estate for debts contracted.

Ordinarily an executor who is individually liable for debts contracted by him while carrying on a trade or business by virtue of a testamentary direction will be indemnified from the testator's estate. Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224; Alzheimer v. Hunter, 56 Ark. 159, 19 S. W. 496; Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 369; Laible v. Ferry, 32 N. J. Eq. 791, reversing 31 N. J. Eq. 566, s. c. 27 N. J. Eq. 146; Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434; Re Frith [1902] 1 Ch. 342, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 199, 86 L. T. N. S. 212; Moore v. M'Glynn [1904] 1 I. R. 334; Re Hodges [1899] 1 I. R. 480; Braun v. Braun, 14 Manitoba L. Rep. 346.

So, an executor who, for the purpose of profit, carried on for two years a business, as empowered by will, as well as by leave of court, and the assent of all the testator's creditors, is entitled to indemnity out of the estate in preference to such creditors, for trade debts incurred by him. Re Hodges [1899] 1 I. R. 480.

And where a business is carried on by direction of a will as well as by the consent of the testator's creditors, the executor is entitled to indemnity from the general assets of the estate for debts he contracts, in preference to their right to have their claims allowed as preferred debts. Dowse v. Gorton [1891] A. C. 190, 60 L. J. Ch. N. S. 745, 64 L. T. N. S. 809, 40 Week. Rep. 17, modifying L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 536; Frisby v. Owen, 66 L. T. N. S. 718.

And it was held in Re Brooke [1894] 2 Ch. 600, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 21, 8 Reports, 444, 71 L. T. N. S. 398, that an administrator who, for three years, with the consent of the testator's creditors, as well as by direction of the will, carried on a business for the benefit of the estate, is entitled to indemnity from the general assets of the estate for liabilities incurred by him if he is not indebted to the estate.

So, while an administrator is personally liable for debts contracted while carrying on a farming business under a statute, he is entitled to indemnity from the estate which came into his hands. Harding v. Evans, 3 Port. (Ala.) 221, 29 Am. Dec. 255.

And it was said in Ex parte Yates, 72 L. T. 823; that an executor who carried on a trade or business without testamentary authority, in order to wind it up, was entitled to indemnity from the estate for all expenses incurred while so engaged, irrespective of the assent to or sanction of his conduct by the testator's creditors.

And it was held in Re Johnson, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 548, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 745, 43 L. T. N. S. 372, 29 Week. Rep. 168, that an executor was entitled to indemnity only from the specific assets directed by will to be employed in a business. To the same effect, see Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 359.

An executor who, without testamentary authority, conducted a hotel business in order to preserve its license and effect a sale of the business, continually advertising the business for sale, is entitled to indemnity from the estate for a resulting loss, since it will be considered as an expense of administration, even against such of the testator's creditors as acquiesced in the executor continuing such business. Wright v. Beatty, 2 Alberta L. Rep. 89.

And the interest of one cestui que trust who concurred in the continuance of a mercantile business by an executor in defiance of the commands of a will is answerable for 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

indemnity to a testamentary trustee who becomes liable to the estate for losses sustained. Booth v. Booth, 1 Beav. 125, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 39, 2 Jur. 938.

But an executrix who was sole legatee, and who, without being empowered by will, carried on the testator's business for her own benefit, and not for the purpose of winding it up, is not entitled to indemnity from the estate as against the testator's creditors, who did not consent to her conduct. Ex parte Yates, 72 L. T. 823.

As to the right of one who extends credit to a personal representative while carrying on a trade or business on behalf of an estate, to be subrogated to the latter's right of indemnity from the estate, see infra, VII.

VII. Right of creditors to subrogation to personal representatives's right of indemnity.

Some cases hold that one who extends credit to an executor for the benefit of a business carried on by him under testamentary authority may be subrogated to the executor's right of indemnity which he has against the testator's estate for the personal liability assumed by him. Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224; Moore v. M'Glynn [1904] 1 I. R. 334; Re Johnson, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 548, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 745, 43 L. T. N. S. 372, 29 Week. Rep. 168; Re Frith [1902] 1 Ch. 342, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 199, 86 L. T. N. S. 212; Re Kidd, 70 L. T. N. S. 648, 8 Reports, 261, 42 Week. Rep. 571; Braun v. Braun, 14 Manitoba L. Rep. 346.

And a court of equity will subrogate a creditor to the executor's right of indemnity, where such was the agreement between them. Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224.

So, where an executor carried on a business as directed by will, to which the testator's general creditors assented, those who extend credit to the executor for expenses incurred by him in continuing the business will be subrogated to his right of indemnity, which will, under the circumstances, extend to the testator's whole estate. Frisby v. Owen, 66 L. T. N. S. 718.

But in Boule v. Tompkins, 5 Redf. 472, the right of a creditor to subrogation was limited to the assets authorized to be employed in a business by an executor.

But a creditor will not be entitled to subrogation if the executor is in default to the estate. Foxworth v. White, 72 Ala. 224; Re Johnson, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 548, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 745, 43 L. T. N. S. 372, 29 Week. Rep. 168; Re Frith [1902] 1 Ch. 342, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 199, 86 L. T. N. S. 212; Moore v. M'Glynn [1904] 1 I. R. 334.

VIII. Equitable rights of creditors.

It has been held that equity will hold an estate liable for debts contracted by a personal representative while carrying on a trade or business on behalf of an estate which received a benefit from the extension of such credit. McMahan v. Harbert, 35 Tex. 451; Moore v. Lampkin, 63 Ga. 748; Robert v. Tift, 60 Ga. 566.

And one who extends credit to an executor who is carrying on a trade or business pursuant to the directions of a will may, in the first instance, without proceeding against the executor, subject the trade assets and the profits of the business to the satisfaction of his claim. Ferry v. Laible, 27 N. J. Eq. 146, s. c. 31 N. J. Eq. 566, reversed on other points in 32 N. J. Eq. 791.

So it was held in M. Eisenstadt Jewelry Co. v. Mississippi Valley Trust Co. 72 Mo. App. 514, that a court of equity would subject the profits of a trade or business to the satisfaction of an indebtedness contracted by an executor who carried it on by virtue of testamentary authority, where an execution against the executor personally had been returned nulla bona.

And where an executor, who carried on a business under a testamentary power to wind it up or continue it, as he might see fit, is insolvent or not responsible, so that those who extend credit to him while carrying on the business cannot obtain satisfaction of their claims from him, they may in equity proceed against the assets embarked in the trade or business. Owen v. Delamere, L. R. 13 Eq. 134, 27 L. T. N. S. 647, 42 L. J. Ch. N. S. 232, 21 Week. Rep. 218; Fridenburg v. Wilson, 20 Fla. 359.

So, it was said in Willis v. Sharp, 113 N. Y. 588, 4 L.R.A. 493, 21 N. E. 705, affirming 43 Hun, 434, that where a will discloses that it was the intention of the testator that his general estate should be bound by the contracts of his executor in carrying on a trade or business, if the executor is insolvent, persons who became creditors while the executor was so engaged might, in equity, obtain satisfaction of their claims from the general assets of the estate.

And it was said in Fairland v. Percy, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 217, that "where a testator by will directs that his business may be carried on, and that his personal estate shall be used as capital with which to do so, the persons who, after his death, become creditors of the business, in addition to the personal responsibility of the individuals who give the order for the goods or otherwise contract the debt, are entitled in equity to claim against the estate of the testator to the extent that he authorized it to be used in the business."

But an estate is not answerable in equity for the price of a pair of oxen purchased by an administrator for use in carrying on a farming business on behalf of the estate, without authority, since he alone is liable therefor. Hallock v. Smith, 50 Conn. 127.

And it was held in Wade v. Pope, 44 Ala. 690, and Vann v. Vann, 71 Ala. 154, that a creditor who has obtained a judgment at law against an executor for services rendered while carrying on a business pursuant to the terms of a will cannot, in equity, subject the assets of the estate to payment in satisfaction thereof. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

IX. Estoppel of beneficiaries of estate to charge personal representative, etc., with losses sustained.

The doctrine of SWAINE v. HEMPHILL, that a personal representative who carries on a trade or business without authority may be relieved from individual liability for resulting losses by conduct amounting to estoppel on the part of those interested in the estate, is recognized and applied in a number of cases.

Thus, this doctrine has been applied where an executor or administrator carried on at a loss a business at the solicitation of all those beneficially interested in an estate. Poole v. Munday, 103 Mass. 174; French v. Davis, 38 Miss. 167; Billingslea v. Young, 33 Miss. 95; Merkel's Estate, 131 Pa. 584, 18 Atl. 931; Re Smith, 30 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 188; Hibberd v. Hubbard, 13 Pa. Dist. R. 12, reversed on other grounds in 211 Pa. 331, 60 Atl. 911.

So, it was said in Ward v. Tinkham, 65 Mich. 695, 32 N. W. 901, that an administrator who seeks to justify his conducting a business "by having procured the assent of the parties interested must be prepared to show that he has acted in entire good faith, and that he obtained such assent upon full and fair representations and information communicated to his cestui que trustent of all the facts and circumstances attending the risk to the fund, and of the proposed investment. He must be guilty of no fraud, falsehood, or deceit in obtaining such consent, and the burden of proof is upon him to show this, and in no other way can he be protected in deviating from the line of his fiduciary duty."

And beneficiaries who consent to the carrying on of a business by an executor without testamentary authority are estopped from asserting that it was wrongfully done. Lovell v. Gibson, 19 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 280.

So, the consent of all the heirs and creditors of a decedent to the continuing of a business by an administrator will relieve the latter from all liability to them for resulting losses. Merkel's Estate, 131 Pa. 584, 18 Atl. 931.

And an administrator is relieved from individual liability to those beneficially interested in an estate for losses sustained in a business carried on by him in good faith, at the urgent request of all of them, where the business was managed by a minor son of the intestate, who was familiar with the business, and for whom it was intended when he became of age, since those who requested the administrator to do so will not be permitted to charge him with maladministration under the circumstances. Poole v. Munday, 103 Mass. 174.

So, an executor will not be surcharged with a loss where he carried on a manufacturing business, and during an unprosperous time, which was the result of a business depression, when unexpected difficulties arose, at the urgent solicitation of those interested in the estate, he, in good faith, and as an exercise of ordinary discretion, borrowed money for use in the business, from which such beneficiaries received the profits as long as there were any. Whitman's Estate, 195 Pa. 144, 45 Atl. 673.

Where a widow, upon her husband's death, agreed with his surviving partner to continue the former's interest in the business, and that the survivor should pay for it as soon as possible, with interest, and nine years later, upon the survivor becoming insolvent, she was appointed administratrix of her husband's estate, she will not be charged with the value of the partnership interest as of the death of her intestate, at the instance of a daughter of the deceased, to whose support the interest paid was devoted, as it appeared that her course was prudent, and that the allowance of the daughter's support absorbed all of her interest in the estate. Browne v. Bedford, 4 Dem. 304.

So, a widow who carried on a manufacturing business as a testamentary trustee, under the directions of a will, after being discharged from her trust and receiving compensation for her services, is estopped, after opening a rival business, from objecting to losses sustained in the former business by her son, who was substituted for her as trustee. Re Froelich, 50 Misc. 103, 100 N. Y. Supp. 436, affirmed in 122 App. Div. 440, 107 N. Y. Supp. 173, and without opinion in 192 N. Y. 566, 85 N. E. 1110.

And an heir who had assigned his interest in an estate is estopped, six years after the sale by an administrator of a business at a loss, from charging him therewith, where the business was conducted with the consent of all the heirs, for three months before selling it, and it appeared that the stock was old, and that repeated attempts to sell it had been made, and that the best price attainable was received for it. Re Semple, 189 Pa. 385, 42 Atl. 28, reversing 28 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 431.

Those beneficially interested in an estate are estopped from questioning the allowance to an executor of the expenses of working a plantation, where they remained silent and permitted him to do so without objection until the crops had been materially injured. Wederstrandt's Succession, 19 La. Ann. 494. The court said that the parties opposing such allowance had their remedy, but chose to remain silent and acquiesce in the course pursued by the executor, and the fact that he did not call a meeting of the creditors of the estate, as required by statute, could not throw upon him all the expenses incurred in good faith, and at the same time make him pay over the proceeds of the crops.

And a widow who assents to the executor of her deceased husband's estate carrying on a farm belonging thereto is estopped from objecting to the allowance of the expenses thereof. Larroux v. Larroux, 2 Redf. 69.

But it was held in Re McGovern, 118 N. Y. Supp. 378, that a sister of a deceased person, who, at the request of his other heirs, took possession of and continued a business belonging to the deceased for four months before being appointed administratrix, was, at the instance of such heirs, chargeable with the losses sustained both before and after her appointment.

So, female beneficiaries who were unfamiliar with the English language are not estopped from charging executors, who were the surviving partners of the testator, with a loss resulting from their failure to give security, as required by the will, for the value of the testator's interest in the business, which was conveyed at his death to the surviving partners, by accepting from them a mortgage upon the partnership property without knowledge that it was a second mortgage, and that the firm was insolvent. Luers v. Brunjes, 5 Redf. 32.

Nor, under such circumstances, will the fact that they received from the business an income, amount to an estoppel. Ibid.

And where an executor operated a mill belonging to an estate without authority, for five years, those beneficially interested in the estate are not estopped from charging him with the cost of extensive permanent repairs to the mill, as well as the cost of new machinery installed, because one of the beneficiaries was consulted by the executor regarding the advisability of incurring such expense, and it did not appear what was said on that occasion. Re Tisdale, 110 App. Div. 857, 97 N. Y. Supp. 494.

Such consent, in order to create an estoppel, may be implied from the conduct of the beneficiaries as well as from express consent. French v. Davis, 38 Miss. 167; Billingslea v. Young, 33 Miss. 95; Levi's Estate, 224 Pa. 233, 73 Atl. 334; Myrick's Succession, 38 La. Ann. 611; Garrett v. Noble, 6 Sim. 504, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 159.

Thus, where all of the heirs at law of an intestate had knowledge of the fact that an administrator was keeping the property of the estate together and carrying on a plantation business, and did not make any objection thereto, the administrator is relieved from all individual liability to them except to account for the net profits of the business. French v. Davis, 38 Miss. 167.

And when the heirs and creditors of an estate remain silent while the executor works a plantation belonging to it, they are estopped from charging him with a resulting loss, since it was within their power in the first instance to have prevented his continuing the business. Myrick's Succession, 38 La. Ann. 611.

A delay of five years before objecting to the continuance of a business by an executor for a year, where he was directed by will to collect the personal estate with all convenient speed, will amount to an estoppel where those interested in the estate had full knowledge of the executor's conduct. Garrett v. Noble, 6 Sim. 504, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 159.

So, where the widow and children of a decedent do not object to the continuance of a business by an executor who was empowered by will to do so, the latter will not be surcharged with debts contracted by him while so engaged, the estate being answerable therefor. Levi's Estate, 224 Pa. 233, 73 Atl. 334.

But no consent or conduct on the part of minor beneficiaries will create an estoppel. Gilligan v. Daly, — N. J. Eq. —, 80 Atl. 994; Wielmann's Succession, 112 La. 293, 36 So. 354; Wiemann v. Mainegra, 112 La. 305, 36 So. 358.

Nor is a minor estopped by the conduct of his guardian from holding a personal representative liable for losses, where he continues a business belonging to an estate. Larroux v. Larroux, 2 Redf. 69; Wiemann v. Mainegra, 112 La. 305, 36 So. 358.

An administrator who, with the concurrence of the adult heirs of a decedent, continued a commercial business belonging to the deceased for about six years, becomes liable to a minor heir for his proportionate share of the assets of the estate therein invested, less the disbursements of the administrator which would have been made had the administrator settled the estate in accordance with law. Wiemann's Succession, 112 La. 293, 36 So. 354.

And a minor heir is not estopped from holding an administrator and his sureties liable for losses, because his tutor was one of the adult heirs who concurred in permitting the administrator to carry on such business. Wiemann v. Mainegra, supra.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

ELLA BROWN, Appt.,

v.

ALVA M. KITSELMAN et al.

(— Ind. —, 98 N. E. 631.)

Parties — action by woman — injury to husband.

A woman cannot recover damages for injury inflicted upon her husband to the diminution of his earning capacity and consequent ability to support and maintain her, nor for loss of his society and companionship because of such injury.

(May 28, 1912.)

Note. — Right of wife to sue for personal injury to husband.

Little authority has been found on this question further than that cited in BROWN v. KITSELMAN, and in the note to Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024.

Sometimes cited in connection with the discussion of this question is Monroe v. Maples, 1 Root, 422, holding that the husband and wife cannot join in an action for personal injury to the husband, since the right of action is personal to the husband. The case does not disclose the basis upon which the wife claimed a right to damages. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Randolph County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's husband, alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Brissey, for appellant:

The consortium of the husband is a common-law right of the wife, and she may maintain her separate action against one who wrongfully deprives her of such right.

Haynes v. Nowlin, 129 Ind. 581, 14 L.R.A. 787, 28 Am. St. Rep. 213, 29 N. E. 389; Holmes v. Holmes, 133 Ind. 386, 32 N. E. 932; Wolf v. Wolf, 130 Ind. 599, 30 N. E. 308; Adams v. Main, 3 Ind. Westlake*, 34 Ohio St. 621, 32 Am. Rep. 397; Waldron v. Waldron, 45 Fed. 315; Huling v. Huling, 32 Ill. App. 519; Bishop, Marr. & Div. ¶ 1358; Gregg v. Gregg, 37 Ind. App. 216, 75 N. E. 674.

Mr. Elmer E. Stevenson, for appellees:

No action accrues to the wife for the loss of the wages or earning capacity of consortium of her husband, who may be injured by the negligence of another.

Goldman v. Cohen, 30 Misc. 336, 63 N. Y. Supp. 459; 21 Cyc. 1530; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 817; Glenn v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 1 Ga. App. 821, 58 S. E. 83; Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 89 N. E. 436.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant filed her complaint against appellees for damages growing out of personal injuries to her husband, Albert Brown. The lower court sustained a several demurrer for want of facts to each paragraph of complaint, and the appellant declined to plead further; whereupon judgment was rendered for appellees.

The husband's exclusive right to his wages, and the remoteness of the damages sought to be recovered, were the grounds upon which the court in Welch v. Morrison, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 852, held that a wife whose husband was negligently injured by the defendant was not entitled to recover for the loss of his wages nor for compensation for nursing him, including the amount expended for medicine, nor for the mental distress and anxiety suffered by her.

Attention is also directed to Glenn v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 1 Ga. App. 821, 58 S. E. 83, declaring that since the obligation to support the wife and family is upon the husband, and not upon the wife, she cannot

The errors relied on here are predicated on the action of the circuit court in sustaining the several demurrer to each the third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs of complaint.

The third paragraph alleges that appellant's husband was in the employ of appellees, and, while so engaged, sustained an injury which resulted in the entire loss of his eyesight, and by reason thereof his earning capacity has been destroyed, and appellant, as a consequence, has been deprived of support and maintenance, to her damage in the sum of $10,000. It is alleged that the husband's injury was approximately caused by the negligence of appellees, the particulars of which are set out in detail.

The fourth paragraph is similar to the third, with the addition that appellant therein alleges that, by reason of the negligent injury to her husband, she has been deprived of the companionship, comfort, and society of her husband, for which she demands damages.

The fifth paragraph is similar to the third in regard to the allegations of her husband's injury, and bases the right to recover solely on appellant's loss of the companionship, comfort, society, and protection of her husband.

A wife has no cause of action against a third person for damages for negligent injuries to her husband, resulting in the diminution of his earning capacity and his consequent ability to comfortably support and maintain her, because the husband is entitled, in a proper action, to full compensation for such loss. 21 Cyc. 1530.

May the wife recover from a third party for the loss of the society, companionship, and affection—consortium—of her husband, caused by the negligence of such party?

Since the removal of most of the common-law disabilities of the wife, it has been held in Indiana, and in most other jurisdictions, that a wife may recover damages for the alienation of her husband's affections. Haynes v. Nowlin, 129 Ind. 584, 14 L.R.A.

maintain an action for the salary which the husband would have earned, and from which he would have contributed to the support of the family, but for the defendant's negligence. This case involves an action against the telegraph company for negligently failing to deliver to the husband a message sent by the wife, announcing his appointment to a position, as well as her willingness to terminate an estrangement between them; and it was sought to recover as one element of damages, the amount of salary he would have earned.

As to the right of the husband to recover the loss of consortium through personal injury to the wife, see the note in 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1042.

787; 28 Am. St. Rep. 213, 29 N. E. 389; Wolf v. Wolf, 130 Ind. 599, 30 N. E. 308; Holmes v. Holmes, 133 Ind. 386, 22 N. E. 932; Postlewaite v. Postlewaite, 1 Ind. App. 474, 28 N. E. 99; Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 643, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 77 N. E. 890, 6 Ann. Cas. 658, and note on page 664. In such cases, no question of negligence is involved. The recovery is for an injury intentionally inflicted, and is not limited to compensation, but may be for punitive damages as well.

The question here involved has rarely been presented to courts of appeal, and, so far as we are able to discover, when presented, a recovery has been denied.

In Goldman v. Cohen, 30 Misc. 336, 63 N. Y. Supp. 459, it was said: "The defendant demurs to the complaint, which seeks recovery by a wife for the loss she sustained, as a wife, by the injury to her husband from the negligence of the defendant in the management of a horse. Her loss is that which usually occurs to a wife from the illness of a husband, in the deprivation of support and consortium, and the need of her personal care of him during his sickness. No case is cited where the wife recovered upon such a claim; and the absence of precedent, where such demands might have been numerous, if sustained by the law, goes far to the belief that such negligence has never yet been embraced within the circle of causes of action recognized by law, beyond the right given to the injured one, and its survival to the consort and next of kin in the event of his death. It is true that this century just closing has seen, with our own state foremost in advance, the adoption, by unwritten and statutory law, of juster and wider views of the wife's existence as a human being by the emancipation of her person from "the moderate chastisement" of the husband and the protection of her rights of property; but her interest in the husband's life and companionship is not a right of property, or derived from a contract of bargain and sale. That interest lies in a region into which the law does not enter, except when necessity compels. It does recognize invasion by wilful misconduct. It inflicts heavy damages upon the enticer or seducer. But this is for punishment and atonement, rather than compensation. It comes within the range of concurrent and supplementary adjuncts to the criminal law for the prevention and redress of wrongs. The fault of negligence rarely demands a greater remedy than mere compensation. The right of action is remedial, not punitive. It reaches not out to those indirectly suffering by impairment of domestic relations, giving to dependent wife or child pecuniary equivalent. So far as the law can, it neutralizes such indirect losses by compensation to the husband and father, thus giving him the means of supplying the loss in earning power and expenses of sickness, and so avoids double or triple recoveries for the same elements of compensatory damages by different persons against him whose fault only gives ground for one restitution. The breach of a contract obligation directly affects the power of the husband to give solace and comfort to the wife; but she may not have a personal right of action, except where the law does allow her to be the moving cause to invoke the courts to punish destruction of marital rights. Judgment for defendant, on demurrer, with costs."

In 21 Cyc. on page 1530, it is said: "For an injury done to the husband, the wife cannot join with him in an action for damages; and no action accrues to the wife for the loss sustained by her, such as the loss of his wages; nor can she recover for nursing him, when injured by a third person's negligence."

In the recent case of Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1909) 203 Mass. 278, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 89 N. E. 436, the question here under consideration was directly involved, and the right of recovery was denied. In the course of the opinion, it is said:

"The right to the consortium of the other spouse seems to belong to husband and wife alike, and to rest upon the same reasons in favor of each. Since the removal of the wife's disability to sue, this is now settled in most courts by a great weight of authority. Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 77 N. E. 890, 6 Ann. Cas. 658, and cases cited. It is now generally held, in accordance with the decision in Nolin v. Pearson, that, for a direct and intentional invasion of a wife's right of consortium by another woman, through the alienation of the husband's affections and criminal conversation with him, an action may be maintained, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

as a similar action may be maintained by a husband for a similar wrong inflicted through adultery with his wife. . . .

"The wrong which may be redressed through such suits is one which has a direct tendency to deprive the husband or wife of the consortium of the other spouse. No case has been brought to our attention, and after an extended examination we have found none, in which an action for a loss of consortium alone has been maintained, merely because of an injury to the person of the spouse, for which the other has recovered, or is entitled to recover, full compensation in his own name, when the only effect upon the plaintiff's right of consortium is that; through the physical or mental disability of the other, the companionship is less satisfactory and valuable than before the injury. The actions by husbands at common law for expenses and loss of services, in which the loss of consortium has been considered in estimating damages, were all in cases in which no damages could be awarded for loss of the ability to earn money and render services and be helpful to others, in an action by the husband and wife for the wife's personal damages, because at common law all these elements of damage belonged to the husband. . . . There was not an allowance to the wife for her loss of ability to earn wages and render services, and at the same time an allowance to the husband, in the form of compensation for the loss of consortium for the same diminution of ability to be helpful."

"Where there is no intentional wrong, the ordinary rule of damages goes no further in this respect than to allow pecuniary compensation for the impairment or injury directly done. When the injury is to the person of another, the impairment of ability to work and be helpful and render services of any kind is paid for in full to the person injured. Ordinarily the relation between him and others, whereby they will be detrimentally affected by the impairment of his physical or mental ability, makes the damage to them only remote and consequential, and not a ground of recovery against the wrongdoer. . . . It is enough for the present case that persons whose relations to the injured party are purely domestic should not be permitted to share the compensation to which he is entitled for the impairment of his powers by the tort of another person, nor to receive an additional sum beyond the full compensation to which the injured person is entitled. Their damages are too remote to be made the subject of an action.

"The minor children of an injured father, who is legally bound to furnish them with support, may suffer indirectly from his injury. So, too, may his wife, to whom he owes the same legal duty to furnish support; yet it was never held that a wife or minor child could recover for the consequences of a father's disability against one who had negligently injured him. The diminished value of the work that the husband with his wife, in such a case, is like the diminished value of the work that the husband can do for the support of his wife and the education and support of his minor children. The negligent defendant is supposed to have made full pecuniary compensation to the husband and father for his injury. In the benefit from this payment, the wife and children may be expected to share to some extent. If they still suffer loss, it is not direct, but only consequential."

We are of the opinion that the reasoning in the Feneff Case, supra, is sound, and that a wife is not entitled to recover for loss of consortium in such an action as this; and, as it is settled she may not recover for loss of support consequent on the diminution of her husband's earning capacity, it follows that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the several paragraphs of complaint in controversy here.

Judgment affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF IOWA

v.

JOHN KERNAN, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 135 N. W. 362.)

Indictment — language of statute — sufficiency.

1. An indictment in the language of the statute, which so individuates the offense that the accused has proper notice of the crime charged, is good.

Note. — Intimation that a recommendation to mercy would be entertained as ground for reversal of conviction.

This note does not cover the general question of the propriety of giving instructions to the jury on their power of recommendation to mercy. It deals only with the effect of the court's making an intimation that a recommendation to mercy would be entertained or carried out by it.

The holding in STATE v. KERNAN, that a promise of the court to consider a recommendation to mercy by the jury in a criminal case vitiated the verdict of guilty, on the ground that it tended to influence the verdict, although, because it was necessary to impose the maximum penalty under the indeterminate-sentence law, the recommendation was of no utility, seems sound. Prior to the decision in STATE v. KERNAN, the point seems to have been passed upon in only three cases, in which the result was in 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Criminal law — promise to consider recommendation — effect on verdict.

2. A promise of the court to consider a recommendation by the jury in a criminal case will vitiate a verdict of guilty, as tending to influence the verdict, although, because the maximum penalty must be imposed under the indeterminate-sentence law, the recommendation was of no utility.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County, convicting him of committing lewd and lascivious acts with a child under thirteen years of age. Reversed.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

The defendant was accused of having committed lewd and lascivious acts with a child under thirteen years of age, and appeals.

Messrs. Willard & Willard for appellant.

Messrs. George Cosson, Attorney General, and John Fletcher, Assistant Attorney General, for appellee:

There was no promise made by the court that he would do less than his duty in the matter of fixing punishment, as an inducement to find the defendant guilty, and the recommendation made by the jury might or might not be considered by him; but it was within his right to reject it as mere surplusage, if he so desired.

State v. Newman, 49 W. Va. 724, 39 S. E. 655; State v. Gill, 14 S. C. 410; State v. Bennett, 40 S. C. 308, 18 S. E. 886; Ray v. State, 108 Tenn. 282, 67 S. W. 553; Greer v. State, 3 Baxt. 321; Penn v. State, 62 Miss. 450; Wair v. State, 51 Ga. 303.

The indictment charges the offense in the language of the statute; and as the offense is there named and described, it is sufficient.

accord with the conclusion reached in that case.

In State v. Kiefer, 16 S. D. 180, 91 N. W. 1117, 1 Ann. Cas. 268, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 619, where the jury sent a communication to the court, asking if they could recommend the defendant to its mercy, and the court answered affirmatively, and added that it had always made it an invariable rule to follow such recommendation, it was held that there was prejudicial error. The court said: "This proceeding on the part of the court was clearly error. The answer to the question, while not strictly in the nature of an instruction or charge of the court, was nevertheless information conveyed to the jury, while deliberating upon their verdict, calculated to influence them. It will be observed that the court informed the jury that he had made it an invariable rule to follow the recommendations of the jury. Such a statement to the jury in a doubtful case might reasonably be presumed to influence

There was no testimony that would tend to make either Ethel Walker or the other little girls accomplices, nor is there any testimony that the Walker girl consented to the acts of the defendant.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The accused was indicted under § 4938a, Code Supplement (chapter 173, Acts 32d G. A.), denouncing as a crime the wilful commission of "any lewd, immoral, or lascivious act upon or with the body, or any part . . . thereof, of a child of the age of thirteen years or under, with the intent of arousing, appealing to, or gratifying the lust or passions or sexual desires of such person, or of such child." The indictment was substantially in the language of this statute, and, as it so individuated the offense that the accused had proper notice of the crime charged, the indictment was good. State v. Porter, 105 Iowa, 677, 75 N. W. 519; State v. Johnson, 114 Iowa, 430, 87 N. W. 279; State v. Leasman, 137 Iowa, 191, 114 N. W. 1032; State v. McGruder, 125 Iowa, 741, 101 N. W. 646; State v. Beebe, 115 Iowa, 128, 88 N. W. 358.

In People v. Grinnell, 9 Cal. App. 238, 98 Pac. 681, the defect in the indictment was the omission to negative an exception, not included in the statute of this state, constituting a part of the description of the offense, and, for this reason, the decision is not in point.

2. The cause had been submitted to the jury, and, after being out all night, that the jurors in arriving at their verdict.

. . . It is true that in the case at bar the trial judge did not distinctly agree, in terms, that the jury could depend on the clemency of the court; but the language used by him was, in effect, an agreement or statement that the jury could rely upon the clemency of the court. The learned judge said: 'I have made it an invariable rule . . . to follow such recommendation.' The jurors might very naturally conclude from the language used that they could rely upon him to extend clemency to the accused in case he should be convicted, and it might have the effect to induce the jurors to disregard any reasonable doubts they might have as to the guilt of the accused. Jurors, in the discharge of their duties, having nothing to do regarding the punishment to be inflicted upon the accused, as the extent 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

body came into court, and, in the absence of defendant, stated that they had failed to agree, and wanted to know if they could make a recommendation to the court. Thereupon the court informed them that "while it is not usual, and some of the judges objected to a recommendation, it didn't, and they might do so, and he would consider such recommendation." The jury then retired and on the same day returned a verdict of guilty, and recommended "the clemency of the court, and that the sentence be made as light as possible." Though doubtless not so intended, what occurred was well calculated to influence the verdict of the jury. Indeed, that the court's response would be so used was to be inferred from the inquiry. As contended, no promise was made save that the "recommendation would be considered;" but, from what was said, the jury might well have understood that it would be favorably considered, and at least that it would be weighed in pronouncing judgment. It amounted to holding out an inducement to the jury to agree upon a verdict, although under the indeterminate-sentence law, such recommendation might not have been given the slightest consideration, for, in any event, the maximum penalty must have been imposed.

In McBean v. State, 83 Wis. 206, 53 N. W. 497, it appears that the jury had sent this inquiry to the court: "If we bring in a verdict of guilty, can we depend on the clemency of the court?" And the court responded in substance that they could. This was held to be error, the court saying: "The question put by the jury to the trial judge in the case at bar was, in and of itself, harmless. The error consists of the promise made by the trial judge to the jury, to the effect that, if they found McBean guilty, they might rely upon him to extend the clemency of the court to the prisoner. It sufficiently appears from the verdict reof the punishment is left entirely to the discretion of the court, within certain limitations prescribed by statute. And while it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury upon the law of the case, it should not in any manner attempt to influence its deliberations, and the court should be exceedingly careful to refrain from all expressions of opinion that might be calculated to influence the minds of the jurors. Undoubtedly the learned circuit court, in replying to the request of the foreman of the jury, was actuated by no improper motive, but the proceeding is a dangerous one, and cannot be sanctioned by this court."

The other decisions which have considered the point under discussion are fully set out by the court in its opinion in STATE v. KERNAN.

turned that the jury did rely upon such promise. The promise thus secured was well calculated to overcome reasonable doubts and coerce an agreement for conviction. It was an unauthorized interference with the deliberations of the jury. Ryan v. Rockford Ins. Co. 77 Wis. 611, 46 N. W. 885. 'A verdict is a declaration of the truth as to the matters of fact submitted to the jury.' Shenners v. West Side Street R. Co. 78 Wis. 387, 47 N. W. 622. To be such truth, however, it must be based wholly upon the evidence in the case. A verdict in disregard of such evidence, in whole or in part, is a false verdict. It follows that any promise, pledge, or declaration of the trial judge, calculated to draw the attention of the jury away from the evidence, and to induce them to base their verdict upon ulterior considerations, is, necessarily, misleading, and hence erroneous."

In Territory v. Griego, 8 N. M. 133, 42 Pac. 81, jurors had been out a long time and, on returning into court, reported their inability to agree, and, after some talk with them, the court said there was an instruction he might have given which the law authorized: "While the law fixes the punishment in this case, or rather, while the court assesses the punishment, the law authorizes you, in case you find the defendant guilty, to commend him to the mercy of the court; and that recommendation made by the jury will be considered by the court in fixing the punishment." In half an hour the jury returned with a verdict of guilty and a recommendation to the mercy of the court. In holding this instruction erroneous, the court remarked that the sudden agreement of the jurors, after being out fifty-four hours, indicated that they must have been "influenced quite powerfully by the judge's instructions that a recommendation of mercy would receive his consideration in fixing the punishment. It seems within the range of reasonable probability that with a knowledge that nothing but the death penalty would be the consequence of their verdict, no agreement could have been secured from the jury. The gravity of the punishment may well have caused jurors to hang to a doubt of guilt rather than hang a man whose guilt they doubted. Coming, as it did, without request, after the jury had been deliberating and unable to agree for fifty-four hours, it was an indication, quite pointed, of the judge's opinion. Randolph v. Lampkin, 90 Ky. 551, 10 L.R.A. 88, 14 S. W. 538. It was 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) an intimation from the court of a lighter sentence than the jurors had expected, and must have been harmful to the defendant."

In State v. Kiefer, 16 S. D. 180, 91 N. W. 1117, 1 Ann. Cas. 268, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 619, to an inquiry by the jury whether they could recommend the accused to the mercy of the court, the latter answered that it had made it an invariable rule to follow such recommendations, and this answer was held to be calculated to influence the jury. Other decisions are readily distinguishable because of differences in the facts.

In Lovett v. State, 30 Fla. 142, 17 L.R.A. 705, 11 So. 550, the statutory effect of a recommendation to mercy by the majority of the jury reduced the penalty from death to life imprisonment, and an instruction with reference thereto was approved. In State v. Gill, 14 S. C. 410, the court merely replied affirmatively to an inquiry of the jury whether they might recommend the prisoner to mercy if found guilty, and, since no intimation of the consequence of such a recommendation was given, the court held there to have been no prejudice. In Crawford v. State, 2 Yerg. 60, 24 Am. Dec. 467, a recommendation of mercy to the governor was returned with the verdict. One of the jurors made affidavit that he would not have agreed to the verdict but for the belief that it would be effectual, and another swore that it led him to agree. Such affidavits were held admissible, and a new trial ordered because of the misapprehension of these jurors. But in State v. Bennett, 40 S. C. 308, 18 S. E. 886, and Penn v. State, 62 Miss. 450, such a showing was held not to invalidate a verdict.

The jurors should not have concerned themselves with the punishment, and ought to have been plainly told that they ought not to take that into consideration. Their function ended in deducing the truth from the evidence adduced and expressing it in their verdict. Anything said by the court calculated to draw their attention from the performance thereof, and to induce them to rest their conclusion upon ulterior considerations, necessarily is misleading and prejudicial. We are of opinion that the promise of the court to give the recommendation consideration might well have led the jury to believe, and doubtless did, that the sentence to follow would be somewhat modified because thereof, and that this was extremely prejudicial to the defendant.

Because of this error, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

FROHARDT BROTHERS et al.

v.

W. A. DUFF.

((— Iowa, —, 135 N. W. 609.)

Statute of frauds — promise to pay another's debt — waiver of attachment.

1. An oral agreement by a mortgagee in possession of mortgaged property to pay a debt of the mortgagor to avoid an attachment of the property of which he is in possession may be found to be an original agreement to pay the debt, and therefore not to be within the statute of frauds, although the liability of the original debtor was not terminated.

Note. — Is oral promise to pay another's pre-existing debt, made in order to secure a benefit to the promisor, without releasing the original debtor, within the statute of frauds.

This is the subject of a note in 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1077, to which the present note is supplemental.

The note does not include cases involving oral promises to the original debtor, but only cases where the oral promise was made to the creditor; nor does it cover cases involving a promise to pay another's debt, made contemporaneously with the creation of the debt. For cases of the latter character, see notes in 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 214 and 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 598.

General rule.

At the outset, attention is called to the distinction between a consideration sufficient to support a contract and a consideration which will make a promise to pay an existing debt of another an original one.

As shown in the note in 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1077, to which this note is supplemental, by the weight of authority, a promise to pay the pre-existing debt of another may be original rather than collateral, and hence not within the statute of frauds, although the original debtor is not released. In order, however, that such a promise be removed from the operation of the statute of frauds, it must be an original promise to pay out of money of the debtor then in the promisor's hands or thereafter to be placed in his custody, or it must be an independent agreement with the creditor, based upon some substantial consideration or benefit inuring to the promisor, the securing of which is the primary purpose of the promise, the payment of the debt being merely secondary or incidental.

In Southern Indiana Loan & Sav. Inst. v. Roberts, 42 Ind. App. 653, 86 N. E. 490, however, the rule is stated that a valid oral promise to pay another's debt cannot be made directly with the creditor, even though founded upon a valuable considera-

Appeal — elimination of counts — ruling on prior trial.

2. Parties failing to appeal from an order withdrawing from the jury the issues presented by certain counts of the complaint cannot, in case of a disagreement as to the other counts, which necessitates a new trial, question on appeal from the second judgment a ruling that such counts have been eliminated from the case, if no separate appeal was taken therefrom.

(April 9, 1912.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Pottawattamie County in an action on alleged oral promises to pay to plaintiffs the amount of certion; but it must be founded upon a valuable consideration and be in writing.

The rule has been stated thus: "Where the promise to pay the debt of another is not the chief purpose of the transaction in which it inheres, and a substantial and valuable consideration therefor inures directly to the benefit of the promisor, as in a case in which he obtains a conveyance of property in consideration of his promise to pay the debt of the grantor, or to pay an encumbrance upon the property, the promise does not fall within the statute, and no writing is necessary to support it. In cases of this character, the fact that the object of the promisors is not to answer for the debts, defaults, or miscarriages of others, but is to obtain substantial benefits or advantages to themselves, which they actually secure as the consideration for their agreements, distinguishes these promises from those within the statute, and makes them original agreements of the promisors, which are valid without writings." Mine & Smelter Supply Co. v. Stockgrowers' Bank, 98 C. C. A. 229, 173 Fed. 859.

In Peele v. Powell, 156 N. C. 553, 73 S. E. 234, the rule is stated that where the promise is for the benefit of the promisor, and he has a personal immediate, pecuniary benefit in the transaction, or the promise is to pay the debt of another as part of the consideration of property to be conveyed to the promisor, or is a promise to make good notes transferred in payment of property, the promise is valid although in parol. To the same effect, see Whitehurst v. Padgett, 157 N. C. 424, 73 S. E. 240.

In Zimmerman v. Holt, — Ark. —, 144 S. W. 222, the doctrine is stated that if a primary debt subsists against another, the promise of a third person to pay it, made subsequent to the time it was incurred, is not an original undertaking unless founded upon a new consideration, moving to and beneficial to the promisor, so that he thereby comes under an independent duty to pay, irrespective of the liability of the original debtor.

To remove a promise to pay the pre-existing debt of another from the operation of tain claims held by them against a third person; defendant appealing from the judgment against him in favor of plaintiffs Frohardt Brothers; and plaintiffs Droge Brothers appealing from the judgment as against them. Affirmed on both appeals.

Statement by McClain, Ch. J.:

Action on alleged oral promises by defendant to pay to plaintiffs the amount of certain claims held by plaintiffs against one Whitsett. The defendant relied upon the statute of frauds, and the court submitted the case to the jury to determine whether the agreements of defendant were original and absolute undertakings to pay to plaintiffs the amounts of their respective claims against Whitsett, or whether it was a collateral undertaking merely to see that the claims against Whitsett were paid, if he did not pay them. There was a verdict against defendant in favor of Frohardt Brothers, and one in favor of defendant against Droge Brothers, and judgment was rendered accordingly, from which defendant appeals as to the judgment against him, and Droge Brothers appeal from the judgment as against them. Defendant's appeal having been first perfected, he is treated as the appellant.

Messrs. Flickinger Brothers, for plaintiffs:

The agreement is not within the statute of frauds.

the statute of frauds, the promise must be based on a beneficial consideration moving to the promisor, and it must be an independent promise to pay, and not a mere guaranty upon a new and beneficial consideration. Ogden v. Sergeant, 119 N. Y. Supp. 672, affirmed in 137 App. Div. 925, 122 N. Y. Supp. 1139. Unless some independent benefit accrues to the promisor, his promise to pay the pre-existing debt of another is not an original obligation, and hence is within the statute of frauds. Yracheta v. Stanford, 120 N. Y. Supp. 117.

There must be a release of some benefit or advantage by the promisee, and such benefit or advantage must accrue to the promisor. Blasdel v. Erickson, 157 Ill. App. 815.

As to the necessity that the original obligation be released, in Holcomb v. Mashburn, 10 Ga. App. 781, 74 S. E. 307, the court said that this was one test to determine whether or not a promise to pay the debt of another was an original obligation; but that this was not the only test.

Where a plaintiff relies upon an oral promise of the defendant to pay the debt of another, the burden is on the former to show facts taking the promise out of the statute. Estes v. Bryant-For-Daniel Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 140 S. W. 1177.

Cases illustrative of rule—original promise.

The following promises to pay the debt of another, and which have been held to be original promises, and hence not within the statute of frauds, are illustrative of the rule referred to:

—a promise made to a person holding possession of property under a pledge, to pay the amount due from the pledgeor, in consideration of the surrender to the promisor of the possession of the property. Oleson v. Oleson, 90 Neb. 738, 134 N. W. 648;

—a promise to pay in consideration of the consent of the mortgagee to the transfer of the property mortgaged from the mortgagor to the promisor. Gay v. Schaefer, 52 Wash. 269, 100 Pac. 334;

—a promise by the creditor of a tenant to pay the latter's landlord, where the promisor had received from the tenant, as a partial payment of his claim, the proceeds of a sale by the tenant of a portion of his crops upon which the landlord had a lien, the promise being made to the latter to induce him to refrain from making trouble for the tenant until he had gathered and sold his crop. Marrow v. White, 151 N. C. 96, 65 S. E. 746;

—an oral promise by the owner of an equity of redemption, made to the mortgagee, to pay the mortgage debt if the latter would not foreclose. Manning v. Anthony, 208 Mass. 399, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1179, 94 N. E. 466. The foregoing case suggests a line of cases that are in general excluded from this note; viz., agreements by the purchasers of property subject to lien, with the debtors, to pay the amount of the liens;

—a promise by a person interested in property subject to mortgage to pay the mortgage in consideration of forbearance by the mortgagee to foreclose, and his agreement to assign same at the option of the promisor. Lee v. Unkefer, 85 S. C. 199, 65 S. E. 989, 67 S. E. 246;

An oral acceptance of an order, if not based on a valuable consideration accruing to the acceptor, is within the statute of frauds and unenforceable. Hill v. Wright, 144 Ky. 806, 139 S. W. 946.

Where the only consideration to support a promise to pay the debt of another is the forbearance by the promisee to enforce payment of a debt against the debtor before a designated period, such forbearance is not a consideration capable of supporting the contract to pay another's debt, and does not evidence a new and independent contract from that of the original obligation, and hence it is a mere collateral undertaking, and within the statute. Byrd v. Hickman, 159 Ala. 505, 48 So. 669. This case was again before the court in 167 Ala. 351, 52 So. 426, and the theory then advanced to sustain the promise was that it was made directly to the debtor, in consideration of the payment by the debtor of a portion of a debt owing to the promisor. Under this theory the case is not within the scope of the note.

The mere forbearance to bring an attachment action against the debtor furnishes no consideration to support a promise by a third person to pay the debt of the attachment debtor, and does not take the promise out of the operation of the statute of frauds, where no facts are alleged in the pleadings from which it may be determined that the promisee had even a reasonable ground to believe that an attachment suit instituted by him against the debtor or his goods and chattels would avail him anything. While it is not necessary that a certain right of recovery should exist, if the suit which is alleged to have been forborne was brought, it must appear that the one forbearing to sue should in good faith have believed himself entitled to maintain his suit, and that he actually intended to institute the same. Ruehle v. Montelius, 149 Ill. App. 416.

An oral agreement to pay the debt of a third person out of money the promisor has agreed to loan the debtor is within the operation of the statute of frauds and therefore invalid, although, by reason of this agreement, the promisee delivered to the debtor the balance of goods sold him, and also dismissed two actions he had commenced against the promisor on drafts drawn against the latter by the debtor in favor of the promisee, it not appearing that the actions were sustainable, the dismissal of the actions, which clearly appears by the pleadings to the plaintiff to have been without foundation, being of substantial benefit to the defendant, and not constituting a sufficient consideration to transfer a guaranty into an original undertaking. Mine & Smelter Supply Co. v. Stockgrowers' Bank, 98 C. C. A. 229, 173 Fed. 859.

So, an oral promise to pay for services rendered another after the rendition of the services is within the statute of frauds. Sealey v. Combs, — Ky. —, 118 S. W. 972.

A promise to pay the debt of a third person, made to induce, and which has the effect of inducing the promisee to refrain from levying an execution upon goods of the debtor, and to return same unsatisfied, is not an original promise within the rule, since yielding or releasing the lien on the execution is a consideration moving from the promisee, but does not benefit the promisor, who receives no consideration or benefit from his promise. Blasdel v. Erickson, 157 Ill. App. 615.

A promise by a purchaser of goods to a person claiming a vendor's lien thereon (which, however, was unfounded, as he had lost his lien), to pay the amount of his claim in consideration of the release of all claim on the goods, is not an original 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

promise, where the promisee does not release the original debtor, since it is essential, to remove such a promise from the operation of the statute of frauds, that the parties to the original indebtedness either expressly or impliedly consent to the substitution of the new. Swisher v. Inside Grocery & Market Co. 158 Ill. App. 186.

The interest of a stockholder of a corporation is not sufficient to make his agreement to pay a debt owing by the corporation an original obligation, and the agreement by the creditor to furnish the corporation goods in the future furnishes no consideration for the agreement to pay an existing debt of the corporation. Winne v. Mehrbach, 130 App. Div. 329, 114 N. Y. Supp. 618.

Although a husband was doing a retail business in property of his wife as her tenant, a promise by the latter to pay a debt of her husband is within the statute of frauds, even though made for the purpose of inducing the creditor to continue to deliver goods to the husband, thereby enabling him to continue his business. Bauer v. Ambs, 144 App. Div. 274, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1024.

An agreement by the owner of property that he would see paid the amount then due for material furnished a contractor making improvements upon the property is within the statute of frauds, although the promisee was thereby induced to furnish further material. Stouffer v. Jackson, 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 450.

A promise by a father to pay a previously contracted debt of his minor son is a collateral agreement, and hence within the statute of frauds. Fisher v. Lutz, 146 Wis. 664, 132 N. W. 592.

In Harris v. Paulk, 10 Ga. App. 334, 73 S. E. 430, a promise is held to be collateral rather than original, and hence to be within the statute of frauds, where the promisee had the right to the services of the debtor until payment of his debt, and the promise to pay the debt at a future time was made to secure the release of the debtor, to enable the promisor to secure his services. The court apparently took the view that to render the promise an original one there must be a complete novation; and since the debtor was not released, the promise to pay was collateral. Although no point is made of that fact, the promise to pay was collateral in form,—a promise to see that the creditor was paid. A. G. S.

W. 785; Winburn v. Fidelity Loan & Bldg. Asso. 110 Iowa, 376, 81 N. W. 682; Regan v. Kirk, 140 Iowa, 302, 118 N. W. 317.

McClain, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Frohardt Brothers and Droge Brothers held two separate and independent claims against one Whitsett, and were threatening separately to attach Whitsett's property, consisting of a livery stock, on which defendant had a chattel mortgage, and of which he had possession. Thereupon it is alleged that defendant promised to each of the respective creditors of Whitsett that if they would refrain from attaching Whitsett's property in defendant's hands and attacking the validity of defendant's mortgage, he would pay their respective claims; and this action is founded upon such oral promises. While the causes of action of the two plaintiffs are distinct and separate, they were, without objection, allowed to proceed as coplaintiffs in this action. By separate appeals, the correctness of these two different portions of the final judgment is questioned. The appeal of the defendant from the judgment against him in favor of Frohardt Brothers will first be considered.

1. There was evidence tending to show that when Frohardt Brothers were threatening to attach the property of Whitsett, including the livery stock of which the defendant had possession, at least the greater part of it covered by a chattel mortgage to defendant, the defendant urged the plaintiffs not to levy the attachment, as it would interfere with his (defendant's) business, and also injure Whitsett, and that defendant promised, if Frohardt Brothers would not levy such attachment, he (defendant) would pay their claim, and that Frohardt Brothers refrained from attaching Whitsett's property in defendant's hands, but did subsequently secure a judgment against Whitsett for the amount of their claim; and, further, that defendant was interfered with in his possession of Whitsett's property. The concrete question now presented is whether a finding by the jury that defendant did make an absolute and independent agreement on his own behalf that if Frohardt Brothers did not levy an attachment on Whitsett's property in defendant's hands the defendant would pay the amount of Whitsett's claim to Frohardt Brothers, and compliance with such agreement on the part of Frohardt Brothers was sufficient, notwithstanding the statute of frauds, to justify a judgment in favor of Frohardt Brothers against defendant on his oral promise. The same question in another form is involved in the claim for defendant that, under the evidence, the court erred in leaving it to the jury to say whether the oral promise of the defendant to pay to Frohardt Brothers the amount of their claim against Whitsett was an absolute and independent promise, rather than a collateral promise to pay Whitsett's debt.

This case is one of a class as to which it has been difficult for the courts to state any clear and consistent rule for the application of the statute of frauds, so far as it prohibits the introduction of oral evidence to prove a contract to pay the debt of another. There has been no difficulty in holding that agreements of guaranty, whether made before or after the guaranteed debt has been contracted, are covered by the statute, even though based on an independent consideration of detriment to the creditor or advantage to the guarantor. That is to say, adequate and lawful consideration for an oral contract of guaranty does not take it out of the statute. On the other hand it is well settled (and no citation of authorities in support of the proposition is necessary) that an independent agreement on a distinct consideration to assume and discharge the debt of another may be valid, notwithstanding the statute; as, for instance, where, on such new promise, the original debtor is released, or where the promisor agrees to discharge the debt of another in consideration of his being relieved from liability for his own obligation to the creditor, to whom the debt of such other person is owing. Thus it appears that there may be a binding oral promise to pay an amount due to the promisee from a third person, if supported on a good consideration, but that not every promise to pay the amount due from another to the promisee, although supported on a legal and adequate consideration, is enforceable. The distinction between these two classes of cases seems to be this: Does the promisor, for a consideration of advantage to himself, make an absolute and independent promise to pay the amount due to the promisee from a third person? or is his promise to pay the amount due from such third person merely collateral to the third person's obligation? On the one hand, the release of the original debtor is sufficient to show that the promise to pay his debt is a new, original, and independent promise. On the other hand, if the promisor merely undertakes to pay the debt of another in the event that such other person does not pay it, then the promise is collateral, and the legality and adequacy of the consideration does not take it out of the statute of frauds.

While there was at one time, especially in the English courts, an inclination to treat as collateral, and therefore as within the statute of frauds, every promise to pay the amount of another's debt, the unmistakable weight of the more recent cases, especially in this country, has been in favor of sustaining, as against the statute of frauds, an oral promise to unqualifiedly and absolutely pay another's debt on a consideration of advantage accruing to the promisor from such promise. As was said in Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. 28, 43, 10 L. ed. 360, 365. "Cases in which the guaranty or promise is collateral to the principal contract, but is made at the same time, and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal debtor, are, in general, within the statute of frauds. Other cases arise which also fall within the statute, where the collateral agreement is subsequent to the execution of the debt, and was not the inducement to it, on the ground that the subsisting liability was the foundation of the promise on the part of the defendant, without any other direct and separate consideration moving between the parties. But whenever the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, involving either a benefit to himself or damage to the other contracting party, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may incidentally have the effect of extinguishing that liability." And in Nugent v. Wolfe, 111 Pa. 471, 56 Am. Rep. 291, 4 Atl. 15, this language is used (quoted with approval in Bailey v. Marshall, 174 Pa. 602, 34 Atl. 326): "It is difficult, if not impossible, to formulate a rule by which to determine, in every case, whether a promise, relating to the debt or liability of a third person, is or is not within the statute; but, as a general rule, when the leading object of the promise or agreement is to become guarantor or surety to the promisee for a debt for which a third party is and continues to be primarily liable, the agreement, whether made before or after or at the time with the promise of the principal, is within the statute, and not binding, unless evidenced by writing. On the other hand, when the leading object of the promisor is to subserve some interest or purpose of his own, notwithstanding the effect is to pay or discharge the debt of another, his promise is not within the statute."

The following cases support the general proposition that, if the leading object of the promisor is not to become surety or guarantor of another, but to promote or subserve some interest of his own, his oral promise to pay the amount of another's debt is not within the statute of frauds, even though the original debtor is not released; Tindal v. Touchberry, 3 Strobb. 177, 49 Am. Dec. 637; Smith v. Delaney, 64 Conn. 264, 29 Atl. 496, 42 Am. St. Rep. 181, and note; Joseph v. Smith, 39 Neb. 259, 42 Am. St. Rep. 571, 57 N. W. 1012; Marrow v. White, 151 N. C. 96, 65 S. E. 746; Lorick v. Caldwell, 85 S. C. 94, 67 S. E. 143; Mine & Smelter Supply Co. v. Stockgrowers' Bank, 98 C. C. A. 229, 173 Fed. 859; Oldenburg v. Dorsey, 102 Md. 172, 62 Atl. 576, 5 Ann. Cas. 841.

If the evidence is in conflict as to whether the promise is independent or collateral, the question is for the jury. Davis v. Patrick, 141 U. S. 479, 35 L. ed. 826, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 58; McGowan Commercial Co. v. Midland Coal & Lumber Co. 41 Mont. 211, 108 Pac. 655; Johnson v. Bank, 60 W. Va. 320, 55 S. E. 394, 9 Ann. Cas. 893, and note. Some of the more recent of our own cases on the subject support the rule above announced. Pratt v. Fishwild, 121 Iowa, 642, 98 N. W. 1089; Blake v. Robinson, 129 Iowa, 196, 105 N. W. 401; Harlan v. Harlan, 102 Iowa, 701, 72 N. W. 286; Carraher v. Allen, 112 Iowa, 168, 83 N. W. 902; Miller v. Adams, 142 Iowa, 515, 119 N. W. 593; Helt v. Smith, 74 Iowa, 667, 39 N. W. 81.

It is true that in some of these cases the facts involved did not necessarily require the announcement of such a rule as we are now recognizing. But we cannot properly disregard the repeated announcement of such rule as having been made through misapprehension and oversight. Unless there are in cases in this court which, as applied to the facts of this case, necessarily lead to a different result, we should give heed to our previous repeated statement of a general principle applicable to the case, although it may have been made under circumstances not giving rise to the precise question now before us. We fail to find among the cases in this court relied upon for appellant any decision as to this branch of the statute of frauds, inconsistent with the general proposition already stated. In Westheimer v. Peacock, 2 Iowa, 528, the statute of frauds was applied in an action brought against a father who had orally promised to pay his son's debt; but the court said: "There is nothing to show that the defendant, when he made the promise, had in view or secured a benefit which accrued immediately to himself. On the contrary, his object was to obtain forbearance or benefit to his son. If for his own benefit, the promise would not be within the statute; if for the debtor, it would. And this distinction we think important, and one that is clearly recognized by the authorities." In Sternburg v. Callanan, 14 Iowa, 251, the question was whether the defendant partnership had assumed the individual debt of one of the partners, and the court held the partnership not bound, because there had been no novation, and held the jury should have been instructed that an oral promise by one of the partners to pay the individual debt of another partner could not be established by parol; but the question of the statute of frauds was not otherwise discussed. In Kauffman v. Harstock, 31 Iowa, 472, it was simply held that an agreement, upon certain contingencies, to step into the place of another, as to his debt, and to hold the creditor harmless, was within the statute of frauds. In Dee v. Downs, 57 Iowa, 589, 11 N. W. 2, was involved only the question whether an agreement to become surety for another was within the statute. In Vaughn v. Smith, 65 Iowa, 579, 22 N. W. 684, it was held that there was no new and independent consideration for the oral promise to answer for the debt of another, and that it was therefore within the statute of frauds. In Walker v. Irwin, 94 Iowa, 448, 62 N. W. 785, it was pointed out that the oral agreement relied upon was not an original agreement, but one obligating the promisor to step into the place of the debtor and pay his liability upon certain conditions, and that it was therefore collateral, although the contingencies contemplated had happened; and it is said that the defendant received no personal benefit, so that his obligation was without consideration. In Schaafs v. Wentz, 100 Iowa, 708, 69 N. W. 1022, the oral promise relied upon was held to be collateral, and therefore within the statute. In Griffin v. Hoag, 105 Iowa, 499, 75 N. W. 372, the oral promise relied on was held unenforceable, because a mere naked promise, without consideration of detriment to the promisee or advantage to the promisor. In Winburn v. Fidelity Loan & Bldg. Assn. 110 Iowa, 374, 81 N. W. 682, it was held by a divided court that an oral acceptance by an agent of orders drawn upon him for his principal's funds would not render his principal liable, in the absence of the existence of funds in the hands of the agent out of which the orders could be paid. It is difficult to find any application of the case to the question now under consideration. In Regan v. Kirk, 140 Iowa, 302, 118 N. W. 317, it was held, without discussion that reliance by the promisee on an oral promise to pay the debt of another would not render such promise enforceable.

None of these cases are at all inconsistent in principle with the rule that an oral agreement, entered into on consideration of benefit to the promisor, and relied upon by the promisee to his detriment, to pay to the promisee the amount of the claim of the latter against a third person, may be enforced, without regard to whether the effect of the agreement is to release such third person from his liability; and we reach the conclusion that the court properly submitted to the jury the question whether the oral promise of the defendant to pay to Frohardt Brothers, the amount of their claim against Whitsett was an original and independent obligation, entered into on account of anticipated benefit to defendant, or whether it was merely a collateral agreement to pay Whitsett's debt, and that the judgment against the defendant in favor of Frohardt Brothers should be affirmed.

2. The appeal of Droge Brothers is predicated on a refusal of the trial court to allow them to introduce evidence on two other counts of the original petition. It appears that, as originally filed, the petition was in two counts, one alleging partnership between defendant and Whitsett, and the other charging fraud and conspiracy between them to put the property of the latter beyond the reach of creditors. Subsequently an amendment was filed to the petition, alleging an independent promise of defendant to pay Whitsett's debts to each of the plaintiffs. When the case came on for trial, evidence was presented in behalf of the plaintiffs under the petition as thus amended, but on motion of defendant the court withdrew from the jury the consideration of the issues raised by denial of the first and second counts, and submitted to the jury only the issue as to an independent promise. The jury disagreed on this submission, and when the case came on for retrial the judge held that the previous ruling as to the first two counts constituted in effect an adjudication, and that there could be a trial only on the third count. The record as presented for Droge Brothers shows that the trial court found a determination as to the first and second counts which did in fact constitute an adjudication, and, if so, plainly those counts were not proper subject-matter for further evidence in the case. The mistrial was only as to the issue arising under the third count; that is, the amendment. There was no mistrial as to the first and second counts; for they were never submitted to the jury at all.

The final adjudication may consist of many judgments, or, when the claim consists of several parts or items, such judgments may be for either of the parts, or any specific part or item, of such aggregate claim, and against him on the other part thereof. Code, § 3769. It is not necessary now to determine whether the final adjudication as to the first and second counts was in such form that a separate appeal might have been prosecuted from it, or whether it was an incidental ruling of the trial court, which might be reviewed on appeal from the final judgment. No separate appeal was taken, and on the present appeal there is no claim of error as to the ruling. Under these circumstances, Droge Brothers cannot complain of the action of the trial court in refusing to receive evidence on the last trial in support of the first two counts of the petition.

The judgment of the trial court is therefore, on both appeals, affirmed.

Evans, J., dissenting in part:

I do not agree to the first branch of the majority opinion. It goes beyond any previous decision of this court. In practical effect, it is an evasion of the statute of frauds. My views are expressed in the former opinion filed in this case, which can be found in — Iowa, —, 132 N. W. 31.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, Appt.,
v.

LUDOVIC DALLAGIOVANNA, Respnt.

Perjury — meaning of "swear."

1. To bring one within a statute making guilty of perjury every person who shall

Note. — Perjury as affected by invalidity of proceeding in which testimony is taken.

The early cases upon the question here considered are covered in the note to Morford v. Territory, 54 L.R.A. 513, to which the present note is supplementary.

Jurisdictional defects generally.

As stated in the note referred to, it is well established that perjury cannot be predicated upon a false oath taken in a proceeding before a court which had no jurisdiction to inquire into the matter which was the subject of the proceeding.

Thus, where the county attorney had no jurisdiction to administer an oath and proceed with an investigation of an alleged crime as a court of inquiry, perjury cannot be predicated upon testimony given in such proceeding. Williams v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 269, 96 S. W. 47.

So, where the jurisdiction of corporation courts is limited to cases arising within the corporation limits, an indictment for 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

knowingly swear falsely concerning any matter, he must make a statement under the sanctity of an oath administered by some qualified officer having authority to administer the oath in the particular proceeding or investigation in which the statement is made.

Same — jurisdiction of investigation — necessity.

2. That a committee of a common council is acting under authority to investigate and probe charges made by the acting mayor does not show that the matter under investigation is within the jurisdiction of the council, so as to render an oath taken by a witness appearing before it one "required by law," within the meaning of a statute empowering the officer before whom it was taken to administer such oath, and, therefore, violation of the oath does not necessarily come within a statute making every person who shall swear falsely guilty of perjury.

Messrs. John F. Murphy, and H. B. Butler, for the State:

Notaries public have authority to administer oaths generally wherever the same are required by law.

Cox v. Stern, 170 Ill. 442, 62 Am. St. Rep. 385, 48 N. E. 906; Morris v. State, 2 Tex. App. 502; Norton v. Hauge, 47 Minn. 405, 50 N. W. 368; Lutchner v. United States, 19 C. C. A. 259, 41 U. S. App. 54, 72 Fed. 968; Newcomb v. Indianapolis, 141 Ind. 451, 28 L.R.A. 732, 40 N. E. 919.

perjury which fails to allege that the crime under consideration in the former case was committed within the city limits will be quashed. Moss v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 459, 83 S. W. 820, 11 Ann. Cas. 710.

And where it is not a violation of law to play cards at a house occupied by a family when no bet or wager is made, perjury cannot be predicated upon testimony given before a grand jury which has under investigation merely the question of playing cards at a house occupied by a family. Gallegos v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 190, 95 S. W. 123.

The fact, however, that a complaint for the same offense had already been made before a justice of the peace at the time one charged with perjury testified before a grand jury will not prevent his conviction on the theory that the matter had been placed beyond the jurisdiction of the grand jury. Wilks v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 66 S. W. 787.

And the fact that the grand jury which indicted defendant for perjury had previously indicted him for bigamy, and that Messrs. Vanderveer & Cummings, for respondent:

Peter A. Kimple had no authority to administer an oath to the defendant under the circumstances recited in the indictment.

Ex parte Conrades, 185 Mo. 411, 85 S. W. 160; State v. Carpenter, 164 Mo. 588, 65 S. W. 255; Com. v. Hillenbrand, 96 Ky. 407, 29 S. W. 287; Kerfoot v. Com. 89 Ky. 174, 12 S. W. 189; State v. McCarthy, 41 Minn. 59, 42 N. W. 599; Re Van Tine, 12 How. Pr. 507; Morford v. Territory, 10 Okla. 741, 54 L.R.A. 513, 63 Pac. 958; Gallegos v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 190, 95 S. W. 123.

both charges involved the fact that he had married a certain person on a given date, does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to try the indictment for perjury, so that perjury cannot be predicated upon false testimony given on such trial. People v. Collins, 6 Cal. App. 492, 92 Pac. 513.

And where the record fails to show that a motion to withdraw a plea of not guilty was granted, or that the plea was withdrawn, and it appears that the case was subsequently tried on the merits, there is an issue before the court, and one who testifies falsely may be convicted of perjury. State v. Gregg, 123 La. 610, 49 So. 211.

Defects in organization or constitution of tribunals.

An irregularity in the appointment of a master in chancery to take testimony, in that he was not designated in the order by any official title, cannot be questioned on the trial of one charged with perjury, who testified before such officer. Markey v. State, 47 Fla. 38, 37 So. 53.

And where the parties in proceedings to take depositions waive the issuance of the commission provided for by statute, the failure to appoint such a commission does not render the proceeding void, and perjury may be predicated upon testimony taken in the proceedings. Manning v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 326, 81 S. W. 957, 3 Ann. Cas. 867.

And the fact that no paper was filed in a pending case showing a necessity for the taking of a deposition, as required by statute, does not show a lack of authority on the part of the officer taking the deposition, where the parties and their attorneys voluntarily appeared and testified, and a conviction for perjury may be had where false testimony is given. State v. Woolridge, 45 Or. 389, 78 Pac. 333.

When the court had lost or exceeded its jurisdiction.

Where the Constitution and statutes require the defendant in a prosecution for a felony to be present during the trial, one who testifies in a proceeding in which the accused, who was charged with a felony, was absent while testimony was given and

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the state from an order of the superior court for King county sustaining appellant's demurrer to an indictment found against him by the grand jury in that court, charging him with perjury in the second degree. The following is all of the language of the indictment requiring our attention: "On the 26th day of September, A. D. 1910, the city council of the city of Seattle duly and regularly passed a resolution, and on the same day the same was duly filed as required by law, which said resolution was as follows: 'Be it until the end of the trial, cannot be convicted of perjury, since such trial is void. Emery v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 423, 136 Am. St. Rep. 988, 123 S. W. 133. The court said: "The presence, therefore, of the accused in court and before the jury during the trial of this case is a jurisdictional question, and such presence is absolutely necessary to the validity of the trial. There are three facts that seem to be absolutely necessary to the jurisdiction of the court, or as jurisdictional questions: first, the court must have jurisdiction of the person; second, of the subject-matter; and, third, to render the particular judgment rendered. Otherwise, the prosecution will be void, as also the judgment. . . . All the cases hold that the jurisdiction of the person is essential to the validity of a proceeding, otherwise it is a nullity and void. This rule has been followed in Texas in all its history. . . . If this rule is correct, and there seems to be absolutely no question of it, then it is necessary that the court have jurisdiction of the person in order to make valid the judgment rendered. Under the provisions of our law, constitutional and statutory, it is necessary, in order to constitute perjury, that the court have jurisdiction of the person on trial in order to render the testimony of the witnesses, given on that trial, false, or in fact testimony at all; and without the presence of an accused in a felony case during the introduction of the evidence, the court is without authority to try the case; and being without authority, its proceedings would be necessarily void. The same rule applies in cases where the court has not acquired jurisdiction of the person under necessary process or pleadings, although, in fact, the accused was tried. . . . It would follow, therefore, that false evidence given in a matter which is a void prosecution is not perjury."

Where the Code provides that every proceeding is judicial within the meaning of the act, which is held before any person acting as a court, justice, or tribunal having power to hold such judicial proceeding, whether duly constituted or not, and whether the proceeding was duly instituted or not before such court or person, so as to authorize it or him to hold the proceeding, resolved by the city council of the city of Seattle: That, whereas, it appears that during the absence of H. C. Gill, mayor of the city of Seattle, one of our members, elected by this body as the acting president, has been required under the charter of the city of Seattle to assume the important office of acting mayor, and whereas, the said member has, during such incumbency in that office, endeavored to subordinate the vicious element of the city to the rule of law, and by strict enforcement of the ordinances of the city has, as far as possible within the time at his command, done much to restore the city to a state of order and cleanliness, and whereas, in his effort to enforce the laws, he is reported to have found conditions which indicate the existence of corruption on the part of certain persons connected with the administration of civic affairs, now, therefore: be it resolved, that we commend Mr. Max Wardall, acting mayor, for the vigorous and courageous stand he has made to bring about better conditions in the city, and pledge him the sympathy and support of this body, of which he is a member. And furthermore, be it resolved, that, in furthering that end, a committee of five be appointed by this council to investigate and probe the charand although such proceeding was held in a wrong place, or was otherwise invalid, one may be convicted of perjury who testifies falsely before a magistrate assuming to act as a justice of the peace, having authority to hear a complaint, although, on account of residence in another county, he had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the complaint, since it is a judicial proceeding within the meaning of the act. Drew v. Rex, 33 Can. S. C. 228.

Defects in preliminary matters affecting the jurisdiction in the particular case.

The fact that the defendant in a prosecution had not pleaded to the indictment, although it may constitute reversible error, does not render the trial void, so that a conviction for perjury may not be had against one who swears falsely therein. State v. Walton, 53 Or. 557, 101 Pac. 389. The court said: "Perjury cannot be committed in a judicial proceeding absolutely void for want of jurisdiction. . . . But where the court before whom the oath of a witness is taken has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and the testimony given is material to the inquiry then before the court, false swearing is perjury, though the proceedings may be so irregular or erroneous as to require a reversal on appeal. . . . The statutes of this state provide: 'If any person . . . of whom an oath or affirmation shall be required by such law shall wilfully swear or affirm falsely in regard to any matter or thing concerning which such oath or affirmation is authorized or required, such person shall be deemed guilty of perjury.' § 1875. The court in which the testimony of Johnson and Hogeboom was given had jurisdiction of the case then on trial. They were required by law to take an oath or affirmation to tell the truth (§ 694); and, if the evidence given by them was material to the inquiry then before the court, perjury could be assigned thereon, if it was wilfully false, notwithstanding the proceedings were so irregular as to require a reversal on appeal. The irregularities or errors on the trial were matters which concerned the defendant in the case, but not the witnesses who testified therein. It would be no defense for them, if charged with perjury, to show that the court committed error in the proceeding, provided it had jurisdiction. It would be most unreasonable to require that all proceedings of a court, in which a witness testified falsely, 'should be in strict conformity to law before the witness could be proceeded against for perjury. Such a rule would change the parties and issues, and, instead of trying a perjurer for false swearing, the court would be called upon to review the judgment of the court in which the false swearing occurred.'

And where one brought before a police magistrate made no objection to the manner in which he had been brought before such officer, or to the manner in which the charge was laid, but testified in his own behalf, the evidence is given in a judicial proceeding within the meaning of § 171 of the Code, and he may be convicted of perjury. Rex v. Yaldon, 17 Ont. L. Rep. 179, 12 Ont. Week. Rep. 384.

It is proper in a prosecution for perjury to refuse to give an instruction that the information in the former proceeding was defective and did not charge a crime, since the question of the validity of such information is for the court in which the trial was had. People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 87 Pac. 384, 389.

And the fact that an indictment for perjury charges that the defendant was being tried in the proceeding in which the false testimony was given for two separate offenses at the same time does not render it demurrable, since, if the court had jurisdiction of the two offenses, even though they were improperly joined in the same proceeding, a conviction could be had for perjury. Gardner v. State, 80 Ark. 264, 97 S. W. 48.

When want of jurisdiction arises from facts dehors the record.

Where a bill for divorce contains allegations that the parties have been residents of the state for the period required in order to enable them to maintain such a bill, a conviction for perjury in swearing falsely before a master appointed to make testimony in the proceeding will not be barred, although, upon the trial of the complaint for perjury, it appears that the parties had not been residents of the state for the time

ges made by the acting mayor, and report back to this body at the earliest time possible. . . . In pursuance of said resolution, and on said 20th day of September, 1910, a committee of five persons, namely, E. L. Blaine, J. Y. C. Kellogg, T. P. Revelle, V. P. Hart, and James Conway, were duly appointed as a committee under said resolution; and, immediately thereupon, they and each of them assumed their office as said committee. On the 21st day of October, 1910, said committee were in session at said city of Seattle, and were at said time investigating charges of corruption on the part of certain persons connected with the administration of civic affairs in said city, and on the said 21st day of October, A. D. 1910, he, said Ludovic Dallagiovanna, appeared in person before said committee in said city of Seattle, at one of its sessions then being had and held, and he, said Ludovic Dallagiovanna, then and there being, was then and there duly sworn as a witness before said committee, by and before Peter A. Kimple, who was then a duly appointed, qualified, and acting notary public in and for the state of Washington, residing at said city of Seattle, that the evidence which he would give before said committee should be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; he, said Peter A. Kimple, as such notary public, then and there having sufficient and competent power and authority to administer said oath to said Ludovic Dallagiovanna in that behalf, and said Ludovic Dallagiovanna, being so sworn as aforesaid, did then and there knowingly, wilfully, and feloniously swear falsely that he, said Ludovic Dallagiovanna, did not then have any interest in the Sixth Avenue Hotel in the said city of Seattle, and that he did not have anything to do with said Sixth Avenue Hotel, and that he had never received any money out of said Sixth Ave-specified. Markey v. State, 47 Fla. 39, 37 So. 53. The court said: "The circuit court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the divorce, and in the proceeding to obtain it, to take testimony upon the question of the two years' residence alleged. If it should be conceded that the jurisdiction of the circuit court to grant the divorce depended upon the truthfulness of the allegation with respect to residence, as contended by plaintiff in error, still the allegation of such residence gave the court jurisdiction to inquire as to its truthfulness, and false swearing upon the inquiry had in respect thereto would be perjury. In other words, we might admit that if the allegation with respect to residence was untrue, the decree of divorce granted upon false testimony sustaining its truth would be void, and yet hold the party giving the false testimony guilty of perjury, for the court, having jurisdiction over the matter of divorce and actions therefor, necessarily had jurisdiction to take testimony concerning allegations essential to the right to grant it, and false testimony respecting these matters will be perjury, even though the decree of divorce should be held to be void for the reason that in fact these allegations were untrue."

Defects not affecting jurisdiction generally.

According to the statement in the early note, it is well established that facts, errors, or irregularities in the proceedings in which perjury is charged to have been committed, though sufficiently serious to require a reversal, will not defeat a charge of perjury unless they are jurisdictional.

And although an information is voidable on the ground that it does not charge the offense with sufficient detail, where the accused proceeds with the hearing without objection, he cannot complain that perjury cannot be assigned on false testimony given 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by him at such hearing. State v. Perry, 117 Iowa, 463, 91 N. W. 765.

And notwithstanding that an information is invalid and subject to be quashed on motion, yet a prosecution for perjury may be predicated upon false testimony given on the trial. Kelley v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 507, 103 S. W. 189.

Matters especially affecting sanction under which testimony is given.

As to whether perjury may be predicated of false swearing where no oath or the particular one administered was not required, see note to State v. Parrish, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 96.

It is not material to the charge of perjury whether the defendant was sworn in the former trial in the usual form or otherwise. People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 240, 63 Pac. 351.

And the omission from the oath administered of the words "So help you God," as provided by statute, is an irregularity in form, and not of substance, and is no defense in a prosecution for perjury. People v. Parent, 139 Cal. 600, 73 Pac. 423.

And where a statute declares that it shall be no defense to a prosecution for perjury that the oath was administered or taken in an irregular manner, the fact that the form of the oath set forth in an indictment for perjury is not precisely the same as given in the statute will not prevent a conviction, where the oath set forth is in substance the same. People v. Collins, 6 Cal. App. 492, 92 Pac. 513.

Matters relating to jury.

The fact that the jury were not sworn will not entitle the defendant to a verdict of not guilty in a subsequent trial for perjury. Schooler v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 331, 106 S. W. 359.

nue Hotel, and that he did not then know who was then running said Sixth Avenue Hotel."

The arguments of counsel for both sides are directed to the question of the authority of the notary public before whom it is charged respondent took the oath to administer an oath under the circumstances recited in the indictment. The arguments proceeded upon the assumption that this is the controlling question touching the sufficiency of the facts alleged to constitute the crime of perjury in the second degree, which is defined by § 2353, Rem. & Bal. Code, as follows: "Every person who, whether orally or in writing, and whether as a volunteer or in a proceeding or investigation authorized by law, shall knowingly swear falsely concerning any matter whatsoever, shall be guilty of perjury in the second degree."

It is manifest that the word "swear," as used in this section, means to state a fact or facts under the sanctity of an oath or affirmation administered by some duly qualified officer having authority to administer the oath in the particular proceeding or investigation in which the statement of the affiant is to be made.

Counsel for the state rest their claim of authority in behalf of the notary administering the oath mentioned in the indictment, upon the following language of § 8298, Rem. & Bal. Code: "Every duly qualified notary public is authorized in any county in this state: . . . (3) To take depositions and affidavits, and administer all oaths required by law to be administered. . . ." Now, whatever may be said as to the binding force of an oath as a basis for a perjury charge of this nature, administered by some other officer having powers defined by other statutory provisions, we are here dealing with the powers of a notary public as defined by this law, from which it is plain that a notary public cannot administer any oath with any binding force in law, except such oath is "required by law." Whether or not the oath here involved was so required depends upon the powers of the committee in the particular proceeding or investigation they were engaged in at the time the alleged false statements were made before it. That the indictment must affirmatively state facts showing that the proceeding or investigation before the committee was such as lay within its power to investigate by requiring the sworn testimony of witnesses seems too elementary to call for argument or citation of authorities in support thereof. This indictment fails to inform us of the nature of the matter the committee was authorized by the resolution to investigate with any degree of certainty. The resolution only purports to authorize the committee "to investigate and probe charges made by the acting mayor." Whom those charges were against or what they consisted of is scarcely hinted at by the language of the resolution quoted in the information. The facts alleged, we think, are not sufficient to affirmatively show that the committee was investigating a matter which was within either the council or its jurisdiction. This being so, it does not affirmatively appear from the language of the charge made that the oath was one "required by law;" and hence the administration of such oath by the notary public had no such binding force as is necessary to support a charge of perjury. The law relating to false sworn statements as a basis of a perjury charge, when such statements are made in a proceeding before a court or tribunal having no jurisdiction over the subject of inquiry, is well stated in the note to Morford v. Territory, 54 L.R.A. 513, as follows: "It is established by numerous cases and beyond question that perjury cannot be predicated of a false oath in a proceeding before a court which had no jurisdiction to inquire into the matter which was the subject of that proceeding." The application of this principle is illustrated in Gallegos v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 190, 95 S. W. 123, where there was involved the jurisdiction of a grand jury. The court said: "So it would appear that the grand jury were investigating or inquiring about a matter which was not a violation of the law. The court had no jurisdiction to make an inquiry except such matter as is an offense against the laws of the state of Texas. See the matter of jurisdiction discussed in McDonough v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 227, 122 Am. St. Rep. 684, 84 S. W. 594. The grand jury having under investigation a matter which was not an offense, perjury could not be predicated on false testimony delivered during such investigation."

We agree with the learned trial court, and affirm his ruling in sustaining respondent's demurrer to the indictment.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

WILLIAM H. CADWELL, Appt.,

v.

CONNECTICUT COMPANY.

(85 Conn. 401, 83 Atl. 215.)

Highway — additional servitude — electric railway.

1. The mere fact that an electric railway is constructed in a public street with T-rails, and that its cars are operated by the use of wires and poles, does not show that it is an additional servitude on the highway.

Same — freight cars — through traffic — effect.

2. The running upon an interurban electric railway constructed in a public street, of cars designed to carry property only, which run from terminus to terminus without stopping to receive and discharge contents, and discharging such contents at the two termini only, impose an additional servitude on the fee.

This note does not discuss the right of an interurban railway company to exercise the power of eminent domain.

The interurban railway has been defined as a railway operated on the streets of a city or town by electricity, or by other power than steam, which extends beyond the corporate limits of such city or town to another city, town, or village, or, any railway operated by other power than steam extending from one city, town, or village to another city, town, or village. Supplement to Iowa Code, § 2033a. And the court in Cedar Rapids & M. C. R. Co. v. Cummins, 125 Iowa, 430, 101 N. W. 176, approves of 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ty sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged invasion of plaintiff's rights as owner of the soil of the highway, by running interurban electric railway cars therein. Reversed.

Statement by Prentice, J.:

The action was to recover damages by reason of the defendant's operation of its electric street railway over the plaintiff's land within the highway and in front of his premises. The complaint alleges the plaintiff's ownership and possession of a tract of land in New Britain bounded on one side by West Main street. The remaining allegations are the following: "(2) Running between the town of Plainville and this definition, saying that it accords with the common understanding.

Interurban railways are of a hybrid character and partake to some extent of the nature of both street railways and commercial railroads. In cities and towns they resemble street railways in many respects,—they are operated upon the streets, their cars stop at street corners for the accommodation of passengers, and the road bed is constructed so as to conform to the grade of the streets, and not to interfere with the traffic thereon. In the country, however, the modern lines are constructed to a large extent upon private rights of way, upon road beds similar in construction to steam railroads, with the T-rail, and, in some cases, upon graded and rock ballasted roads; the cars run at a high rate of speed, stop only at designated stations, and usually are larger and heavier than ordinary street cars. In fact, they are becoming more and more like commercial railroads. Many of them carry mail, express, and light freight; some of them carry heavy freight, a few of them operate special freight trains, while on some of the western lines sleeping cars have been added to the limited trains. Booth, Street Railways, 2d ed. § 431.

"In respect of motor power employed, and especially of the character of the service rendered, many suburban and even interurban electric railways, especially in populous localities, more resemble what are called street railways, than ordinary steam railways. They facilitate traffic, communication, and transportation. They do not destroy or seriously interfere with the ordinary modes of using the streets and highways, and when legislatively authorized they seem to be a proper use of the street or highway, for which the legislature may or may not provide compensation to the abutter as it may determine,—the rule of justice dictating that where the value of the abutter's property is lessened over and beyond the benefits received, the legislature ought to provide that he should be paid in money for such diminished value. . . . Such a line may stand in a class by itself, the town of New Britain there has been constructed an electric railway, the track of which is built with T-rails, and the cars of which are operated by the use of said track and certain poles and wires. (3) A part of said track built with T-rails, one of said poles, and certain of said wires are located upon and over a part of said land, above described, which is covered by a public highway called West Main street. (4) On or about June 1, 1907, the defendant, for the purposes of maintaining said electric railway as described upon said land, and for the further purpose of operating said electric railway upon said land as a common carrier of persons and property by means of street cars, and for the further purpose of operating said electric railway upon said land as a common carrier of property by means of cars which are solely designed for and which carry property exclusively, and which do not stop as they run, to take on and discharge said property, and have a station in the town of Plainville and the town of New Britain, at which they stop to take on and discharge said property, unlawfully entered upon that part of said land, above described, which is covered by said public highway called West Main street, and ever since its entry, day by day, has maintained said electric railway as described upon said land; and ever since its entry, day by day, has operated said electric railway upon said land as a common carrier of persons and property by means of street cars, and ever since its entry, day and it does not seem to the author that, simply because it connects different places, it necessarily imposes an additional burden upon the abutter. Each case must be considered on its circumstances. Each line is what it is, and not something else." 3 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. p. 2032, note.

"Starting with the well-settled propositions that the street passenger railway is a legitimate street use, and that the commercial railroad is not, it does not seem difficult to dispose of the interurban railroad. In so far as it is operated as a street passenger railway, in aid of local travel, stopping at street crossings or at convenient intervals to take up and let down passengers, it is on the same basis as the urban street railway. If not operated for the accommodation of local travel, and in substantially the same manner as the urban street railway, it should be classed with the commercial railroad, with the consequent liability to abutting owners. Such a railroad, with its trains sweeping across the country at 20 or 30 miles an hour, and sometimes more, stopping only at cities and towns and at infrequent intervals in the country, and in the cities and towns stopping only for the accommodation of its interurban passengers, and not at all for local traffic on the street, is clearly analogous to the steam railroad, and competes with it and it alone. . . . If the interurban railroad carries freight as well as passengers, the analogy to the steam railroad is complete." 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 3d ed. § 165.

Original taking for interurban purposes.

It seems to be the general rule in recent cases that an interurban railway carrying passengers, baggage, freight, express, and mail, is considered as an additional burden upon the street or highway. Thus, the owner of the fee in a common which is subject to rights of access over it to the public street, in favor of adjoining owners, is entitled to more than nominal damages for the added burden imposed by the construction and operation of an interurban railway upon a public street passing through the common. Buffalo, L. & R. R. Co. v. Hoyer, 147 App. Div. 205, 132 N. Y. Supp. 31.

And as against demurrer, a complaint charging that an electric railway company operates cars designed and used for carrying property exclusively, and which run from terminus to terminus between two towns some miles distant from each other without stopping to receive or discharge contents, this being done at the termini only, sets up a good cause of action for damages in favor of an abutting owner for the increased burden. CADWELL v. CONNECTICUT CO.

Likewise, when a steam railroad, in locating its tracks over a farm, condemns land for highway purposes, and the original highway is abandoned, such abandoned strip reverts to the abutting owner, and the steam railroad cannot grant to an interurban railroad the right to use that strip without payment of damages to the abutting owner. Miller v. Cincinnati, L. & A. Electric Street R. Co. 43 Ind. App. 540, 88 N. E. 102.

The same doctrine is recognized in the following cases:

—in Wilbur Lumber Co. v. Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Co. 134 Wis. 352, 114 N. W. 815, where it is held that under a statute authorizing condemnation proceedings by an interurban railway, if the company neglects to act, the abutting owner may proceed for the assessment of substantial damages;

—in Swinhart v. St. Louis & Suburban R. Co. 207 Mo. 423, 105 S. W. 1043, where an injunction was granted in favor of the abutting owner against such use of the street by a suburban railway company as practically to destroy the usefulness of the street to him;

—in Spalding v. Macomb & W. I. R. Co. 225 Ill. 585, 80 N. E. 327, where it is held that a railroad carrying not only passengers, but all kinds of freight and merchandise, from point to point on city streets, and from town to town, is not a street railway, but a commercial road, and that un-by day, has operated said electric railway upon said land as a common carrier of property by means of cars which are solely designed for and which carry property exclusively, and which do not stop as they run, to take on and discharge said property, and have a station in the town of Plainville and the town of New Britain at which they stop to take on and discharge said property."

Mr. Charles H. Mitchell, for appellant:

The construction of any kind of railway in a highway, the soil of which belongs in fee to the adjoining proprietors, is a trespass upon their land, unless it has been duly authorized by law. The use of a highway for ordinary travel is a matter of common right; but to lay down upon it a fixed structure of a permanent character, designed for the use of vehicles of a peculiar description, moving upon invariable lines of track, cannot be justified without a special franchise proceeding from the state.

Messrs. Robinson & Robinson and Francis W. Cole, for appellee:

Legislative authority for the location of a railway upon a highway is all that the law requires, unless such railway be an additional servitude.

Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co. 69 Conn. 146, 36 Atl. 1107; McKeon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 75 Conn. 343, 61 L.R.A. 730, 53 Atl. 656; Knapp & C. Mfg. Co. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 76 Conn. 311, 100 Am. St. Rep. 994, 56 Atl. 512.

The T-rail is not an additional servitude. If the top of the rail is flush with the surface of the road, and the space between the rails is filled in, it is immaterial whether the rail is a T-rail or a grooved rail. The important thing is that the rail conform to the established grade of the highway.

The mere carriage of property does not make a street railway an additional servitude upon a highway.

less it has compensated the owner of the fee in the street, it may be ordered to remove its road, even after operations have begun. In this case the railroad was not authorized to use steam, but was doing so in contravention of its charter and of a city ordinance; —and in Greene v. Aurora R. Co. 84 C. C. A. 589, 157 Fed. 85, where an injunction was granted to an abutting owner with the fee to the center of the street, against the use of such street by a commercial railroad company, it not being quite clear whether it was an electric or a steam railroad.

A petition by an interurban railroad company in proceedings to condemn land for right of way is fatally defective if it does not include, as parties defendant, all the nonagreeing landowners whose lands are to be taken. Kansas City Interurban R. Co. v. Davis, 197 Mo. 669, 114 Am. St. Rep. 790, 95 S. W. 881.

But in Tomlin v. Cedar Rapids & I. C. R. & Light Co. 141 Iowa, 599, 22 L.R.A. (N. S.) 530, 120 N. W. 93, it is held by a divided court that, by virtue of an ordinance vacating a part of a street, giving an interurban railway company the right to use the part so vacated for a right of way, and granting its use subject to such right of way to the city, so much of the street ceases to be a street; the right of the public therein is devested, and it becomes private property, and an interurban road located thereon does not entitle the abutting owner to damages.

For other cases, as to whether an interurban railroad is an additional servitude upon rural or city highways, see note to Rasch v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 673, IV. b, 4, p. 728.

Use of street railroad tracks for interurban purposes.

The earlier cases upon the question of damages to abutting owner for right to run interurban cars over tracks of a street railway company are collected in the note to Gosa v. Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 531.

When a line of road originally used only for urban street car service is later subjected to interurban service as well, this new use is deemed an added burden, for which the abutting owner is entitled to compensation. Thus, a traction company authorized to operate a line of road within a municipality as a street railway only may not lawfully, by contract with an interurban railroad company which is without authority to enter such municipality, gain the right to carry the cars of the latter upon the streets of the city without the permission of the city, even under a statute giving railroad companies power to make contracts and arrangements with each

Prentice, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Acts done within the limits of a highway may work an actionable injury to the property rights of an abutting proprietor and occupant by virtue of either his ownership of the fee of the land covered by the highway, or his ownership and possession of the abutting property. Cadwell v. Connecticut R. & Lighting Co. 84 Conn. 450, 452, 80 Atl. 285. In the former case the acts may constitute a trespass. This is the case whenever the acts, being without authority or in excess of authority, are such as impose an additional servitude upon the land covered by the highway. Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co. 69 Conn. 146, 161, 36 Atl. 1107; Norwich Gas-light Co. v. Norwich City Gas Co. 25 Conn. 19; Nicholson v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 22 Conn. 74, 56 Am. Dec. 390; Munson v. Mallory, 36 Conn. 165, 172, 4 Am. Rep. 52. In the latter case the injured party has his remedy as for a nuisance. Cadwell v. Connecticut R. & Lighting Co. 84 Conn. 450, 454, 80 Atl. 285.

This action, unlike that last cited, which was also brought by this plaintiff against this defendant, and dealt with the same other for leasing or running their roads, and the right of connecting with each other on terms agreed upon by the companies. The effect of such an arrangement would be to confer upon the interurban company authority to extend its line into the streets of the city, and operate its cars thereon, without any reference to the objections of the city or of private individuals who may own the fee of the streets, and such is not the law. Aurora v. Elgin, A. & S. Traction Co. 227 Ill. 485, 118 Am. St. Rep. 284, 81 N. E. 544.

And an interurban railroad company, having taken over the property of a street railway company, neither one of which is authorized to carry on a freight business within the municipality, cannot engage in the freight business within such municipality without compensating an abutting owner for all damages, past, present, and future, caused by such new use of the tracks; and this is true although the fee to the street is in the city, and although the city may have a legal remedy to stop the carrying on of the freight business, but has not resorted to it. Rockford & Interurban R. Co. v. Keyt, 117 Ill. App. 32.

The same principle is recognized in Murdock v. Beloit, D. L. & J. R. Co. 147 Wis. 100, 132 N. W. 979, the chief question in that case being as to the measure of damages; and in Schuster v. Milwaukee Elec- 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

general situation, is one which belongs to the former class. It seeks redress, as the former did not, for an alleged invasion of the plaintiff's rights as owner of the soil of the highway through certain conduct of the defendant therein, which is set out and claimed to have been without right. The two cases thus have little in common. In the former we were dealing with an alleged nuisance affecting injuriously the rights of the plaintiff as an abutting owner; in the present, with a claimed trespass done to the land within the highway limits.

This complaint is not drafted with precision, in that it does not directly aver either the plaintiff's ownership and possession of the land over which the highway is laid out, or the defendant's invasion of the plaintiff's rights therein by its acts set up. There are, however, allegations from which these averments may well be inferred, and in which it was evidently intended that they should be included, so that the purpose of the pleader to charge a trespass upon the land within the highway, through the operation of the recited acts of the defendant in imposing an additional servitude thereon, is apparent. Counsel for the plaintiff so interprets his pleadings, and counsel for the defendant accept it as sufficiently alleging a cause of action of that character.

The latter suggests that a cause of action for a nuisance may also be within the tric R. & Light Co. 142 Wis. 578, 126 N. W. 26, where it is held that an abutting owner holding the fee to the center of the street, subject only to the public easement therein, including the maintenance and operation of a street railway, is entitled to an injunction against the use of the street railway tracks by a connecting interurban company, which is not authorized to operate inside the city limits, the court saying that such a use of the street railway tracks is unlawful, not only as against the individual abutting owner, but against the public as well.

When an interurban railway company has been conducting its business for some time within a municipality, over the line of a street railway which it owns, and the franchise of which is to continue only fifty years, and later the interurban company seeks to condemn land in the same streets for a permanent interurban line, subject to the duty to continue the operation of the street cars as defined by the street railway franchise, the damages to be awarded the abutting owner are not simply those sustained by the mere operation of interurban cars over street railway tracks, but such as flow from the appropriation of a permanent right of way for the interurban railway. Marsh v. Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Co. 134 Wis. 384, 114 N. W. 804.

H. C. Sh.

purview of the allegations. Plaintiff's counsel makes no such claim, and there appears to be no substantial basis for it. It is quite evident that the averments respecting rails and structures, which the plaintiff makes, and which alone give color to the suggestion that the complaint may be regarded as comprehending a cause of action for a nuisance, were made for no other purpose than as pertinent to the charge that a servitude was being imposed upon the land of the highway in excess of that resulting from the existing highway easement.

We have, then, before us for determination the single question whether or not the allegations of the complaint show the imposition upon the soil of the highway of an additional servitude. In answering this question it is first of all important to know what legislative authority, if any, the defendant had to construct and operate an electric street railway in front of the plaintiff's premises. The complaint is silent upon this subject, and unless we can gather adequate information upon it through the exercise of that judicial knowledge which we have of its charter rights, the defendant will be left in the position of one who invades a highway with a street railway without legislative authority. If that is the position which the defendant occupies before the court under its demurrer, it is clear that it was improperly sustained. It is not easy to discover how it can escape from this position with its inevitable result, since the charter informs us only that it has legislative authority to construct and operate for the carriage of both persons and property its tracks through a portion of West Main street. Where that portion is in relation to the plaintiff's property we are not told, and neither legal presumptions nor § 3840 of the General Statutes, suffice to supply the deficiency.

If, however, it is assumed that the defendant has constructed and operated its road in front of the plaintiff's property under such conditions as to entitle it to the full benefit of the charter and statute authority to utilize it for the transportation of passengers and property, as counsel agree that the fact is, and ask us to assume, we are under the necessity of examining the allegations to learn whether they set up any conduct on the defendant's part outside of the limits of the authority thus attempted to be conferred, or within those limits, but without the power of the general assembly to confer in the absence of compensation to landowners.

The allegation that it has constructed its tracks with T-rails, and that its cars are operated upon such tracks and by the use of 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) of certain wires and poles, in the absence of further information, may be dismissed from present consideration. It is true that an additional servitude may result from methods of construction and operation, but the bald facts here stated are altogether insufficient to establish such a condition as that principle contemplates. Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co. 69 Conn. 146, 159, 36 Atl. 1107; Nieman v. Detroit Suburban Street R. Co. 103 Mich. 256, 260, 61 N. W. 519; Newell v. Minneapolis L. & M. R. Co. 35 Minn. 112, 59 Am. Rep. 303, 27 N. W. 839; Mordhurst v. Ft. Wayne & S. W. Traction Co. 163 Ind. 268, 66 L.R.A. 105, 106 Am. St. Rep. 222, 71 N. E. 642, 2 Ann. Cas. 967.

The other conduct complained of is the unlawful entry upon the land of the highway for the purpose of maintaining its electric railway, of operating this railway upon said land as a common carrier of persons and property by means of street cars, and of operating said railway upon said land as a common carrier of property by means of cars designed solely for and carrying property exclusively, and which run without stopping between termini located in different towns, which termini are the only points where what is carried is either taken on or discharged, and the continued doing in fact of these things for the period of several years prior to the commencement of the action.

Here are three distinct grounds of complaint. The first, that the defendant is maintaining in the street an electric street railway, using poles and wires in its operation and T-rails for its tracks, calls for no extended consideration. The Canastota Knife Company Case, supra, effectually disposes of any contention that the construction and operation according to customary methods, and without especial features creating exceptional conditions, of an electric street railway having its rails laid on a level with the surface of the highway, and designed and used for the accommodation of passenger travel, imposes an additional servitude upon the soil of the highway. There is no suggestion in this portion of the complaint that the service performed by the defendant's railway is other than the customary passenger service, that the manner of its construction, operation, or use differs in any respect from the ordinary, or is marked by special features which would tend to give to it a different character from that of the regulation electric street railway, except perhaps the fact that T-rails are used. The inadequacy of this isolated fact we have already had occasion to notice.

The two remaining grounds of complaint import another factor into the situation, and one which takes it outside of the direct application of the decision in the Canastota Knife Co. Case, and of all other Connecticut decisions. It calls for a consideration of the rights of an electric street railway company in the matter of property transportation, directly for hire, and not as an incident of passenger service. The complaint contains certain charges involving this subject. If, in the doing of any of the things so charged, the defendant is going further in its use of the highway than it can properly do within the limits of the highway easement, a good cause of action is stated.

The subject of the ability of an electric street railway company having the customary construction and operation in a highway, to become a carrier of things without imposing an additional servitude, has been much discussed in the cases and by text writers, and with widely varying results. In at least one jurisdiction it has been broadly held that highways are as open to use in the transportation of property by street railways as in that of persons, and that such carriage of property generally is not a new and independent use. Montgomery v. Santa Anna Westminster R. Co. 104 Cal. 186, 25 L.R.A. 654, 43 Am. St. Rep. 89, 37 Pac. 786.

This broad conclusion has not met with general acceptance, and we are unable to appreciate the force of the reasoning by which it has been supported. To say that, because highways ever have been and are established and maintained for purposes of public travel, and in their conception and purpose are, and from the earliest times have been, set apart for transportation thereon of the things as well as persons, and for the convenience and service of the public by providing means for such transportation, it follows that any and all use of the highway for the transportation of things, no matter what they are, or how, or for what purpose or end, or for whose benefit or convenience they are carried, or what effect their carriage, or the method of it (physical features of the system apart), may have upon the enjoyment of the highway by the public generally, or by the abutting property owner, is, we think, to ignore possible factors in a situation which might possess large, if not controlling, importance.

The highway conception involves the idea of an agency for the common use and accommodation of all the public,—of a use from the enjoyment of which no one shall be unreasonably excluded by the operations of others, and in the enjoyment of which no one shall be unreasonably hindered or annoyed. Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington

Tramway Co. 69 Conn. 146, 156, 36 Atl. 1107. In that conception the highway becomes a place set apart for the convenience and benefit of members of the local community, and of the adjacent landowner among others. It contemplates that its use and enjoyment by those who have occasion to use it shall not be of such character as to unreasonably interfere with its free and beneficial enjoyment by these persons, or to be "the proximate cause of special damage of a new description to the owner of the soil." Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co. 69 Conn. 146, 156, 36 Atl. 1107, 1111; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 70 Conn. 610, 615, 40 Atl. 607, 41 Atl. 169. We are therefore unprepared to say that any change in highway use which might attend the carriage of property over public ways, whatever its character, and however conducted (construction of the road and structures in the highway aside), would be one of degree only, and not of kind, and that the highway would remain in all essential particulars unchanged in character, purpose, and use under all conditions of property transportation over it. It is easy to conceive of conditions, and by no means remote ones, under which it could not be said fairly that the use was in aid of the identical use for which the way was created, and not a new and independent use; and this is a test which must be met and satisfied. This view is one which was plainly foreshadowed in the Canastota Knife Co. Case and the earlier case of Imlay v. Union Branch R. Co. 26 Conn. 249, 68 Am. Dec. 392. In fact, the opinion in the former case went so far as to suggest certain conditions of passenger traffic, independent of construction, which would destroy the identity of use between it and highway use. 69 Conn. 154, 36 Atl. 1107.

Other cases have gone to the other extreme, and held that, where there is a carriage of property, there an additional servitude is necessarily imposed. Wilder v. Aurora D. & R. Electric Traction Co. 216 Ill. 493, 75 N. E. 194; Birmingham Belt R. Co. v. Lockwood, 150 Ala. 610, 43 So. 819; Rische v. Texas Transp. Co. 27 Tex. Civ. App. 33, 66 S. W. 324. The argument upon which this conclusion is based is one to the general effect that, where such conditions exist, the carrier becomes closely assimilated to the ordinary railroads, and should therefore be classed with them in their relation to the highway easement. Some authorities, including text writers, elaborate this argument by dividing carriers using tracks as a medium of transportation into two classes, to wit: (1) The street railway, which is defined to be one laid in highways, and designed and used for passenger transportation only; and (2) the commercial railroad, which term is employed in the classification to embrace the ordinary steam road and all others, whatever the kind of power utilized, and wherever laid, which are carriers of things. This classification having been established, it is said that those of the former class impose no additional servitude, while those of the latter do. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 150; Nellis, Street Railways, § 83; Linden Land Co. v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 107 Wis. 511, 83 N. W. 851; Wilder v. Aurora D. & R. Electric Traction Co. 216 Ill. 493, 75 N. E. 194; Rische v. Texas Transp. Co. 27 Tex. Civ. App. 33, 66 S. W. 324; Schaaf v. Cleveland, M. & S. R. Co. 66 Ohio St. 216, 64 N. E. 135.

The logic of the general proposition enunciated in this class of cases and of this classification is not apparent to us. The purposes for which highways always have been, and now are, laid out, and the right of way therefor acquired, include their use for the transportation thereon of property as well as that of persons. Their intended ministration to the public convenience and advantage is one which comprehends a public service in both capacities. What basis in reason there is for a distinction between conditions which result from the application of like improved methods when made to the carriage of persons and when made to the carriage of things, unless reason for that distinction be found in something besides the bare fact that in the one case it is persons and in the other property which is concerned, we are unable to discover. It well may be that the application of the new methods to property carrying in given cases, or conceivably in all cases, may take such shape and involve such incidents as to create reasons for a recognition of the fact that in those cases an additional servitude will thereby be created. But that is a very different thing from saying that there can be no property carrying without destroying the identity of the highway use for the simple reason that the subject of the carriage is property.

It is easy to conceive how the denial of the right to utilize new methods in the carriage of things over a highway, without transgressing the right of way involved in the highway easement, might result in serious inconvenience and disadvantage to the public, whose interest the highway was designed to serve, and to the local public most directly concerned, and a material diminution of the highway privilege which they are entitled to enjoy. Mordhurst v. Ft. Wayne & S. W. Traction Co. 163 Ind. 268, 66 L.R.A. 105, 106 Am. St. Rep. 222, 71 N. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

E. 642, 2 Ann. Cas. 967. Inability to carry property includes inability to carry mails or packages for local delivery, or to accommodate the strictly local public in any manner of transportation of things. Can it be fairly said that in no service of this character can conditions be found which, by reason of the inherent nature of the service, will not be in excess of the highway privilege? We think not, and, furthermore, that the incidents of such service are not necessarily such that it must be said of them that they are incompatible with highway use.

There are other cases which have drawn a distinction between urban and interurban service, and attempted to find in that distinction a feature of significance, if not controlling significance, in the determination of the question before the court. Zehren v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 99 Wis. 83, 41 L.R.A. 575, 67 Am. St. Rep. 844, 74 N. W. 538; Younkin v. Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Co. 112 Wis. 15, 87 N. W. 861; Harvey v. Aurora & G. R. Co. 174 Ill. 295, 51 N. E. 163. See Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1258. We can discover no good reason for this distinction, at least under our system, where the public easement is for the benefit of all the public alike, without regard for territorial subdivisions, and where the character of a highway and of the highway easement is the same wherever it is located, and however great or small the extent of its service. Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co. 69 Conn. 146, 154, 36 Atl. 1107; Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1258.

We are satisfied that the question for solution is one which cannot, by reason of its nature, be resolved in any of the ways indicated. It is one which may present itself under too many widely differing aspects to be resolved in respect to all which may arise by any such artificial process as the application of a simple test which regards a single fact or incident only, and ignores all others. The several tests indicated possess the merit of simplicity, but no one of them is founded in a sound logic, avoids practical difficulties, or escapes what may be harsh results to the public and results defeating the very purpose of a public way. The practical difficulties attending their application are apparent. We are satisfied that there can be no short cut to a reasonable and just conclusion under the varying conditions which may arise, and one which shall serve the best interests of the public, including abutting owners themselves. Such a conclusion is one which can be reached only by a study of the conditions which are present in a given case, or in given classes of cases, and by bringing to bear upon these conditions those pertinent considerations which are best calculated to disclose whether the new use is in aid of the highway use, or an essentially different and independent use.

We have no occasion here to attempt an exhaustive recital of those considerations. We have already had occasion to notice a number of them, and sufficiently for present purposes called attention to the objective point of inquiry, the general direction of it, and the salient suggestive facts to be looked at.

The fact that this is the only method by which satisfactory results can be arrived at is emphasized by a study of the cases which have sought to adopt more direct methods. Dillon and other writers, realizing the difficulties which must beset an attempt to adopt shorter and simpler processes, have asserted, and we think correctly, that after all each situation must be dealt with upon its own merits. Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 2032 note; Nichols. Em. Dom. § 100. This is substantially the attitude which certain courts have taken. White v. Blanchard Bros. Granite Co. 178 Mass. 363, 366, et seq., 50 N. E. 1025; Mordhurst v. Ft. Wayne & S. W. Traction Co. 163 Ind. 268, 66 L.R.A. 105, 106 Am. St. Rep. 222, 71 N. E. 642, 2 Ann. Cas. 967; Schaaf v. Cleveland, M. & S. R. Co. 66 Ohio St. 215, 64 N. E. 145.

Turning now to the allegations of the complaint, we find that it is there charged that the defendant, in the operation of its road, has been and is transporting property as well as persons. This charge, standing as it does by itself, and without amplification, is under our conclusion insufficient to establish conduct which is outside of highway rights. It is, however, further averred that its road is operated as a carrier of property by means of cars designed for and carrying property exclusively, and which run from terminus to terminus, presumably some miles distant from each other, without stopping to receive or discharge contents, and receiving and discharging such contents at the two termini only.

In the Canastota Knife Company Case, it was suggested that a passenger traffic road running under similar conditions, and not serving and accommodating the public as it ran, might not be rightfully operated in a highway without creating an additional servitude. Here is set up a situation where all local accommodation is prima facie excluded. The company, in the operation of its property carrying cars, does not serve and accommodate as they run, and the highway is apparently put to a use in which there is no purpose to facilitate its most natural and normal use. Under the allegations the transportation might well be for the general purposes of commerce, rather than as an adjunct of ordinary street travel, and the service rendered thus brought into close affiliation with that rendered by ordinary freight carrying roads of the steam variety. Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1259; Kinsey v. Union Traction Co. 169 Ind. 563, 584, 81 N. E. 922. The allegations are not as full and as informing concerning the situation as they should have been made; but they are sufficient to enable the plaintiff to establish under them an invasion of his rights as fee owner, and they ought not to have been disposed of upon demurrer, but should have been allowed to stand, to be dealt with after the pertinent facts of the situation had been more fully developed by the pleadings or upon a hearing.

There is error. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to be proceeded with according to law.

In this opinion Hall, Ch. J., Thayer, and Rorabach, JJ., concur.

Wheeler, J., concurring in the judgment (June 13, 1912):

The complaint alleges the defendant's unlawful entry upon the plaintiff's land; the demurrer admits this. While we take judicial notice of the legislative authority of the defendant to operate an electric railway for the carriage of persons and property, we cannot take judicial notice of the authority of the defendant to locate its tracks on West Main street in front of the plaintiff's premises. Before we can know this, the facts surrounding the location, and the defendant's compliance with the statutory prerequisites, must appear of record. "But the construction of any kind of railway in a highway, the soil of which belongs in fee to the adjoining proprietors, is a trespass upon their land, unless it has been duly authorized by law." Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co. 69 Conn. 146, 160, 36 Atl. 1107, 1111.

Since the decision of this question is fatal to the demurrer, it is in my opinion unnecessary to discuss or decide the question of additional servitude. A subject of such importance ought not to be disposed of without fullest argument upon issues joined, raising the question definitely and necessarily. I cannot but regard the opinion upon this subject as obiter. The question of additional servitude was no more material to the proper decision of the Canastota Knife Co. Case than is that question material to the proper decision of this case. But we have in other cases approved the doctrine of that case, and it must be accepted as settled. Inasmuch as the opinion in this case discusses and purports to decide the question of additional servitude in its relation to the facts of this case, I will briefly express my view.

The fundamental purpose of a street railway is the accommodation of street travel. It is a local convenience for local travel. "A street railway without a street to run on, and to serve and accommodate as it runs, would be an anomaly." Baldwin, J., in Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co. supra. For this reason we have treated the street railway as an improved method of using the street. Counsel for the street railway in the Canastota Knife Co. Case well said: "In a word, the street railway is for the sole purpose of carrying on the kind of public travel for which the highway was made, and the steam road is not." In the earlier days of the electric street railway, it was generally held that it was one for the transportation of passengers, and not of goods. Elliott, Roads, 1st ed. p. 457. At the beginning we did not contemplate a street railway operated as a common carrier of property, nor anticipate the changes and development in its business, more and more approximating it in construction, as well as in operation, to the steam road.

We have held that "the location of an ordinary steam railroad upon a highway imposes an additional burden upon the soil, for which the owner of the fee is entitled to demand compensation." And that the location of an electric railway in a highway does not impose such servitude upon the soil of the owner of the fee of the highway, unless "either the mode of construction or of operation be such as to make it a substantial impediment to public travel, or a proximate cause of special damage, of a new description to the owner of the soil." Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co. supra. It may be that in view of our former decisions, whether the carriage of goods by a street railway is an additional servitude depends upon whether it is serving an ordinary highway use, and must be determined in each case by its own facts. In the application of such a test there may well be left out of consideration the traffic of goods, which is the mere incident of ordinary street car passenger traffic, included in which is the hand baggage of the passenger, the light package delivered occasionally from the car platform, the mail bag, and the newspaper bundle. Logically, under this test, the carrying of local freight and express which would otherwise be carried in vehicles over the highway may be justified as ordinary highway use. But in practice it will be found impracticable to deliver freight or express from door to door along a street without impairing the use of the street for a highway for the public and the adjoining owners.

No attempt to use a street railway for the general carriage of local freight or express has, so far as we are aware, ever been made in Connecticut. To do so would require additional and frequent switches and turnouts, convert the highway along its entire length into a freight yard, cause long stops to be made, which would seriously inconvenience, if not destroy, passenger traffic, and congest the streets with vehicles loading or unloading goods. Local passenger travel with frequent service, and a local freight or express service, cannot be conducted on the same tracks. The operation of a street railway in this manner must necessarily produce annoyance and inconvenience alike to the owners of the fee of the highway as to the public. Lewis, Em. Dom. 3d ed. § 166.

It is difficult to conceive of a local traffic of this character, which is not of necessity an additional servitude upon the highway. "There is no reason," as Lewis says, "why the principle of the street railway cases should be extended to include a traffic so entirely different in its nature and involving such a different use of the street." Lewis, Em. Dom. 3d ed. § 166, p. 293.

In every case where the specific facts are either alleged or proven, the conclusion whether these facts constitute an additional servitude is a question of law. This case does not confine its allegations to a general complaint of the carriage of goods, and hence this question was not necessary to adjudicate in this case. The complaint specifically alleges that the defendant has entered upon the plaintiff's land for the purpose of operating its railway over the highway of which the plaintiff has the fee, "as a common carrier of property by means of cars which are solely designed for and which carry property exclusively, and which do not stop as they run, to take on and discharge said property, and have a station in the town of Plainville and the town of New Britain, at which they stop to take on and discharge said property." The demurrer thus admits that (1) The cars carry property exclusively. (2) They do not stop between the termini named to take on and discharge property. (3) They have two stations in the places named, where they take on and discharge property.

This traffic is not incident to the passenger traffic. It is not for the mere accommodation of its passengers. It is purely a commercial traffic. Local traffic along the route is not served, nor is this intended.

The cars maintain a through freight or express traffic between the points named. The street railway thus serves the same purpose as the steam road between these points. Its cars are designed to carry property exclusively, as do the steam road cars. It maintains freight stations at the termini named, as does the steam road. It conveys property which formerly was conveyed by the steam road and in part by other vehicles. It diverts a part of the traffic of the steam road to the highway. It does not differ materially in its carriage of goods from the steam road save in degree, and in that the one operates on its own private way and the other mainly on the public highway. Through freight or express traffic is the business of the commercial railroad, as steam roads are called in the law. Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 1257, 1258. "If the interurban railroad carries freight as well as passengers, the analogy to the steam railroad is complete. Most of the freight so carried is such as would otherwise seek transportation on the steam railroad, rather than in drays and wagons on the streets and highways." Lewis, Em. Dom. 3d ed. § 165, p. 287.

The diversion of this through freight or express business to this highway does not aid or facilitate traffic on the street, but adds to it, interferes with its ordinary use, and increases the burden upon the street. The majority of the authorities support this position, among which are: Aurora v. Elgin, A. & S. Traction Co. 227 Ill. 485, 496, 118 Am. St. Rep. 284, 81 N. E. 544; Spalding v. Macomb & W. I. R. Co. 225 Ill. 585, 590, 80 N. E. 327; Wilder v. Aurora, D. & R. Electric Traction Co. 216 Ill. 493, 528, 75 N. E. 194; Diebold v. Kentucky Traction Co. 117 Ky. 146, 149, 63 L.R.A. 637, 111 Am. St. Rep. 230, 77 S. W. 674, 4 Ann. Cas. 445; Massachusetts Loan & T. Co. v. Hamilton, 32 C. C. A. 46, 59 U. S. App. 403, 88 Fed. 588, 591; Abbott v. Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Co. 126 Wis. 634, 637, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 202, 106 N. W. 523; Younkin v. Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Co. 120 Wis. 477, 98 N. W. 215; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Milwaukee, R. & K. Electric R. Co. 95 Wis. 561, 571, 37 L.R.A. 856, 60 Am. St. Rep. 136, 70 N. W. 678; note to Abbott v. Milwaukee Light, Heat & Traction Co. 4 Street R. Rep. 1077; Schaaf v. Cleveland, M. & S. R. Co. 66 Ohio St. 215, 229, 64 N. E. 145.

Under these allegations of the complaint, the plaintiff's land has been subjected to a servitude other than that incident to ordinary travel, and he is entitled to compensation therefor.

The demurrer should be overruled.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

ALBERT L. HATCH

v.

CONSUMERS' COMPANY, Limited.

(17 Idaho, 204, 104 Pac. 670.)

Water — public supply — franchise — duty to lay laterals.

1. Under the franchise granted by the city of Cœur d'Alene to the Consumers' Company to occupy the streets and alleys of the city for the purpose of supplying the city and inhabitants thereof with fresh water, the right and authority to dig in the streets and alleys and lay pipes therein for supplying consumers with water is conferred upon the company alone, and no such right is conferred upon the individual or consumer, and the consumer acquires no right to lay pipes or acquire property in the streets and alleys, but, on the contrary, the duty to do so and the rights acquired thereby belong to the water company. It is consequently the duty of the water company to supply and lay the laterals from its main to the line of a consumers' property abutting on such street, and such laterals are the property of the water company.

Same — rental — advance payment.

2. Under the statute of this state (§ 2839, Rev. Codes), and the general rule of law applicable in such cases, a water company may make and enforce such reasonable rules and regulations as are in harmony with law and consonant with justice for the conduct of its business, the protection and preservation of its property, and the collection of its water rentals, and in so doing may require the consumer to pay reasonable water rentals in advance, or in default thereof, shut off the water supply, or may require a month's rent to be paid at the end of the month, or in default thereof, shut off the water until such time as the rent due is paid.

Same — collecting back rent — refusing service.

3. A water company cannot enforce a rule requiring a consumer to pay an old or disputed bill for water furnished him at some previous time for some other and independent use, or at some other place or residence, or for a separate or distinct transaction from that for which he is claiming and demanding a water supply, as a condition precedent to supplying him with water,

Headnotes by AILSHIE, J.

Note. — Discontinuing service to compel payment of water bills.

The earlier cases on this subject are collected in a note appended to Mansfield v. Humphreys Mfg. Co. 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 301, which supplements a note in 61 L.R.A. 105.

Upon the question of damages for cutting water supply, see cross references to a note in 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 301.

As shown in the earlier notes, a water where he tenders payment of the established water rate in advance for the service he is demanding.

Same—public policy.

4. In such cases the parties are not upon equal grounds. The consumer's necessities for water for business, health, comfort, and life are such as to put him at a decided disadvantage and deprive him of the right to contest an unjust claim; and it would therefore be unjust, unsafe, and contrary to public policy to invest a public service corporation with power to become both judge and jury in the determination of claims and demands it holds against the consumer.

Municipal corporation — extension of limits — noncontiguous territory.

5. An ordinance of the city of Cœur d'Alene, passed and approved in the month of April, 1904, including the Krotzer addition to Cœur d'Alene City within the corporate limits thereof, was not void on account of an intervening strip of land 2,663 feet in length by 2.8 feet wide at one end, and 67 feet wide at the other. Section 9 of the act of February 9, 1899, as appears at page 109 of the 1899 Session Laws, which was in force at the time of the adoption of the foregoing ordinance, provided that land or territory laid off or subdivided as provided by statute "shall be regarded and treated as contiguous to such city or town, notwithstanding any stream or embankment or any strip or parcel of land not more than 200 feet in width may be or lie between such land or territory and the corporate limits of such city or town."

Same — questioning validity — power.

6. In a case where the city authorities have by ordinance extended the city limits so as to include an additoin or tract of land and the inhabitants thereof, and all parties affected thereby have acquiesced in the action of the city authorities and have transacted their business upon the theory that such territory was included within the city limits, a public service corporation will not be allowed to question the validity of such action of the city council in a collateral attack after the lapse of five years.

Water — public supply — franchise — extension of mains.

7. Under the terms of a franchise ordinance wherein it is provided that the company receiving the franchise shall not be required to extend its water mains along any ungraded street or alley, no question company or a municipality furnishing its inhabitants with water may, within reasonable limitations, enforce regulations providing for cutting off the supply of those who refuse to pay for it.

Thus, a city supplying its inhabitants with water may cut off the supply for a refusal to pay a just claim for wilful or unreasonable waste or for fraudulent use of water, until such waste is stopped and all arrears are paid. J. N. Matthews Co. v. Buffalo, 126 N. Y. Supp. 596.

Independent transactions.

As shown in the earlier notes, and in accord with HATCH v. CONSUMERS' Co., it seems to be quite generally held by the authorities that a refusal to furnish water supply cannot be sustained merely because the consumer declines and refuses to pay past due water rents for some other and independent use, or at some other place or residence. To the same effect is Benson v. Paris Mountain Water Co. 88 S. C. 351, 70 S. E. 897.

Disputed claims.

Likewise, it is generally held that the supply cannot be cut off to enforce payment of disputed bills. In such cases the court will enjoin the company from cutting off the supply until the correctness of the bill can be determined (Spaulding Mfg. Co. v. Grinnell, — Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 649); or will award mandamus where the water company insists upon payment of the disputed amount as a condition to restoring service (Benson v. Paris Mountain Water Co. supra).

So, it has been held that when the correctness of a bill is disputed by a consumer, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) and the company, by reason of the failure of such consumer to pay the bill, discontinues its service, it does so at its peril, and if in the wrong is liable to compensatory damages in any event, and, when the circumstances justify it, to punitive damages. Birmingham Waterworks Co. v. Keiley, 2 Ala. App. 639, 56 So. 338; Birmingham Waterworks Co. v. Bailey, — Ala. App. —, 59 So. 338.

Unpaid claims against former occupant.

As shown in the earlier notes, it is generally held that a regulation providing for shutting off the water supply cannot be enforced to compel payment which it is not the duty of the consumer to make.

Thus applying the rule announced in Burke v. Water Valley, 87 Miss. 732, 112 Am. St. Rep. 468, 40 So. 820, which held a regulation that water shall not be furnished until a delinquent charge is paid void as being unreasonable, in so far as it prevents a new tenant, on tendering water charges, from getting water unless he pays a delinquent charge against the property, it was held in Ginnings v. Meridian Waterworks Co. — Miss. —, 56 So. 450, that a lessee of a part of a storeroom in which lessor was carrying on a separate business was entitled to water service for his own use, where he made application therefor in good faith, though the water had been discontinued for lessor's failure to pay rentals as he agreed with the tenant to do.

And a rule of a municipality supplying its inhabitants with water, that charges for water shall be to the owner of the property, and not to the tenant, and that if the water rents are not paid, the water shall be cut off, and not connected again until the deas to the construction of such provision can arise in a case where the company has, in fact, extended its main along such ungraded street. After so doing, the company cannot refuse to supply consumers along such street, on the theory that it was not compelled to build along such street in the first place.

Same — contract duty — extent.

8. A corporation receiving a franchise from a municipality in this state authorizing it to supply the inhabitants with water, by accepting such franchise and attempting to operate thereunder, enters into an implied contract to serve all the inhabitants of such municipality without distinction or discrimination, upon such persons paying it the established rates and complying with the reasonable rules and regulations of such company.

Corporation — public service — compelling performance of duty — confiscation of property.

9. To compel a public service corporation to live up to the law of its existence, and to discharge the duties for which it was organized and for which it received its franchise, can in no case amount to a confiscation of its property, or taking its property without due process of law, even though such requirement necessitates the corporation using a part or all of its property or investing its money in order to meet its duties and obligations.

Water — public supply — compulsory service — validity.

10. There can be no element of confiscation or taking property without due process of law in a case where a writ of mandate is issued to compel a water company to put in laterals and service connections from its main to the property line of an abutting owner at an expense of $8.50, where he tenders the monthly water rate of $1.50 in advance. In such case the rental rate constitutes a fair and reasonable income and revenue on the sum invested, and compulsory service in such case contains no element of confiscation.

Same — assumption of dishonesty.

11. A public service corporation organized for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of a municipality with water is not justified in assuming that the people it is to serve are dishonest, and that they will demand and pay for a month's water supply merely for the purpose of entailing upon the company the expense of putting in linquent charge is paid, which prevents a purchaser of the property, on tendering such sums of money as might be required in advance for water to be used in the future, from getting the necessary water unless he pays a delinquent charge against the property, is void as unreasonable. Houston v. Lockwood Invest. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 144 S. W. 685.

The court said in the above case that the practical effect of the ordinance was to place a lien on the premises, which the subsequent purchaser would be forced to pay, when, but for the laches of the municipality and its failure to enforce its own regulations against the prior owner, there could have been no arrearages. The court also said: "In so far as the provisions mentioned partake of the nature of a lien, they are directly unreasonable, in that there is no recognized place for public record of such lien, so as to give notice to the subsequent purchaser that there were arrearages upon the property. It is true he might ascertain by inquiry of the city whether such was the condition or not; but the knowledge to be gained by him by such inquiry would be a matter of grace with the city, and not a matter of right to the subsequent purchaser."

But in Kohler v. Reitz, 46 Pa. Super. Ct. 350, it was held that a municipal ordinance providing for the stopping of the water supply unless all arrearages are paid, whether owing by the former occupant or owner, is reasonable.

Accordingly it was held in the above case, under an ordinance providing that in case of nonpayment of water rates, the water supply shall be shut off from the premises, and shall not be again turned on until all water rates and penalties in arrears shall 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

have been paid, that a purchaser of the premises at sheriff's sale could not compel the city officers to restore the supply of water to said premises until the amount of the water rent due from the former occupant or owner had been paid, where he could have obtained knowledge that the water rates were unpaid by inquiring at the office of the city treasurer, and where it appeared that notice had been publicly given at the sale that the water rates were due and unpaid.

A statute relating to municipal liens upon real estate does not deprive the municipality from proceeding against the owner or occupant personally, by discontinuing service to compel payment of water bills, where a right to a lien has never been asserted. Ibid.

Miscellaneous.

On a proceeding by bill to restrain the water company from cutting off the water supply, in which defendant filed a cross bill for an accounting for water alleged to have been stolen by the plaintiff from the defendant water company by means of a device connecting the main with plaintiff's works without passing through the meter, and the court found that a specified amount had been misappropriated by the plaintiff a decree requiring plaintiff to pay the water company for the water so taken, and to remove the device complained of, and enjoining the water company from cutting off the supply so long as plaintiff complied with the rules of the water company, was properly entered. American Conduit Mfg. Co. v. Kensington Water Co. 234 Pa. 208, 83 Atl. 70.

laterals and service connections, and that they will thereafter refuse to take water and thereby discommode themselves and depreciate their own property; and the courts will not base decisions upon such an assumption.

(November 9, 1909.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to require defendant to make necessary connections with its water main and to supply plaintiff with water upon receipt of the established rental rates. Writ granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Reed & Boughton, for plaintiff:

A regulation that in case a consumer is in default his supply will be cut off is reasonable and may be enforced. But such a regulation cannot be made the instrument by which the water company can become the judge in its own case, or shut off water to enforce payment of a disputed bill; nor by its means can payment be enforced which it is not the duty of the consumer to make.

1 Farnham, Waters, 877.

The account is with the premises, and not with the consumer, so that water cannot be refused to an applicant because he is in arrears for water furnished him elsewhere.

1 Farnham, Waters, 880; Dayton v. Quigley, 29 N. J. Eq. 77.

The consumer could not legally be required to pay for a portion of the company's system, and neither could the company legally require an unreasonable payment in advance, in order to secure water for domestic purposes.

The requirement of a quarter's rent in advance is not unreasonable.

The right of a company to protect itself by requiring a deposit or other assurance that it will be paid for water furnished is well established.

A regulation requiring applicant to agree to pay a reasonable charge for connections is a reasonable and proper one, especially when the commission has fixed such charge, and it appears that the commissioners, in fixing the charge for such connections, had due regard to the monthly rate, and vice versa. 40 L.R.A. Allshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original action commenced in this court, praying for the issuance of a writ of mandate against the defendant corporation, requiring and commanding that it connect plaintiff's water pipes with defendant's water system in the city of Cœur d'Alene. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of a lot or tract of land in Krotzer's addition to Cœur d'Alene City, and that he has built a dwelling house thereon, and has placed water pipes therein, extending from his house to the curb line in Third street in front of his premises. He alleges that the water rate for the service he requires and has demanded is $1.50 per month, payable in advance, as fixed by the water commissioners appointed in conformity with the law for the establishing of water rates to be charged by the defendant company. He also alleges that he tendered the company at its office one month's water rent, and demanded that it make the connections and turn on the water for his use; "that the company thereupon refused and declined to do so, unless he would also pay it the sum of $8.50 for making the tap in its water main, or deposit the sum of $15, the same to be refunded when the tap is taken out, less the actual cost of labor and cost of one corporation cock, or, in lieu thereof, that he should deposit $40 in cash, the same to be applied on payment of water to be used from said tap;" that the company now is, and has been for more than five years last past, operating in the village of Cœur d'Alene, under the terms of a franchise of the village embodied in ordinance No 93 of said village, and that it is collecting monthly water rates in advance for water furnished to the inhabitants of the village; that the water rates have been established by a commission appointed in conformity with law, and which said commission established rates to be charged on the 14th day of October, 1907, and that the rate so established that applies to a service such as plaintiff demands is $1.50 per month; that the defendant company has a water main on Third street in front of plaintiff's property, and is furnishing other consumers along that street with water, for which it is charging and receiving the sum of $1.50 per month in advance; that the company has an abundant supply of fresh water unsold, and is able to supply the plaintiff with all the water he demands. Plaintiff prays that a writ of mandate issue against the defendant requiring and compelling it to make the necessary connection with its water main, and supply plaintiff with water upon receipt of the rental rates as established by the board. An alternative writ of mandate was issued against the defendant, and it has answered admitting plaintiff's demand, and that it has a water main on Third street in front of plaintiff's house, and that it has refused to supply the plaintiff with water unless he accede to its requirements, as set out in plaintiff's complaint.

Defendant has also pleaded further matter in defense of the action, in substance, as follows: That prior to the construction by plaintiff of the house for which he now claims a water supply, plaintiff carried water from the faucet at the houses of some of defendant's water consumers, for which he became indebted to the defendant in the sum of $28, which sum the plaintiff has neglected, failed, and refused to pay, and that the defendant refused to supply plaintiff with water in the future until such time as he paid the balance due for water previously supplied to him in the manner above mentioned. It also alleges that plaintiff's property is not within the corporate limits of Cœur d'Alene City. It further alleges that commissioners have heretofore been appointed in conformity with the law, for the purpose of fixing rates to be charged by the defendant, and that, in pursuance of the power and authority vested in them, they met and fixed and established rates, and that the rate to be charged for service such as plaintiff demands is $1.50 per month in advance, and the further sum of $8.50 for making "water service connections;" and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the company has made and established a rule that, where demand is made to have water supplied to a place that has not previously been receiving water, it requires that the applicant pay one month's rent in advance, and also the sum of $8.50 for tapping its main and making connections, or deposit the sum of $15, the same to be refunded when tap is taken out, less actual cost of labor and cost of one corporation cock, or a deposit of $40 cash, the same to apply on payment of water used. Defendant alleges that the plaintiff declined and refused to comply with the rules and regulations of the company with reference to these several deposits, with the exception of the $1.50 monthly water rate, and that the defendant accordingly declined and refused to make the connection and furnish plaintiff with water. It is also alleged that the commissioners took into consideration the payment of $8.50 for making tap and service connection in the fixing of monthly water rates. On motion of the plaintiff, the court made an order striking from defendant's answer that portion thereof relating to the "rate to be charged for making service connections" as established by the commissioners, for the reason that under the provisions of our statute (§ 2839, Rev. Codes) the commissioners had no authority to fix any rates except "the rates to be charged for water." They had no authority to fix rates or charges for the construction or alteration of any part of the defendant's pipes or water system, and had no authority to establish any rate for any labor or service or material or thing other than for the use of water to be supplied by the corporation. The court also sustained the plaintiff's motion to strike from the answer all the allegations with reference to the failure and neglect and refusal of the plaintiff to pay the sum of $28, balance due for water used by the plaintiff while residing at a different place, and carried by him from a faucet at the residences of some of defendant's other consumers. The court thereupon ordered a reference to take testimony, and, upon the coming in of the report and the submission of all the evidence on the part of both plaintiff and defendant, the case was argued by the respective counsel, and has been submitted for our final determination.

We have heretofore held in Bothwell v. Consumers' Co. 13 Idaho. 568, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 485, 92 Pac. 533, and Pocatello Water Co. v. Standley, 7 Idaho, 155, 61 Pac. 518, that the mains and laterals laid within the streets and alleys are the property of the water company, and that the franchise granted such company authorizes it to dig in the streets and alleys, and use and occupy them for the purpose of laying and maintaining their pipe lines and delivering water to consumers. We discover no reason for departing from the rule announced in those cases. See also § 2840, Rev. Codes. On the other hand, the consumer has no right or franchise to excavate the streets or to lay or maintain pipes therein. When he undertakes to pass beyond his property line with pipes, he is met by the public authorities and the franchise held by the water company. He is in no position to acquire a property right in the streets and alleys by laying pipes therein. The water company, on the contrary, is clothed with this power and right and all the necessary authority for creating and establishing property rights therein and the protection of such property. There is no reason in saying that the company has no interest in laterals it may lay in the streets from its main to the line of abutting property owners. These laterals are of just as much use and as valuable to the company as its mains, in proportion to the amount of water to be delivered through such laterals as compared with that delivered through the main. The only difference whatever is in the extent of the service. The capacity of a main is ordinarily such that it will supply a large number of consumers along the street from the one main. The capacity of a lateral is ordinarily such that it will only supply one or two consumers. The relative value to the company of the main and laterals is measured by the extent of the service from the two. The necessity, however, for one, is just as great as for the other. Without a main none of the residents along a street can be supplied. Without a lateral the individual consumer cannot be supplied. The law of ownership is the same in the one case as the other, and the right of property and control is the same in each instance. Water companies maintain waterworks for the purpose of collecting rates and tolls. They operate them for gain. In order to collect tolls, they must deliver water. The consumer, on the other hand, pays his money for service. Unless he is served, there is nothing for which he may be called upon to pay.

We are aware that some courts have held that the consumer may be required to pay the expenses of "service connections," as it is sometimes called, or, rather, for laterals extending from the curb line to the main. So far as we have been able to examine, however, these decisions are based upon express statutes. There is a line of decisions to that effect in Wisconsin. The case of Gleason v. Waukesha County, 103 Wis. 225, 79 N. W. 249, is a leading authority on this point, and holds that the expense of laying water pipes from the curb line to connect with the main may be properly assessed against the property of the abutting owner, but this is based upon the express provision of the Wisconsin statute authorizing the levying of assessments against abutting property owners for such purposes, "whenever the council shall order the paving or repaving of any street in which water, gas mains, and sewers, or either of them, shall have been previously laid or constructed." In that case it was claimed that the statute was unconstitutional, in that it authorized a taking of property without due process of law. The court upheld the statute on the ground that the laying of the gas and water pipes was an improvement to the property of the abutting owners, and that it conferred a benefit. We know of no case, however, that has held to such a rule in the absence of a statute or ordinance authorizing and providing for levying an assessment for such purposes. Counsel for defendant seem to place great reliance on the case of State ex rel. Foley v. Hillyard Water Co. 49 Wash., 232, 94 Pac. 1080, but an examination of that case discloses that it was decided on entirely different grounds. As we read and understand that case, the court denied Foley relief on the grounds of waiver and estoppel by reason of his previous action and conduct in the matter. The question involved in the case at bar does not seem to have been urged or considered in that case. In Haugen v. Albina Light & Water Co. 21 Or. 411, 14 L.R.A. 424, 28 Pac. 244, in considering the respective rights and duties of the water consumer and the water company with reference to laying pipes and acquiring property rights in the streets, Justice Lord, speaking for the Oregon supreme court, said: "The pipe which was laid by the defendant in Tillamook street was laid in pursuance of the franchise granted by the city, as it had no authority to lay any other kind of pipe or main than prescribed by the ordinance, or for any other purpose than conducting water to supply the city and its inhabitants, without discrimination, to all persons having buildings or lots on the lines of their pipes, upon tender of the proper compensation. There is no claim that Hughes and Prescott had any right to dig up the street, or to lay such pipe. It could only be done by the defendant, so far as disclosed by this record, under the grant, in the mode prescribed, and for the purposes already stated."

As to the right of a water company to refuse to supply the consumer until he pays overdue rents, there is not entire harmony among the authorities. 1 Farnham on Waters and Water Rights, § 164a, contains the following résumé of various decisions of the courts on this subject: "A very effective method of compelling the payment of water rates is the stopping of further supplies until arrears are paid. There is nothing to compel either a municipality or a water company to furnish water to one who will not pay for it, and a regulation that in case a consumer is in default his supply will be cut off is reasonable and may be enforced. But such a regulation cannot be made the instrument by which the water company can become the judge in its own case, and shut off water to enforce payment of disputed bills. Nor by its means can payment be enforced which it is not the duty of the consumer to make. Nor can it be used as a means of collecting bills for independent matters not connected with the premises on which the water is desired." On one phase of the question the authorities seem to be in entire harmony, and that is to the effect that a water company can make and enforce such reasonable rules and regulations as are in harmony with law and justice, for the conduct of its business and the collection of its water rentals. A regulation requiring a consumer to pay a month's rent in advance, or in default thereof, the company will shut off the water, or requiring the consumer to pay at the end of the month the rates for the preceding month, or in default thereof, the company will shut off the water, has generally been held reasonable and within the power of such public service corporations. Tacoma Hotel Co. v. Tacoma Light & Water Co. 3 Wash. 316, 14 L.R.A. 669, 28 Am. St. Rep. 35, 28 Pac. 516; Shepard v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 6 Wis. 539, 70 Am. Dec. 479; Harbison v. Knoxville Water Co. — Tenn. —, 53 S. W. 993; Williams v. Mutual Gas Co. 52 Mich. 499, 50 Am. Rep. 266, 18 N. W. 236; State ex rel. Latsch v. Water & Light Comrs. 105 Minn. 472, 127 Am. St. Rep. 681, 117 N. W. 827; Cedar Rapids Gaslight Co. v. Cedar Rapids, 144 Iowa, 426, 138 Am. St. Rep. 299, 120 N. W. 966. The rules of some companies seem to require one month's payment in advance while others have required a quarter's payment in advance. It has been held, however, that a requirement that a consumer pay one year in advance was unreasonable. Rockland Water Co. v. Adams, 84 Me. 472, 30 Am. St. Rep. 368, 24 Atl. 840. It has likewise been held that, where the water has been shut off from a consumer on account of a default in payment of rentals when due, he cannot be charged the additional sum of $1 for turning the water off and on. American Waterworks Co. v. State, 46 Neb. 194, 30 L.R.A. 447, 50 Am. St. Rep. 610, 64 N. W. 711. It seems to be quite generally held by the authorities that such a company may not refuse to supply the water to a consumer upon payment of rents in advance as required by the rules and regulations of the 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

company, merely because he declines and refuses to pay a disputed bill, or to pay past due water rents for some other and independent use, or at some other place or residence, or for a separate or distinct transaction from that for which he is claiming and demanding a water supply. Crumley v. Watauga Water Co. 99 Tenn. 420, 41 S. W. 1058; Wood v. Auburn, 87 Me. 287, 29 L.R.A. 376, 32 Atl. 906; American Waterworks Co. v. State, 46 Neb. 194, 30 L.R.A. 447, 50 Am. St. Rep. 610, 64 N. W. 711. A public service corporation cannot safely be invested with a power and authority which will allow it to be come both judge and jury in the determination of a disputed claim due it from a consumer. To do so would be dangerous and investing it with a power that invites extortion, and is too liable to be abused. As was very aptly said by the supreme court of Maine in Wood v. Auburn, 87 Me. 287, 29 L.R.A. 376, 32 Atl. 906: "The parties are not upon equal ground. The city as a water company cannot do as it will with its water. It owes a duty to each consumer. The consumer once taken onto the system becomes dependent on that system for a prime necessity of business, comfort, health, and even life. He must have the pure water daily and hourly. To suddenly deprive him of this water, in order to force him to pay an old bill claimed to be unjust, puts him at an enormous disadvantage. He cannot wait for the water. He must surrender, and swallow his choking sense of injustice. Such a power in a water company or municipality places the consumer at its mercy. It can always claim that some old bill is unpaid. The receipt may have been lost, the collector may have embezzled the money, yet the consumer must pay it again, and perhaps still again. He cannot resist, lest he lose the water. . . . To oblige a person to follow such a course would be a violation of the fundamental juristic principle of procedure. . . . The water must be supplied to the complainant so long as he will promptly pay current instalments, and otherwise conform to the reasonable rules governing the supply of water. The respondent must now in its turn resort to judicial process, if it desires to enforce any further payment." The foregoing conforms to our idea of justice, and comports with the principles of fair dealing. Such companies receive a public franchise for the purpose of serving the people for reasonable compensation, but they have no right to use the privileges granted for the purpose of oppression, discrimination, or harassing or annoying the water consumer. Courts will not tolerate any such conduct for a moment. In the case at bar the bill the defendant was seeking to collect was for water alleged to have been used by plaintiff while residing at different places, and where he carried the water from the residences of other consumers, and the claim covers a period of over two years. This claim, if an obligation against plaintiff, was a wholly separate transaction, and must be collected in the usual way in which debts are collectable. It cannot be wrung from the plaintiff by preying on his present rights and necessities for an essential to life and health.

It is argued by the defendant that plaintiff's property is not within the corporate limits of Cœur d'Alene City, and this contention grows out of the following conditions: In 1904 the city council passed an ordinance, known as ordinance No. 99, extending the city limits so as to include Krotzer's addition, in which plaintiff's property is located. It appears from the evidence in the case, however, that there is intervening between the original boundary line of Cœur d'Alene City and this addition a strip of land 2,663 feet in length by 2.8 feet wide at the westerly end and 67 feet wide at the easterly end. It also appears that this tract of land has never been included within the corporate limits of the city, under any ordinance or resolution of the city council. It is contended on behalf of the defendant that the action of the board in the passage of ordinance No. 99, incorporating the Krotzer addition within the city limits, is void for the reason, first, that the city clerk failed to file a copy of ordinance No. 99 with the county recorder, in accordance with the provisions of § 2 of an act approved March 8, 1905, as appears at page 392 of the 1905 Session Laws, and which provision has been incorporated in § 2173 of the Revised Codes. Whether or not this failure on the part of the clerk would defeat the purposes and objects of the ordinance is a question that we will not consider here, for the reason that this statute was not in force at the time of the passage and approval of ordinance No. 99. The ordinance was passed and approved in April, 1904, whereas the statute invoked was not approved until March 8, 1905.

It is next urged that, under the provisions of § 2172 of the Revised Codes, it is only competent for city or village authorities to incorporate within municipal boundaries the "land lying contiguous or adjacent" to the city, town, or village. It is contended that this addition was neither contiguous or adjacent to the city of Cœur d'Alene while the strip of land above described was intervening between the city boundary and the addition laid out and platted. This contention is answered by the provisions of § 9 of the act of February 9, 1899, with reference to cities, towns, and villages, as appears on page 109 of the 1899 Session Laws. It provides, among other things, that land or territory laid off or subdivided as provided by statute "shall be regarded and treated as contiguous to such city or town, notwithstanding any stream or embankment or any strip or parcel of land not more than 200 feet in width may be or lie between such land or territory and the corporate limits of such city or town." Whether that provision of the statute be in force and effect now is immaterial. It is sufficient to say that it was in force and effect, at the time of the passage and approval of ordinance No. 99 of the city of Cœur d'Alene, and completely answers the contention as to intervening territory between the original city limits and the Krotzer addition.

Over and above the foregoing answers given to defendant's contention, there is another reason why defendant's position is not tenable here. The ordinance extending the city limits so as to include plaintiff's premises was passed and approved in April, 1904, and the city authorities proceeded at once to exercise municipal jurisdiction over the territory, levied and collected taxes, exercised police jurisdiction over the new territory, and, so far as appears in this action, all parties acquiesced in the action of the city council, and proceeded to and did transact their business upon the theory and under the assumption that this addition was within the corporate limits of the city. This was not only true as to the plaintiff and Cœur d'Alene City, but it is true as to the defendant itself. It appeals affirmatively from the record that the defendant operated its water plant on Third street, running through this addition, upon the theory that it was within the corporate limits, and charged consumers therein the regular rates established by the water commission. This is a collateral attack, and the water company could not be permitted at this late date and in this manner, to raise a question of so serious import involving the jurisdiction and authority of the municipality. Kuhn v. Port Townsend, 12 Wash. 605, 29 L.R.A. 445, 50 Am. St. Rep. 911, 41 Pac. 923; Clement v. Everest, 29 Mich. 19; Mullikin v. Bloomington, 72 Ind. 161; Frace v. Tacoma, 16 Wash. 69, 47 Pac. 219; McQuillin, Mun. Ord. § 279; Coler v. Dwight School Twp. 3 N. D. 249, 28 L.R.A. 649, 55 N. W. 587, 589. Defendant invokes the provisions of § 10 of ordinance No. 93, granting it a franchise to operate within the corporate limits of Cœur d'Alene City, and contends that under that provision of the ordinance it cannot be compelled by mandamus to supply a water consumer on an ungraded street. That provision of the ordinance is as follows: "Said Consumers' Company, its successors or assigns, may extend said distributing system of mains, pipes, laterals, and other facilities along any of the streets or alleys of said village, whether such street or alley shall have been graded at the time of such extension or not, but shall not be required to extend the same along any ungraded street or alley." It appears that Third street in front of plaintiff's premises is an ungraded street, but, whatever might be said with reference to the foregoing provision of the ordinance granting the franchise, it is a sufficient answer for the present case to say that, notwithstanding this provision of the ordinance, the defendant has laid its main along this street. It is already there, and therefore needs no coercion for that purpose. It is consequently liable to supply the inhabitants along the street who tender the established water rates and demand service.

Finally, it is argued that, to grant a writ of mandate in this case would amount to a confiscation of defendant's property, and be in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. This contention cannot be sustained. The reasons are numerous against the position of defendant. In the first place, the defendant is a creature of the laws of this state, created for a special purpose of a public character. It is not permitted like a private party to charge whatever it pleases, or to serve those only whom it may choose to serve. It must, on the contrary, serve the inhabitants of the municipality from which it receives a franchise for a reasonable uniform compensation, to be established in conformity with law (§ 2839, Rev. Codes); and it must serve all persons without distinction or discrimination who pay the rate established and comply with the reasonable rules and regulations of the company (§§ 1, 2, art. 15, Const. Idaho; §§ 2839, 2840, Rev. Codes). Watauga Water Co. v. Wolfe, 99 Tenn. 429, 63 Am. St. Rep. 841, 41 S. W. 1060; American Waterworks Co. v. State, 46 Neb. 194, 30 L.R.A. 447, 449, 50 Am. St. Rep. 610, 64 N. W. 711; Haugen v. Albina Light & Water Co. 21 Or. 411, 14 L.R.A. 424, 28 Pac. 244; Mahoney v. American Land & Water Co. 2 Cal. App. 185, 83 Pac. 267; Olmsted v. Morris Aqueduct, 47 N. J. L. 311; Rushville v. Rushville, Natural Gas Co. 15 L.R.A. 321, and note, 132 Ind. 575, 28 N. E. 853). It was said by Chancellor Pitney in Long Branch Commission v. Tintern Manor Water Co. 70 N. J. Eq. 71, 62 Atl. 474, in speaking for the court of chancery of New Jersey, that "a company which seeks and obtains a franchise to supply a certain territory with water for public and domestic uses is under a moral, and in my judgment a legal, obligation to furnish a supply which shall be equal to all emergencies which may be reasonably anticipated, including unusual droughts and unusual conflagrations, and to bear constantly in mind the prospective increase in population and a consequent increased demand for water." To compel the defendant to live up to the law of its existence can in no case amount to a confiscation of its property, and still in every instance wherein it is compelled by compulsory process to do any given act, the exercise of such judicial power necessarily involves either the use of the company's property or the expenditure of its money. To abide by the law and discharge its public duties, however, is a part of the contract it impliedly enters into with the state and municipality when it receives its charter and franchise and commences business. For the discharge of these duties and obligations, it agrees to invest money and acquire property, and by that means serve the public indiscriminately for a reasonable compensation. When it neglects such duty, it may be coerced by judicial process. This is not confiscation or taking property without due process of law. It is a procedure almost daily invoked throughout the country against irrigation companies, gas and light companies, and railroad companies, as well as water companies. There is nothing new or novel about it. The company must either live up to the requirements of the law, or when that becomes too burdensome it may go out of business; but it cannot reap the benefits of its charter without assuming the duties thereof.

In this case the rates have been established, and the defendant makes no contention that the rates are too low, or that it cannot make a fair income at the rates as established. It has never questioned these rates, and, in fact, from the evidence submitted in the record, it would seem that they are sufficient to net the defendant an exceptionally large return on the investment. Now, those rates were necessarily established on an estimate, among other things, of the total amount of investment and the number of consumers being served at the time the rates were fixed by the board. It is conceded that $8.50 will cover the total additional investment necessary to be made in order to serve the plaintiff, and thereby secure the additional revenue of $1.50 per month or $18 per annum. This does not sound like confiscation to us. An income of $18 per annum on an investment of $8.50 is certainly a spendid profit. But the water company replies that it has no assurance that the plaintiff will take water for more than one month. This argument leads to an inference that the water company wants someone to insure its perpetual income.

While there can be no such thing as an absolute certainty that any one of its consumers will continue to use water for a whole year, or that they may not all quit using water at the end of the current month, yet it would be a violent and unjustifiable assumption to say that the plaintiff or any other consumer will only use water for one month. The defendant, like all individuals and corporations, must do business in a measure upon confidence and the assumption that the people with whom it is dealing are ordinarily honest (Harbison v. Knoxville Water Co. — Tenn. —, 53 S. W. 993; Cedar Rapids Gaslight Co. v. Cedar Rapids, 144 Iowa, 428, 138 Am. St. Rep. 299, 120 N. W. 966), and that they are going to conduct their business in their own interests. It is scarcely likely that a man is going to build a dwelling house on his lot and fit it up with water pipes and pay for water for one month, in order to force a public service corporation to expend $8.50 in making the necessary connections, and then depreciate his own property and discommode himself or his tenant by having the water shut off and thereafter doing without. Such an assumption is not sufficient on which to transact business, and no individual or corporation would proceed upon such an assumption, and it is equally true that the courts are not going to render decisions on any such assumption. The common experience of mankind disproves such theory. It is possible, and indeed probable, that an occasional instance will arise where, for want of a tenant or some other sufficient cause, a proprietor may not receive water from the company regularly every month, but such a case will be the exception, and will by no means constitute the rule. These exceptions will be no more frequent among the new consumers than among the old patrons of the company, and there can be no more excuse on this ground for refusing a new consumer water than there would be for refusing to supply one who has been previously receiving water. The supposition is that the rates received by the company are sufficient upon the whole to amply compensate the company for any such loss or diminution of rents as may arise from the exceptional instance where a consumer will cease to pay regular monthly water rates. This objection is entirely too imaginary, chimerical, and improbable to receive serious consideration from the hands of the court, as a ground for denying an applicant a water supply upon the tender of the payment of the established rate.

It follows from what has been said that a peremptory writ of mandate must issue commanding and requiring the defendant to 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

make the necessary tap and connection with its water main, and to supply plaintiff with water upon receipt of the monthly water rate heretofore tendered by plaintiff. The rule and regulation of the water company requiring the consumer to pay for the laterals and connections from its main to the street line of the consumer's property is unreasonable, and in conflict with the statute and charter and franchise under which the defendant is operating, and such regulation cannot be upheld by the court.

The writ will issue as prayed for by plaintiff, and the defendant will be required to make return to the clerk of this court within thirty days from date of filing this opinion, showing that it has complied with the order of the court; and it is ordered and decreed accordingly. Costs of this action will be taxed against the defendant.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

W. A. MARIN, Appt.,
v.

AUSTIN C. KNOX et al., Respts.

(117 Minn. 428, 136 N. W. 15.)

Mortgage — for purchase money — priority.

1. Where a mutual agreement is made between a vendor in a contract to convey land, the vendee therein, and a third party, that the vendee is to obtain money to pay part of the balance of the purchase price from Headnotes by HOLT, J.

Note. — Mortgage to secure money advanced to purchase property as a purchase money mortgage.

As to the right of one advancing money for the purchase price of property, to be subrogated to vendor's lien, see note in 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1203.

Where contemporaneously executed—general rule.

It is the general rule, to which there is little dissent, that a mortgage on land executed by the purchaser of the land contemporaneously with the acquisition of the legal title thereto is a purchase money mortgage, and entitled to priority as such over all other claims or liens arising through the mortgagor; and this is true without reference to whether the mortgage such third party, securing the same by a first mortgage upon the land, and the vendor is to take a second mortgage for the remainder of the purchase price, and pursuant to such agreement the deed and mortgages are executed and delivered, such mortgages are superior to the lien of a judgment obtained against the vendee prior to the delivery of the mortgages

Same — single transaction — noncontemporaneous delivery.

2. If such deed and mortgages be executed and delivered pursuant to such mutual agreement, it constitutes but one transaction, although the documents may not have been delivered on the same day.

Evidence — sufficiency.

3. The evidence examined, and held to sustain the finding that the mortgages of the defendants were purchase money mortgages, and entitled to priority over the title acquired by plaintiff through execution sale on a judgment obtained against the vendee prior to the delivery of the mortgages.

Wis.—Jones v. Parker, 51 Wis. 218, 8 N. W. 124.

The test whether a mortgage is a purchase money mortgage is not whether it is executed to the vendor, but whether the proceeds are to be used to apply on the purchase price. Commonwealth Title Ins. & T. Co. v. Ellis, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 5.

A mortgage to secure the purchase money, given by a purchaser of land simultaneously with the conveyance of the land to him, does not necessarily lose the character of a purchase money mortgage merely because taken in the name of a person other than the vendor, by the vendor's procurement. Albright v. Lafayette Bldg. & Sav. Asso. 102 Pa. 411; Hiser v. Hiser, 13 Montg. Co. L. Rep. 49.

Where a statute provides that whenever lands are sold and conveyed, and a mortgage is given by the purchaser at the same time to secure the payment of the purchase money, such mortgage shall be preferred to any previous judgment which may have been obtained against the purchaser, it is not necessary, in order to bring a contemporaneously executed mortgage within the terms of the statute, that it be executed to the vendor. It is sufficient if it is executed to a third person for money advanced on the purchase price, if executed contemporaneously with a deed of the property to the mortgagor. Jackson ex dem. Beebe v. Austin, 15 Johns. 477, followed in Haywood v. Nooney, 3 Barb. 643.

The claims of third persons to have their mortgages upheld as purchase money mortgages are recognized only when it has been made to appear that the money was loaned to the purchaser, and was used by the latter, expressly to pay for the property. It is not sufficient merely to show that the mortgagor used the money loaned to pay for the land mortgaged. Van Loben Sels v. Bunnell, 120 Cal. 680, 53 Pac. 266.

Where a mortgage is not in fact given for the purchase money of property, although it contains a recital that that is the purpose of it, it does not take priority over other liens made an equitable charge on the land by the express terms of the deed of the property to the mortgagor. Crombie v. Rosentock, 19 Abb. N. C. 312.

—as applied to judgments against purchaser.

A mortgage for the purchase money of land, where executed at the time of the conveyance of the property, is entitled to preference or priority over previous judgments against the purchaser, and the same equitable considerations which demand this rule also require that a third person who advances the purchase money, and takes a mortgage from the purchaser contemporaneously with a deed to the latter of the mortgaged property, shall be protected to and intention that it should be used in paying purchase price of the land.

the same extent Kaiser v. Lembeck, 55 Iowa, 244, 7 N. W. 519.

And a purchase money mortgage executed contemporaneously with a deed to the mortgagor of the mortgaged premises excludes any claim or lien arising through him, and it is immaterial that the mortgage was made to a third person, since the latter is entitled to the same preference over a prior judgment against the mortgagor as though the mortgage had been executed to the vendor himself. Protestant Episcopal Church v. Lowe County, 131 Ga. 666, 127 Am. St. Rep. 243, 63 S. E. 136.

Where a purchaser of land, at the time he receives a conveyance thereof, executes a mortgage thereon to a third person advancing to the vendor the purchase money for him, the mortgage is entitled to the same preference over a prior judgment as it would have had if it had been executed to the vendor himself, and it is immaterial that there is no agreement to give the mortgage priority; neither is it important that the purchase was previously made by executory contract. Laidley v. Aikin, 80 Iowa, 112, 20 Am. St. Rep. 408, 45 N. W. 384.

Where a deed to land, although dated prior to a mortgage to a third person as security for money advanced to be applied on the purchase price, did not go into effect, and was not actually delivered, until the purchase money was paid, the mortgagee has in equity the right to a repayment of the loan out of the land or its proceeds in preference to the judgment creditors of the mortgagor, since the existence of their judgments when the legal title passed through the debtor gave them no hold upon the property to the exclusion of the mortgagee, who paid for the land and took the title as part of the same transaction. Achey v. Coleman, 92 Ga. 745, 19 S. E. 710.

Where the execution of a mortgage upon land to a third person, to secure money advanced by the latter to pay for the land, is practically simultaneous with the execution of a deed of the land to the mortgagor, the mortgage is a purchase money mortgage, and takes priority over judgment liens 40 L.R.A. —as to mortgages executed by purchaser.

A mortgage held by a wife upon all the property of her husband, and which took effect as to future-acquired land immediately upon its acquirement by the husband, is entitled to priority over a mortgage given by the husband at the time he acquired the land, the proceeds of which he used to pay for the land. Fontenot v. Soileau, 2 La. Ann. 774.

In Moring v. Dickerson, 85 N. C. 466, in holding to be a purchase money mortgage, a mortgage executed to a third person contemporaneously with a deed conveying the property to the mortgagor, the proceeds of which were used in paying for the land, and hence to take priority over a prior dated mortgage executed by the purchaser, the court said that it reached this conclusion, "not upon the ground of any supposed equity in the vendor as such to have the purchase money of the land sold or any right of subrogation in the defendant . . . to his lien upon the land, but purely and simply upon the ground that the two instruments, being executed at the same moment of time, are to be treated as one, and construed as if the association had conveyed the land directly to her, and had not made use of the defendant . . . as an instrument to that end. If there had been an interval of time between the two transactions during which the title to the land had rested in . . . [defendant], then this right of priority would have been lost to her and attached to the elder mortgage."

Money advanced to be used in buying a tract of land, under a promise by the purchaser to execute the lender a mortgage for the amount advanced, in equity constitutes a lien upon the land, whether or not the mortgage is executed; and this lien is superior to a subsequently executed mortgage to a person having notice of the facts, and is also superior to any homestead rights of the purchaser. *Foster Lumber Co. v. Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action, brought to determine the adverse claims to 120 acres of land in Otter Trail county, the three defendants, John W. Thorp, James A. Brown, and E. R. Keplinger, answered, each claiming a mortgage lien superior to plaintiff's estate —as to dower and homestead rights.

A mortgage to a third person executed by the purchaser contemporaneously with a deed of the mortgaged land to the latter is a purchase money mortgage, and as such is not subject to the dower right of the wife of the mortgagor. Clark v. Munroe, 14 Mass. 351. Neither is it subject to any homestead rights of the purchaser. Foster Lumber Co. v. Harlan County Bank, supra.

A mortgage executed to a third person, to secure money then advanced on the purchase price, where executed contemporaneously with a deed to the mortgagor of the mortgaged premises, is a purchase money mortgage, and hence the signature of the wife of the mortgagor is not necessary to give it validity, and it is not subject to the homestead rights of the mortgagor or his wife. Jones v. Parker, 51 Wis. 218, 8 N. W. 124.

Where land is purchased with the money of another, actually paid to the vendor by the lender, none of it passing through the hands of the purchaser, a mortgage contemporaneously executed to secure the money thus advanced is a purchase money mortgage as against any homestead rights. Austin v. Underwood, 37 Ill. 438, 87 Am. Dec. 254.

So where, at the instance of a purchaser of land, money borrowed of a third person is paid by the lender directly to the vendor, to apply on the purchase price, the lien of the lender takes precedence over any homestead rights of the purchaser, although the former has no mortgage on the land to secure the money he has advanced, the purchaser having violated his agreement to secure the loan by a mortgage on the land. Magee v. Magee, 51 Ill. 500, 99 Am. Dec. 571.

It has, however, been held that a statute declaring that a homestead right shall not be claimed against a debt due for the purchase money of land has reference only to money due from the purchaser to the vendor, and not to money advanced the purchaser to pay for the land. Eyster v. Hatheway, 50 Ill. 521, 99 Am. Dec. 537.

—miscellaneous.

As between the lien of the vendor for the purchase money, and a mortgage to a third person to secure a loan to the mortgagor of money paid on the purchase price, the mortgage has priority. Neff v. Crumbaker, 40 Ohio St. 85.

A person advancing money to pay off a purchase money note, and taking a deed to the land as security, is entitled to priority over general creditors in sharing in the proceeds of the sale of the land. Hill v. Cole, 84 Ga. 245, 10 S. E. 739.

A subsequent lien holder who advances money to pay the balance of the purchase price due to the vendor, in order to protect his lien as against other lien holders, has the right of priority for the amount thus advanced. Steinkemeyer v. Gillespie, 82 Ill. 253.

A mortgage to a third person to secure money advanced by the latter to apply on the purchase price, where executed substantially at the time of the execution of a deed of the property to the mortgagor, is a purchase money mortgage, and does not require, for its validity, the signature of the husband of the mortgagor. Wheadon v. Mead, 72 Minn. 372, 75 N. W. 598. And as to such a mortgage, when a husband is the purchaser, the signature of his wife is not necessary to its validity. Jones v. Parker, 51 Wis. 218, 8 N. W. 124.

Where mortgage is subsequent to deed.

A mortgage executed to a third person subsequently to a conveyance of the legal title to the property to the mortgagor is nevertheless a purchase money mortgage, where the two conveyances are in fact a part of the same transaction, or where the mortgage is executed in accordance with an agreement entered into at the time the mortgagor acquired the legal title.

In Stewart v. Smith, 36 Minn. 82, 1 Am. St. Rep. 651, 30 N. W. 430, in holding it to be unnecessary that a mortgage advanced for purchase money should be executed contemporaneously with the deed conveying the mortgaged property to the mortgagor, the in the premises. The trial resulted in findings that plaintiff was the owner, subject to the liens the defendants asserted. From the judgment entered upon these findings, this appeal is taken.

On December 18, 1902, the defendant Keplinger was the owner of the land, and on that day gave defendant Austin C. Knox a contract agreeing to convey for $3,200. Knox went into possession and made certain payments, but not as agreed, and prior to December, 1907, he removed from the state. On April 21, 1908, $2,116.40 was due and unpaid on the contract.

court reasoned: "The rule, as generally stated in the books, is that, to give a purchase money mortgage this precedence, it must have been executed simultaneously, or at the same time, with the deed of purchase. Some ground for a narrow and literal construction of this language is furnished by the fact that the reason usually assigned for the doctrine is the technical one of the mere transitory seisin of the mortgagor, rather than the superior equity which the mortgagee has to be paid the purchase money of the land before it shall be subjected to other claims against the purchaser. But it is evident, both upon principle and authority that what is meant by this statement of the rule is not that the two acts—the execution of the deed of purchase and the execution of the mortgage—should be literally simultaneous. This would be almost an impossibility. Some lapse of time must necessarily intervene between the two acts. An examination of the cases will show that the real test is not whether the deed and mortgage were in fact executed at the same instant, or even on the same day, but whether they were parts of one continuous transaction, and so intended to be, so that the two instruments should be given contemporaneous operation in order to promote the intent of the parties."

A mortgage is a purchase money mortgage, although not executed contemporaneously with a deed of the mortgaged property to the mortgagor, where the mortgage is subsequently executed in pursuance of an agreement between the parties at the time the execution of the deed, for the advancement of money on the purchase price and the execution of a mortgage to secure the same. MARIN v. KNOX. It is none the less a purchase money mortgage or deed of trust, although executed to a third person sometime subsequently to a conveyance of the mortgaged property to the mortgagor, where in the conveyance a deed of trust is contracted for. Wheatley v. Calhoun, 12 Leigh, 264, 37 Am. Dec. 654.

So, a mortgage given to secure money to be applied on the purchase price of land, although given after the execution of a deed of the property mortgaged, the mortgagee paying the money to a third person with whom the deed had been deposited in escrow until the payment of the purchase price, and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Keplinger, at this time residing on the Pacific coast, was in need of the money, and urged Knox to close up the deal. Finally, through agents and friends, an agreement was made whereby Knox, upon receiving the deed to the land, was to give a first mortgage thereon to raise $1,500 to pay Keplinger upon the amount due for the purchase price, and give a second mortgage for $616.40 to Keplinger, to secure the balance thereof. The defendant Thorp, through his agent, defendant Brown, agreed to take the first mortgage for $1,500, due in ten years, with 7½ per cent interest; securing the deed and delivering it to the mortgagor, is nevertheless a purchase money mortgage, and takes precedence over liens for material, although the material was on the property at the time the mortgage was executed. Birmingham Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Boggs, 116 Ala. 587, 67 Am. St. Rep. 147, 22 So. 852.

A mortgage given sometime after the execution of a deed conveying the land to the mortgagor is a purchase money mortgage, where executed to secure the payment of a note given for a portion of the purchase price of the land at the time of the original transaction. Reynolds v. Morse, 52 Iowa, 155, 2 N. W. 1070.

But even though a mortgage contains a recital that it is given to secure the advancement by the mortgagee of the balance due on the purchase price for the mortgaged property, it does not take priority over a previously executed mortgage on the same property by the mortgagor, although the latter mortgage was given to secure an ordinary debt. Houston v. Houston, 67 Ind. 276.

The mere fact that the proceeds of a mortgage were used to pay off an existing purchase money mortgage, gives to the mortgagee no right of priority on the theory that his mortgage is also a purchase money mortgage. Gashe v. Ohio Lumber Co. 5 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 130.

And mechanics' liens for material furnished and work performed upon property prior to the execution of a mortgage thereon to secure money loaned to pay upon the purchase price take priority over the mortgage. Mutual Aid Bldg. & L. Co. v. Gashe, 18 Ohio C. C. 681, 6 Ohio C. D. 779.

A person loaning money to be used in paying for land theretofore purchased is not a surety for the purchaser, or under any obligation to pay the debt created in purchasing the land, and hence is not entitled to priority over a judgment lien against the purchaser existing prior to the date of the mortgage, there being no assignment of the deed to the mortgagee, and no circumstances connected with the transaction manifesting any intention to keep the lien of the vendor alive for his protection, but the agreement being merely that the mortgagee should rely upon the mortgage as his security, the transaction amounting therefore simply to a loan of money to the mortgagor upon an agreed but, since Brown was to receive from Thorp for the services rendered all of the interest above 6 per cent, the \$1,500 mortgage was made to draw only 6 per cent interest annually, and a separate mortgage made to Brown to secure the $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest. Also a mortgage for \$616.40 was made to Keplinger. The deed from Keplinger to Knox was dated January 13, 1908. The mortgages to Thorp and Brown were dated April 11, 1908, and that to Keplinger dated April 21, 1908. The Thorp mortgage was filed for record April 23, 1908, the Brown mortgage May 1, 1908, at 4 P. M., the deed to Knox May 1, 1908, at 4:40 P. M., and the Keplinger mortgage May 7, 1908. The testimony shows that Mr. Baker, Keplinger's agent, did not deliver the deed until he received the mortgage from Knox for the balance of the purchase price. Plaintiff obtained title to the property upon an execution sale under a judgment rendered and docketed in the district court of said county, in his favor and against the defendant Austin C. Knox, May 24, 1907, for \$210.68.

Ever since the decision of Banning v. Edes, 6 Minn. 402, Gil. 270, it has been the law in this state that a purchase mon-security. Cohn v. Hoffman, 50 Ark. 108, 6 S. W. 511.

So, the fact that a purchase money loan was paid out of the proceeds of a mortgage on the property purchased does not give to the mortgage a priority of lien over prior mechanics' liens. Thomas v. Hoge, 58 Kan. 166, 48 Pac. 844.

Where a deed to land was executed one day prior to a trustee deed given by the grantee to secure a third person for money loaned to pay a portion of the purchase price, and the two are separate and distinct acts, and there is no testimony from which it can be presumed that the vendor, the purchaser, and the holder of the trust deed intended to have the two transactions bear any relation to each other, the deed of trust will not be regarded as a purchase money mortgage, as against a person in possession of a portion of the land at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and who was a bona fide purchaser from the mortgagor of such portion of the land. Small v. Stagg, 95 Ill. 39.

A mortgage executed sometime after the mortgagor acquired title to the property mortgaged, although executed to secure the payment of money loaned to pay the balance of the purchase money, is not a purchase money mortgage, and as such entitled to priority over a judgment lien against the mortgagor, although the mortgagee actually paid the money directly to the vendor. Gilman v. Dingeman, 49 Iowa, 308.

A mortgage executed three days after the mortgagor acquired the property is not a purchase money mortgage, within the terms of a statute giving such mortgages a priority, although the proceeds were actually used to pay for the land mortgaged, the mortgage itself containing no recital of that fact; and hence judgments existing against the purchaser at the time he obtained the title to the property take priority over the mortgage. Heusler v. Nickum, 38 Md. 270.

A purchase money mortgage executed to a third person prior to the actual acquirement by the mortgagor of a legal title to the land, although at the time of the mortgage he was in possession thereof, does not take priority over a subsequent deed of the property from the mortgagor to a third person having no notice of the mortgage. Donovan v. Twist, 105 App. Div. 171, 93 N. Y. Supp. 990.

Where a purchaser of land borrowed the amount of a cash payment from a third person, giving the latter a mortgage on the land to secure the money advanced, which was executed prior to the execution to the purchaser of a deed to the land, the mortgage does not take priority over a mortgage executed to the vendor contemporaneously with the execution of the deed to secure the balance of the purchase money, although the latter mortgage was recorded subsequently to the former. Brower v. Witmeyer, 121 Ind. 83, 22 N. E. 975.

But it has been held that, although a person may have had a vendor's lien upon the land, which he surrendered when taking a mortgage thereon, nevertheless as to another mortgage upon the land of the same date he has no advantage from the fact that his mortgage was given to secure the purchase money. Koevenig v. Schmitz, 71 Iowa, 175, 32 N. W. 320.

Where by agreement between the vendor, the vendee, and a third person, the latter advances to the vendee money to be applied on the purchase price, it being agreed that his mortgage is to have priority over a mortgage thereafter executed to the vendor for the balance of the purchase money, the mortgage of the latter will be subject to the first mortgage, according to the terms of the agreement. Hopler v. Cutler, — N. J. Eq. —, 34 Atl. 746. A. G. S.

ey mortgage has priority over a previously docketed judgment against the mortgagor. Hence plaintiff's ownership must necessarily be subject to Keplinger's mortgage for \$616.40, unless the latter lost his right by permitting the other two mortgages, if they be not also purchase money mortgages, to obtain priority over his. Reilly v. Williams, 47 Minn. 590, 50 N. W. 826. The defendants Thorp and Brown insist that their mortgages are purchase money mortgages. If this be true, the judgment is right. It is also the settled law in this state that a person other than the vendor may obtain a purchase money mortgage, so called, thereby acquiring the same equities as would the vendor, had he taken the mortgage. Jones v. Tainter, 15 Minn. 512, Gil. 423; Stewart v. Smith, 36 Minn. 82, 1 Am. St. Rep. 651, 30 N. W. 430. See also Carey v. Boyle, 53 Wis. 574, 11 N. W. 47; Cowardin v. Anderson, 78 Va. 88; Kaiser v. Lembeck, 55 Iowa, 244, 7 N. W. 519. Therefore the only question here is: Does the evidence sustain the court's finding that these mortgages to Thorp and Brown were such that they may be considered in a legal sense purchase money mortgages? The evidence is clear that every dollar obtained by means of these mortgages, namely, \$1,500, was paid to Keplinger upon the purchase price, and that the deed to Knox was not delivered until this money was turned over. The court had also ample warrant for finding that it was agreed between all the parties concerned that the delivery of the deed was to be part of the transaction of executing all three mortgages as purchase money mortgages, to take precedence among themselves as therein agreed. The only doubt that might be entertained as to the correctness of the disposition of the case by the lower court arises from the Brown mortgage. But this vanishes when the situation and agreement of the parties are considered. The loan agreed to be made by Thorp through Brown was for \$1,500, payable ten years from date, with $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest per annum. Thorp resided in New York, his agent in Minnesota. Between them there was an understanding that Brown should receive for his services part of the agreed interest as it was paid in. To carry out this agreement, the two mortgages were made; that one of Mr. Brown being very brief, conditioned to be void if \$22.50 was paid on April 11th annually for ten years, this being the same date as the 6 per cent interest stipulated in the Thorp mortgage became due. In reality, the two constitute but one mortgage, securing the \$1,500 borrowed and used to pay for the land, and the agreed 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) interest thereon, namely, $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum.

Plaintiff also claims that, since the deed and the mortgages were not executed simultaneously, the mortgages may not be regarded as purchase money mortgages. It is true that the Thorp mortgage was recorded before the Keplinger mortgage was acknowledged, and hence must have been delivered before. But we must consider the situation of the parties and their agents. Each one of the four parties to the transaction resided in a state where none of the others were. Their agents were not in the same town. Under these circumstances, a few days' difference in the delivery of the instruments that completed the one transaction is not significant. Stewart v. Smith, 36 Minn. 82, 1 Am. St. Rep. 651, 30 N. W. 430; Demeter v. Wilcox, 115 Mo. 634, 37 Am. St. Rep. 422, 22 S. W. 613.

Plaintiff earnestly contends that, because the contract for purchase of the land was made in 1902, there could be no agreement to take back a purchase money mortgage in 1908; the written contract containing no provision for a mortgage. We fail to see the force of this position. In Laidley v. Aikin, 80 Iowa, 112, 20 Am. St. Rep. 408, 45 N. W. 384, the contract to convey had been given three years before the purchase money mortgage was made. Knox had failed to make the payments stipulated in the contract, and Keplinger, by giving the thirty-day notice required, was in a position to terminate all rights under the contract. In this situation, had Keplinger given a deed upon receiving back a mortgage from Knox for the amount due and unpaid, could it for a moment be claimed that the mortgage was not entitled to be considered as a purchase money mortgage? When plaintiff obtained his judgment, it did not become a lien on the unpaid amount of the purchase price, and he should not be heard to object to whatever agreement the parties mutually agreed upon to secure the same, as long as the equity of Knox in the land was not diminished.

We conclude, from the examination of the testimony and admitted facts, that the court was fully warranted in finding that, at the time the mortgages were delivered, $2,116.40 was due Keplinger upon the purchase price of the land; that the execution and delivery of the deed by Keplinger to Knox, and the mortgages from the latter to Thorp, Brown, and Keplinger, together with the payment to Keplinger of the proceeds of the $1,500 loan upon the unpaid purchase price of the land, constituted but one transaction; that the intent and agreement of all said parties was that the title to the land should vest in Knox, subject to the purchase money mortgage liens of said three mortgages; and hence that said three mortgages in fact do represent and secure the payment of the purchase price of the land, and no other amount whatsoever.

The authorities relied on by appellant (Nicholson v. Aney, 127 Iowa, 278, 103 N. W. 201; Van Loben Sels v. Bunnell, 120 Cal. 680, 53 Pac. 266; Small v. Stagg, 95 Ill. 39) are not applicable, because either it was shown that the money was a mere loan, with no agreement between the vendor, vendee, and mortgagor that the mortgage should be a purchase money mortgage, or else no agreement to so consider the mortgage between these interested parties was proven. The cases of Stansell v. Roberts, 13 Ohio, 148, 42 Am. Dec. 193, and Heuissler v. Nickum, 38 Md. 278, were decided upon the effect given to the recording statutes of those states.

Judgment affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, Appt.,
v.
NORMAN WILLIAMS.

(158 N. C. 610, 73 S. E. 1000.)

License — nonresident merchant — agent — uniformity.

A municipal corporation cannot be authorized to exact a license tax from agents seeking orders for merchants located in oth-

Note. — Discrimination against nonresidents, by statute or municipal ordinance imposing license or occupation tax.

The scope of this note is exclusive of the question as to when a statute or ordinance which discriminates against nonresidents amounts to an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce. The aspect of this question which is most commonly presented has already been treated in a note to State v. Bayer, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 297, entitled "License or occupation tax on hawkers and peddlers, and persons engaged in soliciting orders by sample or otherwise, as a violation of the commerce clause," and its continuation in 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 265.

Nor does its scope require the inclusion of cases involving statutes or ordinances relating to sales and discriminating against property because of its extraterritorial origin, such as Vines v. State, 67 Ala. 73; Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642; Weaver v. State, 89 Ga. 639, 15 S. E. 840; Atlanta v. Jacobs, 125 Ga. 523, 54 S. E. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(March 6, 1912.)

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Superior Court for Carteret County which reversed a judgment of the Mayor's Court of Morehead City convicting defendant of violating a municipal ordinance forbidding the solicitation of orders without a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. N. Bickett, Attorney General, and T. H. Calvert, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

No counsel for defendant.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was convicted in the mayor's court of Morehead City for the violation of an ordinance of the town which required "every person, firm, or corporation in the state, soliciting or taking orders for goods at retail, to be delivered in the town by nonresident merchants, firms, or corporations resident in the state, to pay a tax of $10 per day or $30 per year." Defendant appealed to the superior court, in which a special verdict was returned by the jury finding that the defendant represented one A. A. Joseph, a merchant tailor or clothier of Goldsboro, North Carolina, and solicited and received orders in said town of Morehead City for tailor-made clothes, to be delivered to customers there, without having paid the tax imposed by 534; State v. Furbush, 72 Me. 493; and Sipe v. Murphy, 49 Ohio St. 536, 17 L.R.A. 184, 31 N. E. 884.

Neither does it include cases in which the enactment in question was attacked as discriminating in favor of nonresidents, of which Ft. Smith v. Scruggs, 70 Ark. 549, 58 L.R.A. 921, 91 Am. St. Rep. 100, 69 S. W. 679; People v. Schreiber, 250 Ill. 345, 95 N. E. 189; and State v. Hoyt, 71 Vt. 59, 42 Atl. 973, are instances; nor cases in which the alleged discrimination was between different classes of citizens; but it is intended to present only those decisions which involve the question of the right to discriminate against nonresidents, or the question whether a particular statute or ordinance does so discriminate.

It is desired to make special mention of certain cases as deemed not to fall within the scope of this note, which turn rather on the want of power on the part of the municipality to tax an occupation not wholly carried on within its limits, than on a want of power to enact a discriminatory ordinance. These are Com. v. Stedder, 2 Cush.

the ordinance. Upon this finding, the court held the ordinance to be invalid, directed a verdict to be entered accordingly, and discharged defendant, and the state appealed. The Constitution (article 5, § 3) authorizes the legislature to tax trades, professions, franchises, and incomes, provided that no income shall be taxed when the property from which it is derived is taxed. In accordance with this article, the legislature, by Private Laws of 1905, chap. 254, § 12, provided that the commissioners of Morehead City should have the power to levy and collect a fair and reasonable special or license tax, and, among others, on the following subjects: "Itinerant merchants, peddlers, and transient dealers, drummers or commercial travelers, and every agency for the sale of merchandise not manufactured in the town, and all other subjects taxed by the state." The ordinance in question was enacted under authority supposed to have been given in the passage we have taken from the amended charter of the town, and we are to say whether it is valid or not. The Constitution (article 5, § 3) provides that "laws shall be passed taxing, by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies, or otherwise, and also all real and personal property, according to its true value in money;" and there is conferred in the same section the power to tax trades, professions, and so forth, as above set out. This court has held that the rule of uniformity applies to 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679, in which it was held that a city could not require a license, even without a money payment, as a condition of the running of an omnibus into the city by an inhabitant of another town; Kiel v. Chicago, 176 Ill. 137, 52 N. E. 29, in which an ordinance requiring a person carrying on the business of a brewer or distiller within the city to obtain a license, and providing that the selling or delivering within the city of any product of a brewery or distillery by or on behalf of the person, firm, or corporation conducting or operating such brewery or distillery, should be held to be a carrying on the business of a brewer or of a distiller within the meaning of the ordinance, was held to be in excess of the power conferred upon the city to tax, license, and regulate brewers; and St. Charles v. Nolle, 51 Mo. 122, 11 Am. Rep. 440, in which it was held to be not within the powers of the city to impose a license tax upon wagons hauling into and out of the city.

The inquiry to which this note is addressed is of a twofold character, its first branch being whether a state or municipality may discriminate against nonresidents in its enactments; the second, whether or not the particular enactments in question are discriminatory.

Again, the question constituting the first branch of inquiry, as to whether nonresidents may be discriminated against, has two aspects, its first being whether discriminatory legislation is a proper exercise of the power to legislate, and its second being whether such legislation contravenes constitutional restrictions. The former aspect is more apparent where municipal ordinances are involved; but where statutes are in question, it is overshadowed by the constitutional question.

In Dillon, Municipal Corporations, 5th ed. § 593, it is said: "As it would be unreasonable and unjust to make, under the same circumstances, an act done by one person penal, and if done by another not so, ordinances which have this effect cannot be sustained. Special and unwarranted discrimination, or unjust or oppressive interference in particular cases, is not to be allowed. The powers vested in municipal corporations should, as far as practicable, be exercised by ordinances general in their nature and impartial in their operation."

"It is a rule, therefore," says the court in Simrall v. Covington, 90 Ky. 444, 9 L.R.A. 556, 29 Am. St. Rep. 398, 14 S. W. 369, "that where the by-law of a municipality enacted under a general grant of power or by virtue of its incidental authority is unfair and partial in its operation, it will be declared void. It will not be upheld if it be unreasonable and oppressive. It must not contravene common right or the general law of the state, or make unwarranted or special discriminations."

So, also, in Jonas v. Gilbert, 5 Can. S. C. 356, it is held that a by-law which discriminates between resident and nonresident traders, merchants, etc., by imposing upon nonresidents a license tax of double the amount required from residents, exceeds the powers vested in a municipality to license occupations and to fix the fees therefor, since the general power to tax by means of licenses involves the principle of equality and uniformity; and the power to discriminate must be expressly authorized by law, and cannot be inferred from general words.

An ordinance imposing a greater license fee on nonresidents than is required of residents is void as having a direct tendency to create monopoly. State, Muhlenbrinck, Prosecutor, v. Long Branch, 42 N. J. L. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518; State, Morgan, Prosecutor, v. Orange, 50 N. J. L. 389, 13 Atl. 240.

In State, Muhlenbrinck, Prosecutor, v. Long Branch, supra, the court said: "The corporation is not endowed with power to pass ordinances in restraint of trade. . . . The control it may exercise over business and trade is such only as belongs to the necessities and demands of local governments, such as have relation to the general prosperity of the citizen, the public health, order, and morals of the community. It cannot, outside of these considerations, enter into the arena of business competition, to advance a favored class and retard others.

the latter provision as much as to the former, although there are no express words to that effect in the section; it being considered that a tax not uniform, as properly understood, though levied on trades, professions, or privileges, would be so inconsistent with natural justice and with the intent so apparent in the section we have quoted, that its collection would be restrained as unconstitutional. Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119; Worth v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 89 N. C. 291, 45 Am. Rep. 679. And this may be taken as the settled construction of the section. It may also be considered as settled that in laying the tax the different subjects may be reasonably, though not arbitrarily, classified, and a different rule of taxation prescribed for each class, provided the rule is uniform in its application to the class for which it was made. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 663; Worth v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. supra. As stated in those cases, the result must be to prevent discrimination among the individuals or subjects of any one class, based upon special privileges, immunities, or exemptions allowed to one, and not to the others. If an ordinance, therefore, is not founded upon this fair and just basis, it will be deemed unreasonable and violative of the fundamental principle of taxation. Constitutional and legislative authority conferred upon a municipality to tax does not enable it to create a privilege for the purpose of taxing it, or to discriminate between per-

All citizens in pursuit of legitimate, honest occupations stand equal before the law, and a police power intrusted to a corporation is unreasonably exercised in making invidious distinctions between citizens endowed with equal rights. It is incompetent for this board of commissioners, intrusted as it is, with the rule in local municipal affairs, to erect walls of exclusion against citizens without its limits, or obstruct free commerce and trade between them and its own inhabitants."

Another reason suggested in Sayre v. Phillips, 148 Pa. 482, 16 L.R.A. 49, 33 Am. St. Rep. 842, 24 Atl. 76, is that as the enactment of legislation discriminating against citizens of other states is beyond the power of a state, and as the power of a municipality to enact by-laws and ordinances is derived from the state, the state cannot confer upon a municipality powers which it does not itself possess, and cannot give its creature immunity from the settled limitations that bind its own actions.

It is thoroughly settled, in view of the provision of art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution, that citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, and the provision of the 14th Amendment, that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws,—that neither a state nor its municipalities, who derive their power from the state, may discriminate against nonresidents. This rule, however, is subject to certain exceptions which exist: (a) Where a foreign corporation is the object of discrimination; (b) where the statute or ordinance in question is an exercise of the police power, and the discrimination therein between residents and nonresidents bears some reasonable relation to the end sought to be attained, as in cases of statutes relating to the granting of licenses to sell liquor or to practise medicine; (c) where the statute is an exercise of the taxing power, in which case it may be proper to make a special exemption of persons otherwise taxed; and (d) where the regulation in question is of the right to take fish or game.

Aliens.

The decisions as to the power of a state under the 14th Amendment to deny to aliens the right to engage in a lawful occupation are collected in a note to Com. v. Hana, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799. The only additional case bearing upon the question which appears to have been decided since the compilation of such note is State v. Kofines, 33 R. I. 211, 80 Atl. 432, set forth infra, under heading "Discrimination in fish and game laws."

Foreign corporations.

Ever since the decision of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 586, 10 L. ed. 306, and Paul v. Virginia, infra, it has been a settled principle of constitutional law that while, where contracts or rights of property are to be enforced by or against corporations, the courts of the United States will, for the purpose of maintaining jurisdiction, consider the corporation as representing citizens of the state under which it is created, and to this extent will treat a corporation as a citizen within the clause of the Constitution extending judicial power of the United States to controversies between citizens of the different states, a corporation is not a citizen within the meaning of the provision of art. 4, § 2, which declares that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states.

It is equally well settled that a foreign corporation is not entitled to claim the protection of the provision of the 14th Amendment, that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Thus, in People v. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia, 92 N. Y. 311, 44 Am. Rep. 380, the court said: "The constitutional difference between the rights of nonresident individuals and foreign corporations is fundamental and apparent. The citizen of another state has a constitutional right to come within our jurisdiction. The charter of the nation has secured him that right, and we cannot exclude him, nor clog his right with con-sons exercising the same privilege, by imposing a tax upon one of a class at a higher rate in a different mode or upon other principles, than one applied to the exercise of the same privilege by others of the same class. The power to tax extends no further than is permitted by its charter, and any attempt to impose burdens upon some of a class from which others are exempted would be void, as being beyond the granted powers of the municipality, and as an exercise of partial legislation. Nashville v. Althrop, 5 Coldw. 554; Cooley, Const. Lim. 390. The defendant can be held liable to taxation as a merchant, under the general laws of the state or of the municipality, in the same manner and to the same extent as all other merchants of the same class exercising these privileges within the corporation, but not otherwise, or farther than they. When the by-law of a municipal corporation enacted under a general grant of power, or by virtue of its incidental authority, is partial, unreasonable or oppressive, it will be declared void, as an unwarranted exercise of its taxing power. Simrall v. Covington, 90 Ky. 444, 9 L.R.A. 556, 29 Am. St. Rep. 398, 14 S. W. 369.

"Municipal by-laws must also be reasonable. Whenever they appear not to be so, the court must, as a matter of law, declare them void. . . . So a by-law, to be reasonable, should be in harmony with the general principles of the common law." Cooley Const. Lim. 200, 202. "As it would be unreasonable and unjust to make, under ditions, unless in exceptional cases under the police power. But foreign corporations, artificial beings, the product of a law not our own, have no constitutional right to pass their own borders and come into ours. The Federal Constitution has neither granted nor secured any such right. We may exclude absolutely, and in that power is involved the right to admit upon such conditions as we please. Until they are within our jurisdiction the final clause of article [amendment] 14, by its own terms, does not apply. While they stand at the door bargaining for the right to come within, they may decline to come, but cannot question our conditions if they do."

The fact that a foreign corporation has for a long time done business and acquired valuable property within the state does not render the enforcement against it of a statute imposing conditions upon the right of a foreign corporation to do business within the state a violation of the 14th Amendment. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 121 S. W. 194.

While if a foreign corporation is admitted into a state and lawfully engages in business therein, its property and rights within such state are entitled to the equal protection of the law, the same as those of a like domestic corporation, it does not thereby so come within the protection of the 14th Amendment that a discriminatory license fee may not be imposed as a condition upon its right to continue in business within the state. Manchester F. Ins. Co. v. Herriott, 91 Fed. 711.

An exception to the general rule that a state may not discriminate against nonresidents therefore exists in the case of foreign corporations, unless the foreign corporation has acquired some contract right to immunity from discrimination, or the powers of the state to enact discriminatory legislation are otherwise limited by the provisions of its own Constitution.

The courts have accordingly affirmed the constitutionality of —a law requiring insurance companies incorporated under the laws of other states to file security before they can obtain a license (40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cense to issue policies in the state. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357;

—a statute requiring agents of foreign insurance companies to take out a license before doing business in the state, and to pay certain fees and percentages. Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410, 19 L. ed. 972;

—a statute requiring agents of foreign insurance companies to pay a percentage of the amount of premiums received by them, into the state treasury. People v. Thurber, 13 Ill. 554;

—a municipal ordinance imposing a license tax on all foreign insurance companies doing business in the city, based upon the amount of premiums received by them. Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 364;

—a statute imposing a tax upon foreign insurance companies as a condition of their doing business within the state, which discriminates in favor of domestic insurance companies by imposing a higher tax upon foreign companies. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. v. Herriott, 109 Iowa, 606, 77 Am. St. Rep. 548, 80 N. W. 665;

—a statute imposing upon insurance companies organized in foreign countries, as a condition of their right to continue in business in the state, a license tax greater than upon domestic companies or those of sister states. Manchester F. Ins. Co. v. Herriott, 91 Fed. 711;

—a statute requiring foreign insurance companies only to take out licenses for their agents as a condition to doing business in the state. Com. v. Gregory, 121 Ky. 256, 89 S. W. 168.

—a statute providing, as one of the conditions upon which foreign insurance companies are admitted to do business, that they pay certain taxes charged against them under an unconstitutional statute. New York L. Ins. Co. v. McMaster, 84 S. C. 495, 66 S. E. 877;

—a statute imposing a license tax on certain classes of corporations doing business within the state, whose domiciles are in other states or foreign countries. State v. Hammond Packing Co. 110 La. 180, 98 Am. St. Rep. 459, 34 So. 368;

—a statute providing that no foreign corthe same circumstances, an act done by one person penal, and if done by another not so, ordinances which have this effect cannot be sustained. Special and unwarranted discrimination, or unjust or oppressive interference in particular cases, is not to be allowed. The powers vested in municipal corporations should, as far as practicable, be exercised by ordinances general in their nature and impartial in their operation." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 322. As said in Simrall v. Covington, supra: The above "views are enforced in the cases of Mobile v. Yuille, 3 Ala. 137, 36 Am. Dec. 441; Robinson v. Franklin, 1 Humph. 156, 34 Am. Dec. 625; Anderson v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 173, 2 L.R.A. 110, 10 Am. St. Rep. 175, 19 Pac. 719, and many other cases that might be cited. All recognize the rule, which is fundamental, that the by-laws of a municipality, whether they purport to regulate callings or otherwise, must, as indeed must every law, preserve equality of right. Those exercising the same privilege must be treated alike. The door must be closed to none by discrimination, if we would avoid monopoly and wrong. This principle is as necessary to sound legislation as the circulation of the blood is to the human system, or the flow of tide water to the ocean. It has produced a line of decisions which are universally regarded as sound by the courts of the country. Thus, in Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642, an ordinance of a city, passed under a general charter power, exacting a poration, except a foreign insurance company, which does not invest and use its capital in the state, shall have an office in the state, unless it shall have first obtained an annual license so to do. Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & Mill. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 181, 31 L. ed. 650, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 737:

—a statute imposing upon a foreign corporation a special franchise tax in addition to that levied upon corporations generally. Southern R. Co. v. Greene, 160 Ala. 396, 4 So. 404.

A statute providing that when, by the laws of any other state, any taxes are imposed on insurance companies organized or incorporated under the law of the state, and transacting business in such other state, greater than those imposed by the enacting state upon similar companies of such other state, the same tax shall be imposed upon all insurance companies doing business in the state which are organized under the laws of such other state, is not contrary to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. New York, 119 U. S. 110, 30 L. ed. 342, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 108, affirming 92 N. Y. 311, 44 Am. Rep. 380.

But a like statute has been held to contravene the provisions of the Kentucky Constitution that no law shall be enacted to take effect upon the approval of any other authority than the general assembly: that taxes shall be levied and collected for public purposes only, and shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected by the general laws; that the purposes for which a tax is levied must be distinctly specified, and no tax levied and collected for one purpose shall ever be devoted to another purpose; and that the general assembly may, by general laws only, provide for the payment of license fees on franchises and the various trades, occupations, and professions. Western & S. L. Ins. Co. v. Com. 133 Ky. 292, 117 S. W. 376.

of business and chief works within the state, a greater license tax than upon those which do, does not violate the provision of the Federal Constitution prohibiting any state from passing any law impairing an obligation of a contract, or the provision of the 14th Amendment, that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Blue Jacket Consol. Copper Co. v. Scherr, 50 W. Va. 633, 40 S. E. 514.

A statute imposing a greater license tax upon foreign insurance corporations than is required of domestic insurance corporations does not conflict with the constitutional provision requiring that taxation shall be equal and uniform, since the burden is equal upon all those included in the same class; nor does it conflict with art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution, since citizens of all classes are permitted to pursue the occupation of insuring by incorporating themselves in companies for that business under the laws of the state. State v. Fossdick, 21 La. Ann. 434.

But in American Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Colorado, 204 U. S. 103, 51 L. ed. 393, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198, 9 Ann. Cas. 978, reversing 34 Colo. 240, 82 Pac. 531, it is held that a contract right to do business in the state during the corporate lifetime of domestic corporations, without being subject to any greater liabilities than then were or might be imposed upon domestic corporations, is acquired by a foreign corporation by virtue of its admission into a state with the right to do business therein under the then existing laws of that state, which, inter alia, subject a foreign corporation coming into the state to the liabilities, restrictions, and duties which then were or might thereafter be imposed upon domestic corporations of like character; and that such right is unconstitutionally impaired by a statute exacting from such corporation an annual tax or license fee in double the amount of that imposed upon domestic corporations.

An ordinance requiring insurance agents who represent companies not located within a city, and those only, to pay a tax and procure a license before transacting business, license for selling goods, and fixing one rate for selling goods at the time within the city, and another and much larger for those without, was held invalid, as unjust, partial, and oppressive. In Nashville v. Althrop, 5 Coldw. 554, an ordinance discriminating between merchants and other dealers residing within and those without the limits of the city, and prescribing a special rate of taxation for the latter, was declared to be beyond the limit of constitutional legislation. In this state we have no constitutional provision as to taxation co nomine, but it is the settled constitutional rule, declared by oft-repeated decisions of this court, that every tax must be certain, universal, and, so far as practicable, equal and uniform. Burdens cannot constitutionally be imposed upon particular individuals, while others of the same class or locality who have rendered no public service are exempt." The case of Simrall v. Covington, supra, is directly in point, as will appear from this extract: "The ordinance now in question not only discriminates between residents of the city of Covington and those residing outside of it, whether within or without the state, but it places a burden upon some within the city, while others of its residents engaged in a like business are exempt. It is therefore unreasonable partial legislation. To be reasonable, a municipal by-law should be equal in its operation. Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405; Barling v. West, 29 Wis. 307, 9 Am. Rep. 576. This cannot be justified by the rule that conditions may be imposed upon a foreign corporation desiring to do business within the state, since it relates directly to, and deals with, the individual representative. Simrall v. Covington, 90 Ky. 444, 9 L.R.A. 556, 29 Am. St. Rep. 398, 14 S. W. 369.

Liquor licenses.

Another exception to the general rule that enactments discriminating against nonresidents are invalid exists where the statute or ordinance in question is a police regulation, and the classification dividing residents from nonresidents bears a reasonable relation to the purpose to be subserved. To this exception may be assigned the decisions which uphold the constitutionality of a requirement that the holder of a liquor license must be a resident of the state, which are collected in the note to DeGrazier v. Stephens, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1033, since the compilation of which no further decisions have appeared.

A statute providing that every person who shall engage in the business of selling liquor to citizens or residents of the state at wholesale, or soliciting and taking orders from citizens or residents of the state for liquors to be shipped into the state, or furnished or supplied at wholesale to any person within the state not having his, their, or its principal place of business within the state does not discriminate against nonresidents, the tax being upon the business done within the state, and nothing being required of a nonresident that is not required of a resident vendor. People v. Walling, 53 Mich. 264, 18 N. W. 807, which is reversed in 116 U. S. 446, 29 L. ed. 691, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454, upon the ground that the statute in question was an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce.

A statute imposing a tax on the business of manufacturing or selling liquor, which provides that no person paying a manufacturer's tax thereunder shall be liable to pay a wholesale dealer's tax, does not discriminate against nonresidents of the state. People v. Lyng, 74 Mich. 579, 42 N. W. 139.

Licenses to practise medicine.

To the same exception may be referred the decisions as to the right of the state to discriminate between residents and nonresidents with regard to the qualifications which will entitle one to a license to practise medicine.

A statute making it unlawful for any person to practise medicine within the state without first obtaining a license, and providing for the issuance of licenses, (1) to graduates of reputable medical colleges; (2) to persons who have resided and practised medicine in the state continuously for ten years immediately prior to the taking effect of the act; and (3) to persons who have resided and practised medicine in the state continuously for three years immediately prior to the taking effect of the act, and who have prior to that date attended one full course of lectures in some reputable medical college,—is not, in so far as it makes continuous residence in the state either for ten years or for three years one of the necessary qualifications of the applicant for license to practise medicine, in conflict with the provisions of the Federal Constitution that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, and that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, since the act is not a grant of privileges or immunities, but an exercise of the police power for a purpose to which the classification therein made bears a direct relation. State ex rel. Walker v. Green, 112 Ind. 462, 14 N. E. 352.

A similar statute was sustained in Ex parte Spinney, 10 Nev. 323, in which it was said: "Now this law makes no distinction in terms between our own citizens and citizens of other states. It merely prescribes the qualifications that practitioners are required to possess, and admits all to practise who can bring themselves within the rule, whether they are citizens of this state or other states. But it is argued that one of the sorts of qualification recognized is such that of necessity none but citizens of this one being clearly an infringement of individual right, partial and unreasonable in its character, cannot be sustained."

This doctrine appears to have been adopted by practically all the courts, and is clearly founded in reason and justice. Some courts hold that such an ordinance is invalid because it authorizes the taking of one citizen's property for the benefit of the public, and, worse still, for private use or advantage, without just compensation. St. Charles v. Nolle, 51 Mo. 122, 11 Am. Rep. 440. But a sufficient reason under our Constitution is that the discrimination in favor of the resident of the town, and against the nonresident, violates the rule of uniformity. It has been held that such distinctions between the inhabitants of the state, based upon no other ground than the place of actual residence, are in restraint of trade, invidious, unjust, and illegal. State, Muhlenbrinck, Prosecutor, v. Long Branch, 42 N. J. L. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518. Ordinances passed in the exercise of the police power, or for the purpose of revenue, and intended to regulate or control the sale of articles in a town or city, or in other matters, must, of course, be reasonable, and it belongs to the courts to determine what are reasonable regulations within the power granted by charter. Kip v. Paterson, 26 N. J. L. 298; State, Morgan, Prosecutor, v. Orange, 50 N. J. L. 389, 13 Atl. 240. In the case last cited it was held that an ordinance imposing a larger license fee on a nonresident than on a resi-state can possess it. This is so, but it does not follow, therefore, that the law is unconstitutional; for if the qualification is in itself reasonable, and such as tends to subserve public interests, the legislature had the right to exact it, and the circumstance that citizens of other states cannot possess it may be a misfortune to them, but is no reason why a precaution proper in itself should be dispensed with."

An ordinance requiring the licensing of itinerant physicians, but which nowhere confines itself to traveling physicians who are nonresidents of the city, is not open to objection as discriminating in favor of residents. Fairfield v. Shallenberger, 135 Iowa, 615, 113 N. W. 459.

Discrimination in fish and game laws.

The decisions upon the right to discriminate against nonresidents in granting licenses to take fish or game are collected in the note to Harper v. Galloway, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794; and see also on the subject, State v. Leavitt, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799, as well as the cases following, which have appeared since the compilation of the note referred to.

In People v. Setunsky, 161 Mich. 624, 126 N. W. 844, it is held that a state may exclude nonresidents altogether from fishing privileges in its waters, and therefore may require them to pay a larger license fee for their fishing boats than is required from residents of the state.

A statute forbidding the taking of lobsters from the waters of the state without a license, and which provides that the commissioners of fisheries may grant or refuse such licenses "to such citizens of this state as have resided in this state for at least one year next preceding the granting of such license, as they may think proper," is a proper exercise of the police power, and does not violate any constitutional right of aliens or nonresidents. State v. Koffnes, 33 R. I. 211, 80 Atl. 432.

A statute prohibiting nonresidents from taking pearl mussels or other shellfish for profit, without license and payment of a prescribed privilege tax, does not contravene 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the provisions of art. 4, § 2, or of the 14th Amendment, of the Federal Constitution, since the title of game and fish not reduced to possession or under restraint is in the several states in trust for their inhabitants, and the right to take such game or fish is a property right, and not one of citizenship, and therefore not among the rights, privileges, and immunities secured by the Federal Constitution. State v. Ashman, 123 Tenn. 654, 135 S. W. 325.

Merchants.

The exception of "farm products purchased from the producer," from the return required to be made by merchants and other dealers as the basis of a license tax, is not a discrimination against the citizens of other states. State v. Stevenson, 109 N. C. 730, 26 Am. St. Rep. 595, 14 S. E. 385.

Such an exception does not render the statute imposing it a discrimination in favor of inhabitants of the state as against nonresidents, upon the theory that, by reason of locality, a merchant naturally will buy a much greater quantity of farm products in his own state than out of it. Ex parte Brown, 48 Fed. 435.

A statute requiring a license to be obtained for the sale of goods, if designed to discriminate against nonresident merchants, and against goods sold from other states, in favor of resident merchants and goods held in the state for sale, and so operating, is invalid. Ex parte Thornton, 4 Hughes, 220, 12 Fed. 538.

A statute imposing a tax on every nonresident who shall sell goods within the state so discriminates against nonresidents as to violate art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. Sinclair v. State, 69 N. C. 47.

An ordinance imposing a greater tax on the amount of sales made by nonresident merchants than on those made by residents contravenes a constitutional provision that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects. Easton City v. Easton Beef Co. 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 68.

But in Com. use of Titusville v. Clark, 195 Pa. 634, 57 L.R.A. 348, 86 Am. St. Rep. 694, dent was illegal, as being discriminating, and therefore unreasonable. Other decisions to be examined, and which seem to be directly in point, are Atlanta v. Jacobs, 125 Ga. 523, 154 S. E. 534; Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642; Saginaw v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 106 Mich. 32, 63 N. W. 985; Clements v. Casper, 4 Wyo. 494, 35 Pac. 472; Pacific Junction v. Dyer, 64 Iowa, 38, 19 N. W. 862; Shamokin v. Flannigan, 156 Pa. 43, 26 Atl. 780; Indianapolis v. Bieler, 138 Ind. 30, 36 N. E. 857; Graffty v. Rushville, 107 Ind. 502, 57 Am. Rep. 128, 8 N. E. 609; Fecheimer v. Louisville, 84 Ky. 306, 2 S. W. 65. "The corporation is not endowed with power to pass ordinances in restraint of trade. Kip v. Paterson, supra; Dunham v. Rochester, 5 Cow. 462. The control it may exercise over business and trade is such only as belongs to the necessities and demands of local government, such as have relation to the general prosperity of the citizen, the public health, order, and morals of the community. It cannot, outside of these considerations, enter into the arena of business competition to advance a favored class and retard others. All citizens in pursuit of legitimate, honest occupations stand equal before the law, and a police power intrusted to a 46 Atl. 286, it is held that the provision in an ordinance requiring a license tax for revenue purposes from all dealers or vendors of merchandise, that no manufacturer who is a citizen of the municipality shall be considered a dealer or vendor unless he sells goods not of his own manufacture, is a proper classification and a valid exercise of legislative power.

Transient merchants.

A statute conferring upon a city a power to license, tax, and regulate transient merchants cannot be regarded as discriminating in favor of residents. Mt. Pleasant v. Clutch, 6 Iowa, 546.

An ordinance for the licensing of transient merchants is not to be regarded as discriminating against nonresidents merely because there may not be any resident merchants who are compelled to pay the license. Ottumwa v. Zekind, 95 Iowa, 622, 29 L.R.A. 734, 58 Am. St. Rep. 447, 64 N. W. 646.

But an ordinance requiring transient merchants to obtain a license, and defining transient merchants as "every nonresident person who shall sell, exchange, or dispose of any goods, wares, or merchandise of his own, or of other nonresident owners," conflicts with the provision of the Iowa Constitution that laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation. Pacific Junction v. Dyer, 64 Iowa, 38, 19 N. W. 862.

An ordinance providing that persons who "temporarily reside in" a municipality must obtain a license before they can sell goods in a certain manner is invalid by reason of its discrimination against nonresidents. Carrollton v. Bazzette, 159 Ill. 284, 31 L.R.A. 522, 42 N. E. 837.

An ordinance imposing a license tax on transient persons other than citizens of the municipality, for selling goods, is unconstitutional and void. McGraw v. Marion, 98 Ky. 673, 47 L.R.A. 593, 34 S. W. 18.

A statute imposing a license tax upon "all traveling agents from other states offering any species of merchandise for sale or selling the same," but which exacts no license or tax upon the same class of persons who are citizens of the state, violates art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. McGuire v. Parker, 32 La. Ann. 832. In this case 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the court said: "When we consider the meaning of these terms, and reflect upon the important object sought to be accomplished by this constitutional provision, so essential not only to unrestricted trade and intercourse between the states, but even to the liberties and highest privileges of the citizens of a common country, we are bound to conclude that a requirement of a state law that discriminates so glaringly against citizens of other states, and in favor of the citizens of its own state, is designed to defeat the objects and purposes which this wise constitutional provision was intended to secure, and therefore violates the spirit of the clause invoked."

An ordinance regulating transient traders, which imposes a license fee upon nonresidents only, is invalid as being in restraint of trade. Saginaw v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 106 Mich. 32, 63 N. W. 985.

An ordinance providing for the licensing and regulation of itinerant merchants and transient vendors, which expressly excludes from its operation actual and bona fide residents of the city, contravenes the provision of art. 4, § 2, and of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, as well as a provision of the state Constitution that no member of the state shall be deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any of the citizens thereof. State ex rel. Greenwood v. Nolan, 108 Minn. 170, 122 N. W. 255.

Hawkers, peddlers, and itinerant vendors.

A statute providing that before any person, either as owner, manufacturer, or agent, shall travel through any county and peddle or sell certain enumerated articles, he shall procure a license, does not discriminate against nonresidents of the state or of any county. Crenshaw v. State, 95 Ark. 464, 130 S. W. 569.

A village ordinance defining who shall be deemed peddlers under its provisions, and requiring such persons to obtain a license, which by its terms applies to "every person," and which provides that it shall not be construed to apply to "the regular and ordinary trade of merchants or storekeepers occupying established and permanent places of business in said village, nor to the taking of orders and delivery of goods to corporation is unreasonably exercised in making invidious distinctions between citizens endowed with equal rights. It is incompetent for this board of commissioners, intrusted as it is with the rule in local municipal affairs, to erect walls of exclusion against citizens without its limits, or obstruct free commerce and trade between them and its own inhabitants." State, Muhlenbrinck, Prosecutor, v. Long Branch, supra. It seems to us that the ordinance in question is aimed at nonresidents, and there is room for the reasonable suspicion that it was designed principally for the benefit of residents, in erecting a barrier against the introduction of foreign trade for their protection. It is therefore open to the just criticism that it is discriminative, in restraint of trade, and not authorized by the terms of the Constitution, which were intended to secure equality in such matters. Saginaw v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 106 Mich. 32, 63 N. W. 985. "Municipalities are not in any sense close corporations. They are not vested with rights for local legislation, in order that they may arrogate to their own inhabitants additional rights and privileges to those enjoyed by other citizens of the state or nation. Neither may rights be denied to its citizens their customers by established dealers in the regular course of their business," does not discriminate against nonresidents. Case & M. Co. v. Forest Park, 152 Ill. App. 188.

A town ordinance making it unlawful for any traveling peddler to ply his vocation within the corporate limits without first procuring a license does not discriminate in favor of citizens of the town, and against those who do not reside in the town. Martin v. Rosedale, 130 Ind. 109, 29 N. E. 410.

A statute requiring peddlers to be licensed, and restricting the granting of such license to the county in which the applicant holds his residence, cannot be so applied as to discriminate against citizens of other states. Bliss's Petition, 63 N. H. 135.

A statute which, for the purpose of revenue, imposes taxes on occupations, including, inter alia, that of peddling, and punishing a failure to take out a license as a misdemeanor, is not rendered obnoxious to the provision of the Federal Constitution that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states," by the passage of another statute providing that it shall be lawful for all persons to peddle and sell without a license all things made or manufactured in the state, since it is within the power of the state to exempt from taxation manufactures within its borders. Seymour v. State, 51 Ala. 52.

A statute requiring a license to be obtained by peddlers of certain articles in any county, but providing that the act "shall not apply to any resident merchant in said county," is obnoxious to the provision of the 14th Amendment, prohibiting a state from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the full protection of the laws, and is also in conflict with art. 2, § 18, of the Constitution of the state of Arkansas, which provides that "the general assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities which by the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens." Ex parte Deeds, 75 Ark. 542, 87 S. W. 1030.

A statute providing for the licensing of itinerant venders, and defining an itinerant vender as any person, either as principal or agent, who engages in a temporary or trans-sient business in the state, either in one locality, or in traveling about the country, or from place to place, selling manufactured goods, wares, or merchandise, violates the provision of the Federal Constitution that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states, since the citizen of another state who has no permanent place of business is inhibited from selling his manufactured articles to consumers in Colorado, except on payment of a license fee, if he seeks and secures such customers in a manner which would make him an itinerant vender as defined by the act, while the citizen and resident of the state with a permanent place of business therein is exempted from its operation; and such statute cannot be justified as an exercise of the police power on the ground that its purpose is to prevent fraud, since the classification therein bears no reasonable or just relation to the object to which it is addressed, but is merely arbitrary. Smith v. Farr, 46 Colo. 364, 104 Pac. 401.

In Leonard v. Reed, 46 Colo. 307, 133 Am. St. Rep. 77, 104 Pac. 410, the same statute was again held invalid as being nothing more or less than an imposition of a tax upon nonresidents bringing merchandise into the state for the privilege of selling it, the court saying: "Plaintiff in error is required to pay the license fee exacted for the privilege of disposing of his merchandise at a storeroom, because he temporarily occupies it without the intention of engaging in permanent trade at that place. His temporary occupation results from the fact that he is a nonresident, bringing with him from a sister state articles of merchandise which he seeks to dispose of to those purchasing for their own use. A resident merchant permanently engaged in selling the same class of merchandise at a storeroom in Colorado Springs is exempted from the payment of such license. This imposes a burden upon the nonresident coming to the state for the purpose of engaging in commerce, by requiring him to pay for the privilege of selling articles of merchandise brought with or sent to him from the outside, from which the resident permanently engaged in business is exempted."

A power conferred upon a municipality and still allowed to be exercised by non-residents who may come within the corporate limits. Discrimination against residents is equally odious as discrimination in their favor." Horr & B. Mun. Police Ord. § 137.

We conclude, therefore, that the ordinance of Morehead City under which the defendant was charged criminally before the justice is invalid, in that "it spends its whole force on nonresidents, and spares residents entirely." The Superior Court properly directed that a verdict of not guilty be entered upon the findings of the jury. The defendant was entitled to his discharge.

by its charter, to tax itinerant traders, is not properly exercised by an ordinance imposing such a tax upon nonresidents only. Gould v. Atlanta, 55 Ga. 678. In this case the court said: "When power is given to municipal corporations to impose taxes, whatever else the grant may mean, it certainly means that the citizens are to be taxed. That is the plainest and most obvious construction in all cases. Other persons may be included, but citizens must be, unless expressly excepted. It is for them, and upon them chiefly, that local legislation is to act. Until there is an ordinance that binds the citizen, there can be none (other than a mere police regulation) that binds the stranger. When the stranger comes into the city he may be watched, but he cannot be taxed if citizens of his class are not taxed, unless there is some special grant of authority enabling the municipality to tax him as a nonresident."

A municipal ordinance imposing a license tax upon nonresident peddlers only is void, because it tends to create monopolies, and makes an unjust and unwarrantable discrimination between resident and nonresident citizens exercising the same calling in a business which before its enactment was free to all. Braceville v. Doherty, 30 Ill. App. 645.

A city ordinance requiring peddlers to procure licenses, but exempting from its operation bona fide residents who may sell articles manufactured in the city, is void. Lucas v. Macomb, 49 Ill. App. 60.

In Sears v. Warren County, 36 Ind. 267, 10 Am. Rep. 62, it was held that a statute requiring a license fee to be paid by traveling merchants and peddlers not residents of the state was not in conflict with the provision of the Federal Constitution that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, upon the ground that the tax is not on the persons or property of nonresidents, but on a particular business carried on in the state; and, further, that it did not conflict with the provision of the state Constitution that the general assembly shall not grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens, since such section can have no application to nonresidents of the state.

A municipal ordinance requiring every person who hawks or peddles any goods, wares, or merchandise not the growth or manufacture of the county in which the city enacting the ordinance is situated, and containing the proviso that nothing therein shall be construed to apply to any citizens of the city, is not a valid exercise of power, being repugnant to the provision of the Federal Constitution that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, and to the provision of the state Constitution that the general assembly shall not grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens. Grafty v. Rushville, 107 Ind. 502, 57 Am. Rep. 128, 8 N. E. 609.

A statute imposing a peddlers' license tax which expressly exempts from its operation the owner of goods peddling them in the county in which he is a resident taxpayer, or in any county immediately adjoining thereto, obviously discriminates in favor of the resident against the nonresident, and is repugnant to art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. Re Jarvis, 66 Kan. 329, 71 Pac. 576, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 391.

A statute requiring peddlers to obtain licenses, and providing that itinerant persons who are citizens of the state and who vend exclusively goods, wares, and merchandise which are the growth, product, or manufacture of the state, shall not be deemed peddlers, nor required to take out a license, violates art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. Rash v. Halloway, 82 Ky. 674.

An ordinance imposing a license tax on "peddlers or itinerant retailers of goods" applies to residents as well as nonresidents. West v. Mt. Sterling, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1670, 65 S. W. 120.

A statute requiring peddlers to obtain a license, but providing that "any resident of a town having a place of business therein, owning and paying taxes to the amount of $25 on his stock in trade, can peddle said goods in his own town without paying any license fee whatever," conflicts with the provision of the 14th Amendment, that "no state shall deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," and denies the equal right to acquire property and pursue happiness guaranteed by the state Constitution, since the differentiation of persons who are, from those who are not, to pay license fees, is not a discrimination based upon the inherent differences in the nature of the business carried on, or the kind of property owned or dealt in. State v. Mitchell, 97 Me. 66, 94 Am. St. Rep. 481, 53 Atl. 887.

A discrimination in the granting of peddlers' licenses, but which no fee is required of a person in the city or town in which he pays taxes upon his stock in trade, and is qualified to vote, is obnoxious to the 14th Amendment. Com. v. Hans, 195 Mass. 262, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 799, 122 Am. St. Rep. 251, 81 N. E. 149, 11 Ann. Cas. 514.

An ordinance imposing a license tax upon hawkers and peddlers which practically exempts residents from its provisions, while imposing an unjust and unreasonable license fee upon nonresidents, is invalid. Brooks v. Mangan, 86 Mich. 576, 24 Am. St. Rep. 137, 49 N. W. 633.

An ordinance making it unlawful to sell or offer for sale, as a hawker, peddler, traveling merchant, or agent, either by sample or otherwise, any garden, farm, or dairy products, or any other goods, wares, or merchandise, without first obtaining a license, but containing a proviso that it should not apply to those persons holding mercantile licenses within the borough, who should comply with the market ordinance, nor to persons selling or offering for sale the products of their own farm or garden, and hawkers who first attend the borough market and comply with the provisions of the market ordinance, is invalid as a trade regulation. Shamokin v. Flannigan, 156 Pa. 43, 26 Atl. 780.

A borough ordinance which discriminates against nonresidents by prohibiting all persons from peddling or selling goods from house to house without a license, which is fixed at so high a figure that it amounts to a prohibition, but which excepts residents of the borough from its provisions, is void, being beyond the powers of the corporation; and it cannot be sustained as a police regulation, because not directed against the business or practice sought to be regulated, but against some of the persons engaged in it. Sayre v. Phillips, 148 Pa. 482, 16 L.R.A. 49, 33 Am. St. Rep. 842, 24 Atl. 76.

A statute imposing a license fee upon peddlers in a certain county, but providing that it shall not apply to merchants residing and having a regular place of business therein, nor to the sale by citizens of the said county or products of their own growth and manufacture, is not a police regulation, intended to protect the people against fraud from traveling vendors of merchandise, but is intended to protect the merchants and residents of the county against competition from those who live in any other part of the world, and is therefore a denial to citizens residing outside of the county of equal rights in business with those who live in the county, on the sole ground of their residence, and therefore violative of art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. Com. v. Snyder, 182 Pa. 630, 38 Atl. 356.

An ordinance prohibiting peddling without a license, with a proviso that it shall not apply to persons holding mercantile licenses within the borough, is not a police, but a trade, regulation, and therefore invalid. West Pittston v. Dymond, 8 Kulp. 12.

An exemption of manufacturers who have paid taxes on capital employed, from the provisions of a statute imposing a license tax upon peddlers, in its application to a citizen of another state, deprives him of privileges and immunities possessed by citizens of the enacting state. Com. v. Myer, 92 Va. 809, 31 L.R.A. 379, 23 S. E. 915.

A statute which provides that no person shall be licensed as a peddler who has not resided in the state one year next preceding the application for a license, and that no person shall be deemed a peddler by reason of selling articles which are the manufacture of the state, with certain specified exceptions, unconstitutionally discriminates against citizens of other states. Re Watson, 15 Fed. 511.

Hucksters.

A statute making it unlawful for any person to engage in huckstering without obtaining a license, but containing the provision that nothing contained therein should prevent any citizen of the commonwealth from vending, hawking, or peddling products of his farm or garden, contravenes art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. Com. v. Simons, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. 550.

Canvassers and sample sellers.

In Dozier v. State, 154 Ala. 83, 129 Am. St. Rep. 51, 46 So. 9, reversed in 218 U. S. 124, 54 L. ed. 965, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 264, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649, on the ground that the statute in question was an interference with interstate commerce, it was held that a statute imposing a license tax upon any person soliciting orders for the enlargement of photographs or for picture frames, but providing that the act shall not apply to merchants or dealers having a permanent place of business in the state, and keeping picture frames as a part or all of their stock in trade, did not unconstitutionally discriminate in favor of merchants having a permanent place of business, as against merchants residing without the state, since the condition or exception applies alike to any merchant, whether residing in the state or out of it, provided he has a permanent place of business in the state.

A statute imposing a license tax for purposes of revenue upon every person not a resident merchant, mechanic, or manufacturer, engaging in the business of selling by sample, does not discriminate in favor of the citizens of the state, since the word "residents," as used in connection with the words "merchant, mechanic, or manufacturer," is not intended to import a personal residence, but only the place of business. Speer v. Com. 23 Gratt. 935, 14 Am. Rep. 164.

A statute discriminating between a merchant and a sample merchant, by taxing the business of the one lightly while taxing that of the other heavily, cannot be held unconstitutional on the assumption that merchants must necessarily be residents, and that sample merchants must necessarily be nonresidents. Ex parte Thornton, 4 Hughes, 220, 12 Fed. 538.

An ordinance requiring a license to be obtained by any person whose principal place of business is not in the city, or who conducts his principal place of business without the city, and sells or offers to sell any goods, wares, or merchandise by sample or representation to any person other than persons living or doing a licensed business in the city, violates art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution; and the fact that its provisions apply to residents of the state as well as to nonresidents does not add to the validity of the act, or give strength to the argument in support of it. Fecheimer Bros. v. Louisville, 84 Ky. 306, 2 S. W. 65.

A state statute which prohibits the sale within a certain district of the state of articles other than agricultural products and articles manufactured in the state, by persons not residents in the state, without first obtaining a license and paying therefor, is repugnant to art. 4, § 2, of the Constitution. Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. ed. 449, reversing 31 Md. 279, 1 Am. Rep. 50.

A village ordinance imposing a license fee upon nonresident auctioneers and sample sellers is discriminatory, and therefore illegal from a constitutional standpoint. Radebaugh v. Plain City, 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 612.

An ordinance requiring a nonresident to obtain a license before engaging in the business of canvassing is void for want of authority to make it. Wilcox v. Knoxville, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 641.

An ordinance requiring a license to be obtained for the sale of goods by sample, but which provides that it shall not be so construed as to impose any additional tax or disability upon merchants of the city, discriminates between residents and nonresidents, and assumes to lay down a special rate of taxation for the former class, and is therefore invalid as contravening provisions of the state Constitution that the legislature shall have no power to suspend any law of the land for the benefit of any particular individual, nor to pass any law for the benefit of individuals inconsistent with the general laws of the land. Nashville v. Althrop, 5 Coldw. 554.

In Robbins v. Taxing Dist. 13 Lea, 303, reversed in 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, on the ground that the statute in question unlawfully interfered with interstate commerce, it was held that a statute providing that all drummers and all persons not having a regular licensed house of business in the taxing district, offering for sale or selling goods, wares, or merchandise therein by sample, shall be required to pay a specified tax, was not rendered a partial law by the exemption of resident merchants selling their own goods by sample within the district, from the special privilege tax.

A statute imposing a heavy license tax upon the right to canvass from house to house for a certain limited number of articles not produced or manufactured within the state, and not injurious to health or morals, for the apparent purpose of favoring resident merchants with established places of business, violates the provisions of the Federal Constitution against abridging privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States, and denying equal protection of the laws. State v. Bayer, 34 Utah, 257, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 297, 97 Pac. 129.

An ordinance enacting that no person being a nonresident shall sell by sample or otherwise any goods, wares, or merchandise without first obtaining a license is unconstitutional as an attempted discrimination adverse to nonresidents of the state. Clements v. Casper, 4 Wyo. 494, 35 Pac. 472.

Agents for nursery stock.

A statute requiring every person acting as an agent for the sale of nursery stock not grown in the state, to obtain a license, with the proviso that any citizen of the state may sell nursery stock grown one year or more in lands or nurseries owned by him in the state, on which taxes have been paid, without procuring a license, but which does not give the citizens of other states the right to sell without a license stock so grown, violates art. 4, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States. State v. Lancaster, 63 N. H. 267.

A statute providing that permits shall be obtained for the sale of nursery stock, which requires only agents selling trees grown in other states to carry duplicates of the principal's permit, for which duplicate an additional charge is made, illegally discriminates between resident and nonresident dealers. Ex parte Hawley, 22 S. D. 23, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 138, 115 N. W. 93.

A statute requiring every person selling fruit trees or other nursery stock grown outside the state to file an affidavit with the secretary of state, together with a bond conditioned to save harmless any citizen of the state who shall be defrauded by any false or fraudulent representations as to the place where such stock was grown, or as to its hardiness for climate, violates art. 4, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States. Re Schechter, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 849, 63 Fed. 695.

Miscellaneous.

The provision of a municipal charter authorizing a tax upon sales by auctioneers, "except property sold by citizens of the town or county, and who are bona fide owners thereof," and an ordinance adopted in pursuance of such provision, fixing the license fee of auctioneers and salesmen at $5 for residents of the county, and $10 for such as are not residents of the county, discriminate against goods and merchandise brought into the state for sale by nonresident owners, and therefore conflict with art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. Daniel v. Richmond, 78 Ky. 542.

But a statute requiring the payment of a license fee for the privilege of purchasing certain kinds of produce in a certain county, to be shipped out of it, which fee is greater in the case of nonresidents of the county than of residents, is not obnoxious to United States Constitution, art. 4, § 2, since the discrimination is not against citizens of other states more than citizens of the enacting state, nor against foreign markets more than domestic markets. Rothermel v. Meyerle, 136 Pa. 250, 9 L.R.A. 366, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 315, 20 Atl. 583.

An ordinance levying a license tax on "every agency of a brewery of another state doing business in the city" is plainly offensive to that provision of the Constitution of the United States by which the citizens of each state are declared entitled to all the immunities and privileges of the citizens of the several states. Cullman v. Arndt, 125 Ala. 581, 28 So. 70.

An ordinance requiring a license fee from all depots and agencies established in the city, of all breweries and distilleries and all wholesale dealers in malt liquors, which excepts from its operation any resident engaged in the wholesale business of bottling, or bottling and vending, beer, is void as making an unjust discrimination in favor of residents as against nonresidents. Indianapolis v. Bieler, 138 Ind. 30, 36 N. E. 857.

An ordinance which, as a police regulation, requires butchers to obtain a license, and which discriminates between residents and nonresidents in respect to the amount of fee, is void. Conshohocken v. Fennel, 3 Del. Co. Rep. 354.

An ordinance requiring drivers of business vehicles to be licensed, which provides that residents may obtain a license by paying $1. and that nonresidents, or persons who have not resided in the city three months, must obtain a permit, is void for discrimination. Jersey City v. Chasan, 81 N. J. L. 315, 79 Atl. 1058.

A statute which fixes prices of licenses to sell and put up lightning rods at $100 to citizens of the state, and $500 to citizens of other states, conflicts with art. 4, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. State v. Wiggin, 64 N. H. 508, 1 L.R.A. 56, 15 Atl. 128.

An ordinance imposing a tax on each vehicle employed in carrying, transporting, or peddling merchandise or provisions, which excepts from its operation vehicles used by persons engaged in business within the territorial limits, who have a permit to carry on the same, is void for discrimination. Thompson v. Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Asso. 55 N. J. L. 507, 26 Atl. 798.

But an ordinance requiring payment of a license fee for tugs and barges, which provides that a reduction of 40 per cent shall be allowed for those owned by residents of the city and returned and assessed for taxation therein, is not in conflict with any constitutional provision. St. Louis v. Consolidated Coal Co. 113 Mo. 83, 20 S. W. 699.

The fact that a larger tax is levied upon transient and traveling photographers than upon those resident in the city will not invalidate an ordinance. Caldwell v. Prunelle, 57 Kan. 511, 46 Pac. 949.

In Charleston v. State, 2 Speers, L. 719, it was held that a municipality could not 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

impose a larger tax on the slave of a non-resident employed within the city, than that on slaves of residents.

A statute requiring nonresidents keeping live stock for grazing purposes in any county of the state, to pay a certain sum per head, which shall be in lieu of all taxes, contravenes the provision of the Colorado state Constitution that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws which shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation. Kiowa County v. Dunn, 21 Colo. 185, 40 Pac. 357.

A law imposing a tax on each sheep whose owner, residing outside of the state, shall bring sheep into the state for the purpose of pasture, or of driving such sheep through the state, is held in Reser v. Umatilla County, 48 Or. 326, 120 Am. St. Rep. 815, 86 Pac. 595, not to impose a license tax in the exercise of the police power, since its payment does not confer some right or privilege upon the owners which otherwise would not exist, but to be a revenue measure, and therefore violative of a constitutional provision requiring taxes to be uniform and assessed according to value.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

BEATRICE DE VALL, Resp't,
v.

THOMAS DE VALL, Appt.

(60 Or. 493, 118 Pac. 843.)

New trial — power to grant — grounds not specified in motion.

1. A court of general jurisdiction may set aside a judgment and grant a new trial for reasons not stated in the motion, although the statute provides that new trials may be granted on motion of the party aggrieved for specified causes materially affecting the substantial rights of such party.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Same — power of court — effect of statute.

2. The power of the court to grant a new trial to correct errors which it discovers is not destroyed by a statute regulating the making of motions for new trial by parties aggrieved by rulings made.

(November 14, 1911.)

Note. — Right of court to grant new trial on its own motion, or on grounds other than those urged by the moving party.

As to power of trial court to cure an excessive verdict by requiring or permitting a reduction where the true measure of damages is not ascertainable by mere computa-

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Wallowa County vacating a judgment and granting a new trial in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due on a foreign judgment. Affirmed.

Statement by Eakin, Ch. J.:

This is an action by Beatrice De Vall against Thomas De Vall to recover judgment for the sum of $1,008, with interest and costs, upon a decree of the circuit court of the state of Wisconsin. This is the second appeal. For a full statement of the issues, see the same case in 57 Or. 128, 109 Pac. 755, 110 Pac. 705.

Upon the second trial, had on November 19, 1910, before a jury, verdict was ren-tion, see note to Tunnel Min. & Leasing Co. v. Cooper, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062.

At common law—civil cases.

(2) Because the court erred in admitting evidence against the objection of plaintiff. (3) Because the court erred in refusing to receive evidence offered by plaintiff upon the trial. (4) Because the verdict was contrary to law. (5) Because the verdict was contrary to the evidence. Gabor*, 209 Pa. 201, 58 Atl. 278, citing Graham v. Graham, 1 Serg. & R. 330, as authority for the general proposition (verdict received and jury discharged in the absence of accused); Anderson v. Fox, 2 Hen. & M. 245 (excessive damages); Eggen v. Fox, 124 Wis. 534, 102 N. W. 1054; Mills v. Scott, 99 U. S. 25, 25 L. ed. 294 (which held that where an error in the amount recovered is apparent upon the record, and it could not have been remedied by an amendment of the pleadings, the Federal Supreme Court will, of its own motion, direct that it be corrected, and, if necessary, order a new trial or further proceedings for that purpose).

In Weber v. Kirkendall, 44 Neb. 766, 63 N. W. 35, it is said that the power of the courts of general jurisdiction, in the correction of errors committed by them, "is exercised not alone on account of their solicitude for the rights of litigants, but also in justice to themselves as instruments provided for the impartial administration of the law."

The power of the trial court to grant a new trial on its own motion is not limited to cases where the error is that of the court, or where there is misconduct of the jury. Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 110 Mich. 173, 68 N. W. 115, criticizing Lloyd v. Brinck, 35 Tex. 1.

So it has been held that a justice of the peace has power to grant a new trial on term of the court, upon consideration of such motion, the court made the following order: "This cause coming on to be heard this day, on the motion of plaintiff, asking that a judgment heretofore rendered herein be set aside and a new trial granted, plaintiff appearing by her attorney, Thos. M. Dill, and defendant appearing by his attorney, A. S. Cooley, and the court having carefully considered and weighed all the evidence introduced on the trial of this case, and having considered the entire record herein, including the instructions given to the jurors, and it appearing that, among the instructions given by the court to the jury, was the following, 'Upon the other hand, if the defendant has satisfied you by a preponderance of the evidence that said M. C. Porter was not served with said notice on said 24th day of April, 1907, or that renewal of said notice at the October term of said court was not given to the said Porter, then you should find for the defendant,' and the court believing that said instruction was erroneous under the evidence introduced on the trial of this case, and that said instruction was prejudicial to plaintiff, therefore, because of the giving of said erroneous instruction as above quoted, and for no other reason or reasons, it is ordered and adjudged that the judgment heretofore rendered in this case be and the same is hereby set aside, and a new trial is hereby granted." From this order, defendant appealed, under § 548, L. O. L.

his own motion, where he believes his previous findings erroneous. State ex rel. Henderson v. McCrea, 40 La. Ann. 20, 3 So. 380.

The trial court should set aside a verdict awarding excessive damages, on its own motion, in a case where the court might have assessed the damages without the intervention of the jury, and failure to make application in the lower court to have the assessment of damages set aside will not preclude the appellate court from exercising its supervising power over it. Dicken v. Smith, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 209.

It has been held that the right of the court to grant a new trial on its own motion can be exercised, ordinarily only within the time allowed the parties to make a motion therefor. Culverhouse v. Marx, 38 La. Ann. 667; State ex rel. Shreveport Cotton Oil Co. v. Blackman, 110 La. 266, 34 So. 438.

In Cartwright v. New Orleans R. & Light Co. — La. —, 59 So. 124, it was held that the trial judge may ex officio grant a new trial at any time before judgment is signed.

In other cases it has been held that the common-law power of the court to set aside a verdict or judgment on its own motion must be exercised during the term in which it is rendered. Ewart v. Peniston, 233 Mo. 695, 136 S. W. 422; Jones v. Marble Head Lime Co. 128 Mo. App. 345, 107 S. W. 420; Head v. Randolph, 83 Mo. App. 284; Baughman v. National Waterworks Co. 58 Mo. App. 576; Gallejos v. Sandoval, 15 N. M. 216, 106 Pac. 373.

In State ex rel. Brainard v. Adams, 12 Mo. App. 436, it was said that the statutory rule which directs that "all motions for new trials and in arrest of judgment shall be made within four days after trial" must be construed as regulating the privilege of the party who may move, and not as granting a defined power to the court, or as abridging its powers already existing.

And in Rex v. Atkinson, 5 T. R. 437, note a, where the four days' limitation within which a motion for a new trial must be made had expired, Lord Mansfield said that "no motion could be made for a new trial, but if it came out incidentally by the report that it was proper, the court might grant one; . . . [that] if the court conceive a doubt that justice is not done, it is never too late to grant a new trial, but not on the application of the party." To the same effect is the statement of Grose, J., in Rex v. Holt, 5 T. R. 446.

The appellate court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial court in granting a new trial on its own motion, except in a case of clear abuse of its exercise. Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 110 Mich. 173, 68 N. W. 115; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Goodrich, 74 Mo. App. 355; Hesse v. Seyp, 88 Mo. App. 66; Schuetz v. St. Louis Transit Co. 108 Mo. App. 21, 82 S. W. 541; Eggen v. Fox, 124 Wis. 534, 102 N. W. 1054; Parker v. Britton, 133 Mo. App. 270, 113 S. W. 259 (which held grant of new trial because of neglect of counsel to present evidence, an abuse of the court's discretion).

And where the specific grounds upon which the order for a new trial was made do not appear, the appellate court will presume that the court acted within its discretionary power. Eggen v. Fox, 124 Wis. 534, 102 N. W. 1054.

In Bank of Willmar v. Lawler, 78 Minn. 135, 80 N. W. 868, it was said that as a general rule the trial court should not exercise this power except in aggravated cases.

On the other hand, it was held in Lloyd v. Brinck, 35 Tex. 1, that where the verdict of the jury is in proper form and responsive to the issues presented by the pleadings, the trial court has no discretionary power to set the verdict aside on its own motion, notwithstanding it may have been against the weight of the evidence, in disregard of the instruction of the court. The courts expressly refused to follow this case in Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 110 Mich. 173, 68 N. W. 115; State ex rel. Brainard v. Adams, 12 Mo. App. 436.

It was pointed out by the court, however, in Lloyd v. Brinck, supra, that where the jury find a verdict upon issues not presented, or where they find their verdict

Mr. A. S. Cooley, for appellant:

A new trial is statutory, and can be granted only when authorized by statute, and in the manner, on the conditions, and for the reasons therein stated.

Amacher v. Johnson, 174 Ind. 249, 91 N. E. 929; Ogle v. Potter, 24 Mont. 521, 62 Pac. 921; State ex rel. Stromberg-Mullins Co. v. Second Judicial Dist. Ct. 28 Mont. 123, 72 Pac. 413; Freeman v. Weare, 42 Mont. 472, 113 Pac. 466; Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 455; Publishing House v. Heyl, 61 Kan. 634, 60 Pac. 317; State ex rel. Richeson v. Richeson, 36 Ind. App. 373, 75 N. E. 847; Scott v. Ford, 52 Or. 298, 97 Pac. 99.

The court has no authority to set aside upon a portion only of the material issues presented, or where the verdict itself is fatally defective or not supported by any evidence, the court would be justified in treating it as a nullity.

—criminal cases.

The right of the court to grant a new trial on its own motion is recognized in criminal cases as well as in civil cases. The English precedents above cited were made in criminal cases, and the only essential difference in the exercise of this power in civil and in criminal cases is that in the latter the court may not put an additional burden on the accused. Com. v. Gabor, 200 Pa. 201, 58 Atl. 278.

On the trial of an indictment for murder, an order setting aside a verdict of guilty of manslaughter, and granting a new trial because the verdict was received and the jury discharged in the absence of the accused, does not violate the constitutional provision that no person shall for the same offense be twice put in jeopardy. Ibid. The court pointed out that the accused could not on a second trial be found guilty on the indictment of any higher grade than manslaughter; that he had therefore everything to gain, and nothing to lose, by another trial. Ibid.

In Rex v. Holt, 5 T. R. 438, Lord Kenyon said: "I well remember the case of Rex v. Gough, where the objection to the verdict was taken by the court themselves, who thought that substantial justice had not been done. And there are not wanting other instances of the same kind, where the court in criminal cases have shown themselves anxious to be satisfied whether or not the defendant had been properly convicted, without any motion of the party for that purpose. This was done by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Morris, 2 Burr. 1189, and the same has often occurred in other cases." And in the same case Grose, J., said that "wherever the court have seen of themselves or on the suggestion of counsel that the defendant has been improperly convicted, they always have interposed the judgment and grant a new trial on a ground not specified in the motion.

Peirson v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 191 Mass. 223, 77 N. E. 769; Earles v. Gilham, 20 Nev. 46, 14 Pac. 587; Slater v. Union P. R. Co. 8 Utah, 178, 30 Pac. 493; Sterling v. Parsons, 9 Utah, 81, 33 Pac. 245; Spencer v. Long, 39 Cal. 700; Budd v. Draais, 50 Cal. 120; McWilliams v. Herschman, 5 Nev. 263; Paragoonah Field & Canal Co. v. Edwards, 9 Utah, 477, 35 Pac. 487; Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 61; Moore v. Murdock, 26 Cal. 524.

The motion in this case does not specify any ground for a new trial, and should have been disregarded by the court.

Gilbersen v. Miller Min. & Smelting Co. 4 Utah, 46, 5 Pac. 700; Felt v. East Chi-

. . . to prevent judgment being passed on an innocent man."

But in State v. Snyder, 98 Mo. 555, 12 S. W. 369, it was held that the trial court could not set aside a verdict of conviction without the consent of the accused, and that a plea of former jeopardy must be sustained upon a second trial which was awarded on the court's own motion.

Likewise, in State v. Williams, 38 Ia. Ann. 960, the power of the court on its own motion to grant a new trial in a criminal case was denied.

The reasons assigned by the court for granting the new trial in the above case were that the evidence in its opinion did not justify the verdict; that it was unlawful to sentence accused for a felony when he was not guilty; and that, as it did not appoint counsel, it was its duty to see that accused was not led into error. The appellate court, in reversing the order awarding a new trial, said that it was the duty of the trial court to appoint counsel for accused; that, having permitted the accused to go to trial without being represented by counsel, it was clearly the duty of the trial court to have appointed counsel to care for the interests of the accused after the rendition of a verdict which he thought unjust, but, conceding the correctness of the motives of the trial judge and the unworthiness of the verdict, the court ventured beyond the bounds of duty, as the trial court is in no sense the custodian for the accused, and it was not its duty to see that accused was not led into error. It was suggested, but not decided, that a plea of former jeopardy might be available on a second trial. Ibid.

As affected by statute.

Statutes regulating the granting of new trials have generally been construed strictly, and not as a limitation upon the power of the court to grant a new trial on its own motion, but as a regulation of the privilege of the parties who may make the motion. Ewart v. Peniston, 233 Mo. 695, 136 S. W. 422, explaining State ex rel. Brain- cago Iron & Steel Co. 27 Ind. App. 494, 61 N. E. 744; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Daegling, 30 Ind. App. 180, 65 N. E. 761; Watson v. Molden, 10 Idaho, 570, 79 Pac. 507; West Chicago Street R. Co. v. W. 111 (where the Code provided that a verdict may be vacated on the application of the party aggrieved); Bank of Willmar v. Lawler, 78 Minn. 135, 80 N. W. 868.

In State ex rel. Brainard v. Adams, 12 Mo. App. 436, it was said that the statutory provisions which prescribe the terms on which new trials may be granted "on motion of the proper party," or "upon good cause shown," must be construed as regulating the privilege of the party who may move, and not as granting a defined power to the court, or as abridging its powers already existing.

The provision of a statute that "only one new trial shall be allowed to either party, except where the triers of the fact shall have erred in a matter of law, and where the jury shall be guilty of misbehavior," does not preclude the court from exercising its common-law powers to set aside a verdict and judgment on its own motion. Ewart v. Peniston, 233 Mo. 695, 136 S. W. 422.

Under the statutory provisions that "in civil causes in which any questions or issues are submitted to a jury, a verdict shall not be set aside, except upon motion in writing of one of the parties specifying the grounds relied upon in support of it," the court may of its own motion set aside a verdict which it has directed the jury to find. Forbes v. New York L. Ins. Co. 178 Mass. 139, 59 N. E. 636.

A statutory provision that the trial judge may, in his discretion, entertain a motion to set aside the verdict upon the minutes, does not preclude him from doing so on his own motion. Schmidt v. Brown, 80 Hun, 183, 30 N. Y. Supp. 68.

On the other hand, it has been held that where the statute specified the manner in which a verdict or other decision may be set aside and a new trial granted, the court is without power to grant a new trial on its own motion. Long v. Kingfisher County, 5 Okla. 128, 47 Pac. 1063; Scott v. Ford, 52 Or. 289, 97 Pac. 99. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where the court makes an order setting aside the judgment and granting a new trial on a ground not discretionary, and commits an error as to some legal proposition, the order will be reversed on appeal.

Clifford v. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. 12 Colo. 125, 20 Pac. 335; Manson v. Ware, 63 Iowa, 345, 19 N. W. 276.

The granting of a new trial because of errors of law is not within the discretion of the court.

United States v. Trabing, 3 Wyo. 144, 6 Pac. 722; Scott v. Ford, 52 Or. 289, 97 Pac. 99.

When the court does not grant a new trial for any of the reasons specified in the motion, it in effect denies the motion.

Vastine v. Rex, 93 Mo. App. 93; Clyde

In Townley v. Adams, 118 Cal. 382, 50 Pac. 550, it was held that the Code provision expressly authorizing the court to vacate a verdict on its own motion in certain cases must be construed as a limitation upon the power of the court to grant a new trial, in view of the fact that the Code undertakes to cover the whole subject of new trials, and the provision that "the rule of the common law that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed has no application to this Code. The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects."

And in Flugel v. Henschel, 6 N. D. 205, 69 N. W. 195, which held the Code provision granting the court power to vacate the verdict and award a new trial in certain cases was a limitation upon the power of the court, it was said: "The abridgment of the common-law right of a trial court to vacate a verdict on its own motion became highly proper, and indeed necessary, after the legislative branch of the government had made ample provision to facilitate the setting aside of illegal and unjust verdicts by means of a motion made for that purpose by a party to the action whose rights have been prejudiced by any such verdict."

Under an express statutory provision authorizing the court on its own motion, without the application of either of the parties, to vacate the verdict and grant a new trial, "when there has been such a plain disregard by the jury of the instructions of the court or the evidence in the case, as to satisfy the court that the verdict was rendered under a misapprehension of such instructions, or under the influence of passion or prejudice," it was said in Eades v. Trowbridge, 143 Cal. 25, 76 Pac. 714, that "the instruction disregarded must be as to some matter or of such a nature that it is plain that the jury grossly disobeyed the judge," and it was further said by the court that "the same reasoning applies to the evidence. A plain disregard of the evidence must be made to appear. This does not mean that the court thinks the verdict not the correct conclusion from the evidence, but it means that the rule should apply only where the jury plainly, palpably, and grossly disregard the evidence." To the same effect are Townley v. Adams, 118 Cal. 382, 50 Pac. 550, and Mizener v. Bradbury, 128 Cal. 340, 60 Pac. 928 (which also reversed the trial court's order setting aside the verdict); Occidental Real Estate Co. v. Gantner & Mattern, 7 Cal. App. 727, 95 Pac. 1042 (which sustained the order setting aside the verdict); Gould v. Duluth & D. Elevator Co. 2 N. D. 216, 50 N. W. 969; Flugel v. Henschel, 6 N. D. 205, 69 N. W. 195 (where it was said that the power to vacate should be exercised with great caution, and only in extreme cases); Clement v. Barnes, 6 S. D. 483, 61 N. W. 1126 (which held that the verdict must be so perceptibly in disregard of the instructions or the evidence as to satisfy the court upon its announcement, and without the necessity of mature reflection, that the same is grossly erroneous or the result of passion or prejudice).

Mill. & Elevator Co. v. Buoy, 71 Kan. 293, 80 Pac. 591.

Messrs. John P. Rusk and Thomas M. Dill, for respondent:

In passing upon a motion for a new trial, the trial court should weigh the entire case, and if in its opinion the verdict is against the clear weight of the testimony, it should grant a new trial.

In Flugel v. Henschel, 6 N. D. 205, 69 N. W. 195, it was said: "To justify the action by the court on its own motion, the case must be gross and one obviously requiring immediate action."

In Gould v. Duluth & D. Elevator Co. 2 N. D. 216, 50 N. W. 969, it was said: "Instances of vacating verdicts and granting new trials without application of the parties have been exceedingly rare, and no such summary action should be taken except in cases falling clearly within the statute, and then the order should be made promptly on coming in of the verdict. In no case should such an order be made after a delay of some months, and where the parties have taken action predicated upon the verdict."

And in Clement v. Barnes, 6 S. D. 483, 61 N. W. 1126, it is said that "the order should be made promptly upon the coming in and entry of the verdict."

Accordingly, in Kaslow v. Chamberlain, 17 N. D. 449, 117 N. W. 529, it was held that the court had no power to order a new trial of its own motion one year after verdict and entry of judgment.

And in Traxinger v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 23 S. D. 90, 120 N. W. 770, it was said that "it is clear that the trial court had no authority to vacate the verdict under § 304, after the lapse of nine months."

For grounds not specified in the motion.

exercising its common-law power to grant a new trial on its motion, by the presentation of a motion therefor by one of the parties; but the court may grant a new trial for a reason not specified in the motion. Bond v. Cutler, 7 Mass. 205; Ellis v. Ginsburg, 163 Mass. 143, 39 N. E. 800 (but see infra, as to effect of statute); E. O. Stanard Mill. Co. v. White Line Central Transit Co. 122 Mo. 258, 26 S. E. 509 (obiter).

And while it has been held that a party cannot be heard to object or complain of the rulings of the court made during the trial for the first time on a motion for a new trial, nevertheless the court may of its own motion, when errors have been brought to its attention in that way, award a new trial where it believes that injustice has been done. Schuette v. St. Louis Transit Co. 108 Mo. App. 21, 82 S. W. 541 (improper argument of counsel); Richter v. United R. Co. 145 Mo. App. 1, 129 S. W. 1055 (improper remark by the court in presence of jury).

And, although the dissatisfied party is precluded from urging the insufficiency of the charge to the jury as a ground for a new trial, because of his failure to reserve an exception thereto, the court may of its own motion grant a new trial for that reason. Merchants' & F. Bank v. McKellar, 44 La. Ann. 940, 11 So. 592.

But the trial court has no power to grant a new trial upon a ground not specified in the motion, where the statute provides that "a verdict shall not be set aside except upon a motion in writing by a party to the cause, stating the reasons relied upon in its support." Peirson v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 191 Mass. 223, 77 N. E. 769. To the same effect is Loveland v. Rand, 200 Mass. 142, 85 N. E. 948.

And on a motion for a nonsuit, the court has, upon its own motion, sometimes granted a new trial upon the payment of costs. Doe ex dem. Burnham v. Simmons, 7 U. C. Q. B. 196; Hatton v. Beacon Ins. Co. 16 U. C. Q. B. 316; Pearman v. Hyland, 22 U. C. Q. B. 202; Cameron v. Monarch Assur. Co. 7 U. C. C. P. 212; Coons v. Aetna Ins. Co. 18 U. C. C. P. 305. A. L. R.

Eakin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It thus appears that, although there was a motion to set aside the verdict, the court in its discretion set aside such motion on the ground of error not assigned in it, and the contention of defendant is that the court had no authority to set aside a verdict upon its own motion, nor upon a ground not assigned in the motion. There is no bill of exception here, and the defendant does not contend that the instruction mentioned in the order was not erroneous. Therefore the only question to be considered is as to the power of the court to set aside a judgment and grant a new trial, either on its own motion, or upon a ground of error not assigned in the motion. Although there seems to be some conflict of opinion upon this question, the great weight of authority sustains the view that courts of general jurisdiction have inherent power to correct judicial errors for the purpose of promoting impartial administration of justice, and the right of a court to grant a new trial on its own motion is generally recognized. The Oklahoma supreme court, in Long v. Kingfisher County, 5 Okla. 128, 47 Pac. 1063, has held directly to the contrary, citing no authority other than its own statute, the language of which is not materially different from that of other states relating to the granting of new trials. Section 4493, Code of 1903, relating to motions for new trial, provides that "the former verdict . . . shall be vacated and a new trial granted on the application of the party aggrieved, for any of the following causes, affecting materially the substantial rights of such party," and then names five causes which may be included in such motion, being identical with those in other states.

The supreme court of Texas has held to the same effect in Lloyd v. Brinck, 35 Tex. 1. The North Dakota statute expressly authorizes the court on its own motion to vacate a verdict for certain causes, which has the effect to preclude the consideration of any others. The statutes of California and South Dakota have similar provisions, and therefore have no application upon this question. On the contrary, the Code of Iowa of 1897, § 3755, provides that "the former verdict . . . shall be vacated and a new trial granted on the application of the party aggrieved," etc., being the exact language of the Oklahoma statute.

W. 113, in considering the power of the court to grant a new trial on its own motion, it is said that this statute "does not provide that the court may not, upon its own motion, and for error which is apparent, set aside a verdict. Such power exists at common law, and we do not understand that any provision of our statute is a limitation to the power of the court on its own motion to compel juries to observe and follow the law as embodied in the instructions given by the court." And in a late case (Hensley v. Davidson Bros. Co. 135 Iowa, 106, 112 N. W. 227) it is said that: "There is no provision in the Code relating to orders of this kind on the court's own motion. That such right exists, however, is indisputable. It is one of the inherent powers of the court, essential to the administration of justice." And, after citing many cases to that effect, and quoting from some, the court say: "That a motion therefor is pending will not deprive the court of the power to order a new trial on grounds not raised therein. This must necessarily be so, for one of the controlling reasons for the existence of the power is to enable the court to guard the rights of parties who, for some cause, have proven unable to protect themselves, and another to enable the court to correct its errors, rather than wait for this to be done by the appellate court." To this case there is appended a note in 14 Ann. Cas. 65, reviewing the authorities, in which the author says that this power is generally recognized; that the provisions of the statute regulating motions for new trial do not prevent the court from granting a new trial on its own motion. The Minnesota Code of 1905, § 4198, is very similar to that of Iowa and Oklahoma, and in Bank of Willmar v. Lawler, 78 Minn. 136, 80 N. W. 868, it is said: "Appellant contends that, as our statute provides that the notice of motion for a new trial shall be in writing, and shall state the grounds of the motion, the court below had no authority to grant a new trial on its own motion. Under the common-law practice, it was well settled that the trial court could grant a new trial on its own motion. . . . Our Code of Civil Procedure does not expressly cut off this power of the court, and, in our opinion, does not do so by implication, although the Code may to some extent limit or modify that power. . . . The provisions of such a statute, regulating motions for a new trial, do not prevent the court in a proper case from granting a new trial on its own motion."

In State ex rel. Brainerd v. Adams, 84 Mo. 315, it is said: "If the court commits a palpable error in an instruction to the jury, or witnesses misconduct of members of the jury, which on motion would authorize it to set aside the verdict, shall it, on account of the ignorance or timidity of the aggrieved party, which prevents him from moving in the matter, render an unjust judgment on the verdict? If the jury find a verdict palpably against the law as declared by the court, is it powerless to maintain its own dignity and self-respect, unless someone who feels aggrieved shall move in the matter? That this power may be abused by the court is no argument against its existence. The appellate courts will find a way to correct any abuse of the power by the lower courts. It is conceded by the court of appeals, in the opinion delivered in this cause, that at common law this power could be exercised by the courts independent of any application by a party for its exercise. . . . And that our statute, prescribing the time within which a party may file a motion to set aside a verdict, does not confer upon the court any power which did not previously exist, or abridge the recognized power of the court, but simply regulated the privilege of the parties to the suit."

In Hewitt v. Steele, 118 Mo. 473, 24 S. W. 440, it is held that the court is not confined to the grounds assigned in the motion, but may consider any good cause, and the appellate court, in reviewing the action of the trial court, will not be confined to the grounds stated in the order of the court, but may consider any ground set out in the motion. The Nebraska Code of 1891, § 4835, is in effect identical with that of Iowa, and in Weber v. Kirkendall, 44 Neb. 766, 769, 63 N. W. 35, 36, the court say: "We do not doubt the power of the trial court to re-examine its record, and to set aside a verdict on account of prejudicial error, on its own motion, in the absence of a request by either party. . . . The rule thus recognized has not only the sanction of authority, but rests upon the soundest and most satisfactory reasons. The power is inherent." Additional cases recognizing this power are Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Miller, 165 Ind. 387, 74 N. E. 509; Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 110 Mich. 173, 68 N. W. 115; Schmidt v. Brown, 80 Hun, 183, 30 N. Y. Supp. 68; Eggen v. Fox, 124 Wis. 534, 102 N. W. 1054. See also 29 Cyc. 929.

This was also the rule in Massachusetts prior to 1897. Ellis v. Ginsburg, 163 Mass. 143, 39 N. E. 800. But by a legislative act of that year it was provided that a verdict shall not be set aside, except by a motion in writing, which, it has been held, takes from the court the power to act upon its own motion. Peirson v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 191 Mass. 229, 77 N. E. 769. These authorities, however, recognize the fact that it is within the power of the court to abuse this right, and that it should only be exercised in extreme cases where, without it, there would be a miscarriage of justice.

In Bank of Willmar v. Lawler, 78 Minn. 136, 80 N. W. 868, it is said that, as a general rule, the trial courts should not exercise this power, except in aggravated cases; and in Hensley v. Davidson Bros. Co. 135 Iowa, 106, 112 N. W. 227, 14 Ann. Cas. 62, it is said that "resort to this power will rarely be required, and, it should be exercised with great caution and in aggravated cases only. Ample provisions are to be found in the Code of Procedure for the protection of litigants on their own application, and for the court to interpose, without affording the defeated party an opportunity to elect whether he will accept the result, lays it open to the suspicion of partisanship."

2. Thus we see that, by virtue of the inherent power of the court, it has authority, on its own motion, or for causes other than those assigned in a motion, to set aside a judgment and grant a new trial, unless such power of the court has been limited by statute. The statute of Oregon (§ 174, L. O. L.), relating to motions for new trials, is in effect the same as that of Iowa, above quoted, namely: "A former judgment may be set aside and a new trial granted on the motion of the party aggrieved for any of the following causes materially affecting the substantial rights of such party," etc. It contains no limitation upon the power of the court to set aside a judgment and grant a new trial upon its own motion, and it was within the court's discretion to set the judgment aside, if error appeared in the record that did or might result in a miscarriage of justice. The court only sought to rectify its own error in giving the instruction mentioned, which instruction we must assume was erroneous, and this was within its power that the rights of the litigant might be protected, and also in justice to the court, as responsible for the impartial administration of the law.

Scott v. Ford, 52 Or. 288, 97 Pac. 99, is cited by counsel for defendant as controlling in this case; but in that case there was no motion by the respondent to set aside the findings, and no error was committed on the trial as constituting a basis for an order vacating a verdict. But the order was made for the purpose of giving the plaintiff an opportunity to amend his pleadings, and it is practically conceded in the opinion, at page 299, that the court may set aside the verdict on its own motion, "where it appears that it has been imposed upon in an ex parte proceeding, or the verdict entered through improper or collusive agreements, etc., and that the court would have the power essential to its protection and that of the public under such circumstances (State ex rel. Brainerd v. Adams, 84 Mo. 310, 316); but that question is not involved here."

The case cited in the above quotation says that "an error in matter of law is one which the court ought to have the right to correct at any time during the term," so that the result in the case of Scott v. Ford is not opposed to the conclusion we have reached in this case. As said in Hensley v. Davidson Bros. Co. supra, occasion to do so will seldom arise, and the power should be exercised only to prevent a wrong to one of the parties by correcting the error or misconduct of the jury, or an error committed by the court itself. But, so far as the record discloses, this is a case within the latter exception. The trial court concluded that it gave an erroneous instruction tending to mislead the jury.

The order of the court vacating the judgment and granting a new trial is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, McBride, J., on January 23, 1912, handed down the following response (— Or. —, 120 Pac. 13):

3. The power to grant new trials is in its inception a common-law right. 3 Bl. Com. Lewis' ed. § 387. Courts of general common-law jurisdiction have inherent power to grant new trials; this power is not taken away by statute, unless the intent to do so is clear. 29 Cyc. 722, and cases there cited. Statutes limiting this power are in derogation of the common law, and such statutes should be strictly construed. Ferguson v. Jones, 17 Or. 204, 3 L.R.A. 620, 11 Am. St. Rep. 808, 20 Pac. 842.

In our opinion, chapter 8 of title 2, L. O. L., has reference exclusively to motions for new trial made by the parties, and was not intended to restrict the common-law power of the courts in order to correct their own mistakes. The motion practically takes the place of a pleading, and the statute, for the sake of orderly procedure, specifies the time within which the pleading shall be filed, and what it shall contain; but it was not the intention of the lawmakers, in thus regulating the manner in which the parties should carry on their contention before the court, to take away another important power which the court possessed, namely, that of correcting sua sponte its own mistakes. This 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) is the view intimated by Mr. Chief Justice Field, in Duff v. Fisher, 15 Cal. 375. He observes: "It may be and probably is true that the court, whether sitting in equity or on trial of a common-law action, may, of its own motion, set aside the verdict of a jury when it is clearly and palpably against the evidence; but when the court is satisfied with the verdict, the parties can only question its correctness by following the course pointed out by the statute." This excerpt clearly draws the distinction between the power of the court derived from the common law and the rights of a party proceeding under the statute. The exercise of the power of the court to correct its own error is a valuable one, tending to prevent appeals and reversals, and it should not be construed away where the intent of the legislature to destroy it is not clearly manifest.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

F. W. ISHERWOOD et al., Resp'ts.,

v.

CHRISTINE SALENE, Appt.

(— Or. —, 123 Pac. 49.)

License — grant — right to hunt — interference — liability.

1. One who has granted the exclusive right to shoot wild fowl upon the waters upon his land is not liable in damages for clearing and draining the land, if he does so in good faith for the purpose of improving it, but may be so if he acts in bad faith in order to injure the grantees.

Equity — jurisdiction — interference with licensee — remedy at law.

2. Equity has no jurisdiction of a suit to prevent wrongful interference by one who has granted the right to hunt on his land with the rights of the grantee, since the remedy at law for damages is adequate.

(April 23, 1912.)

Note. — Nature and extent of right created by private grant of hunting or fishing privilege.

In addition to the cases discussed in the present note, see those which are set out in ISHERWOOD v. SALENE.

As to injunction against hunting or fishing on navigable waters or against interference therewith, see the notes in 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1236, and 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 286.

As to the right of way on shore as appurtenant to fishery rights, see subdivision III. of the note in 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 872.

As to the right of riparian owner on tidal or navigable waters to exclusive fishery,

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Columbia County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to enjoin defendant from draining certain waters on her lands and from clearing the land to the injury of plaintiffs' rights of hunting on such land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The Bingham deed grants a profit à prendre.

Hunting privilege—generally.

Beginning with the early English cases it has been uniformly held that a shooting privilege is a profit à prendre.

Thus, in Davies's Case, 3 Mod. 246, in holding that the lord of a manor might acquire for himself and his tenants and farmers a prescriptive right to take fowl in the warren of another, the court apparently indorsed the argument that such a right was a profit à prendre in alieno solo, and was therefore such as the tenants of a manor might prescribe by a que estate exclusive of the lord.

A right to shoot and take away game is a profit à prendre, and therefore is an interest in the land within the statute of frauds. Webber v. Lee, 51 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 485, L. R. 9 Q. B. Div. 315, 47 L. T. N. S. 215, 30 Week. Rep. 866, 47 J. P. 4.

It was held in Hooper v. Clark, 8 Best & S. 150, 36 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 79, L. R. 2 Q. B. 200, 16 L. T. N. S. 152, 15 Week. Rep. 347, that the right granted by deed to kill and take game was an incorporeal hereditament, touching which the grantee's covenant to leave the estate as well stocked as when he entered upon its enjoyment was a covenant running with the land, and was enforceable by the assignees of the reversion.

In Vermont it is held that the exclusive right to shoot and fish upon the lands of another, when not granted in favor of any dominant tenement, is not an easement, but a profit à prendre, and the grantee of such a right, though not the owner of the soil, has such an interest in the land as entitles him to maintain an action of trespass, under a statute authorizing such an action in respect of lands by the owner thereof. Payne v. Sheets, 75 Vt. 335, 65 Atl. 656.

And a right to shoot upon the lands of another, acquired in connection with the 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The lakes and other waters must, so far as consistent with the right to hunt thereon, be left in their natural state.

Salene v. Isherwood, 55 Or. 263, 106 Pac. 18.

The owner of land on the margin of a natural lake or pond has a right to have the natural level of the water maintained so as to permit him to enjoy the advantages attendant upon riparian ownership, and to protect him from the disadvantage of having a strip of uncovered lake bottom left in front of his property.

purchase of a lot carved therefrom, is not a mere license revocable at pleasure, but is an interest which will support an action of specific performance. St. Helen Shooting Club v. Barber, 150 Mich. 571, 114 N. W. 399.

—affirmative rights of grantee.

One who has a right of shooting on a farm must not do unnecessary damage to standing crops, but must exercise his privilege at a time and in the manner that is usual with sportsmen. Hilton v. Green, 2 Fost. & F. 821.

A grant of the right to shoot and sport over a specified tract of land does not justify the grantee in breeding and turning into the lands game bred elsewhere, to the injury of the grantor's crops. Birkbeck v. Paget, 31 Beav. 403. This case is cited with approval in Farrer v. Nelson, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 258, 49 J. P. 725, 54 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 385, 52 L. T. N. S. 786, 33 Week. Rep. 800, which holds that the occupant of a farm under a lease reserving the shooting rights to the lessor has a right of action against the lessee of the shooting right, for damage to crops caused by overstocking the farm with game. While it appears that the game was bred upon the estate of the lessor outside the plaintiff's farm, the court seems inclined to go a little further than Birkbeck v. Paget, and to place its decision upon the somewhat broader ground that the holder of the shooting right had no right to increase the game to an unreasonable extent.

The deed involved in ISHERWOOD v. SALLENE was the subject of litigation in an early case which held that the rights thereby granted were confined to shooting upon the waters, and did not include the right to shoot fowl upon the lands; and that, though possibly assignable, the instrument did not authorize the grantees to issue permits to other persons. Bingham v. Salene, 15 Or. 208, 3 Am. St. Rep. 152, 14 Pac. 523. In a subsequent case involving the same fishing privilege (Salene v. Isherwood, 55 Or. 263, 106 Pac. 18), it was further held that the instrument must be deemed to give the grantees a right to maintain such small boats and temporary structures as would

Eakin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On February 13, 1878, the defendant, Christine Salene, and her husband Charles, now deceased, conveyed to "H. T. and E. W. Bingham, and to their heirs and assigns forever, the sole and exclusive right, privilege, and easement, to shoot, take, and kill any and all wild duck and other wild fowl upon and in any and all lakes, sloughs, and waters situate, lying, or being upon our land," etc. Plaintiffs are the grantees of the Bingham of such right and privilege, and they bring this suit to enjoin defendant from draining Wapato, Big Slavin, Round, and Knighton lakes, and certain not interfere with the use of the adjacent farm, and that such right included the erection of blinds, the use of decoys, the keeping of dogs, and the recovery of such game as might, when shot, fall upon the adjacent land. Invoking the rule of the earlier case that the grantees had no right to issue permits to third persons, the court held that the grantees had no right to authorize their servants, or persons purporting to be such, to hunt upon the premises. And it was further held that the grantees had no right to dam up the lake. And while it was intimated that the language of the deed did not authorize the grantees to feed the fowl by artificial means when high water had destroyed the natural feed, it was held that the parties seemed to have acquiesced in a contrary construction, and therefore the grantees would be deemed to have that right.

A clause in a lease of land reserving to the lessor the right of "shooting and sporting" over the land is not limited to "game" in its strict sense, but is a reservation of the right to shoot such animals as are, in common parlance, understood to be the subjects of sport (rabbits). Jeffries v. Evans, 19 C. B. N. S. 264, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 261, 11 Jur. N. S. 584, 13 L. T. N. S. 72, 13 Week. Rep. 864, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 716.

It was held in Wickham v. Hawker, 7 Mees. & W. 63, that a grant to one, his heirs and assigns, of liberty to go upon the grantor's land, to hunt and fish with servants and otherwise, was a grant, not of a mere license of pleasure, but of a license of a profit & prendre within the operation of the prescription act. Parke, B., cited as a leading case, Norfolk v. Wiseman, 12 Henry VII. 25, 13 Henry VII. 13, and as holding that if a grant of hunting is a mere license of pleasure, no other person can justify under it, but that if it is a license of profit the rule is otherwise. And the following language was quoted from Norfolk v. Wiseman: "If there be a license for him and his servants to hunt, by these words, for him and his servants, shall be understood a license of profit; for these words imply that the grantee hath a property in the thing hunted, because that by such a license the grantee may justify for his servsloughs, situated on her lands, which she threatens to do, and also from cutting and burning brush and timber which borders the lakes. These lakes cover almost one sixth of the farm of defendant. The land upon which the lakes are situated is the donation land claim of Charles Salene, and consists of about 480 acres, through which Willamette slough, a navigable stream, flows. Much of the farm is overflowed during the winter and spring months, especially when the water is high in the Columbia river. When the waters are low, the tide rises about 3 feet in the river and the slough. At the low stage of the water in the slough, not at low tide, ant to hunt, which is more than a license of pleasure." Parke, B., also referred to the following comment in Manwood, 108, on a case in the Year Book of 11 Henry VII. folio 86: "If one license me and my heirs to come and hunt in his park, I must have a writing (that is, a deed) of that license, for a thing passes by the license, which endures in perpetuity: but if he license me, one time to hunt, this is good without deed, for no inheritance passes."

And it was held that the reservation to the defendant in a demise to the plaintiff, of the right to sport over the demised premises, in common with the latter, his heirs and assigns, and with "any friend of his or them," was not confined to a single friend at a time, but should be deemed to have reference to plurality of friends. Gardiner v. Colyer, 10 L. T. N. S. 715, 12 Week. Rep. 979.

The grant of the exclusive right to shoot over lands, together with a covenant of quiet enjoyment, does not prevent the landowner or his tenants from cutting underwood and otherwise using the land in the ordinary and accustomed way, provided there is no wilful destruction of game. Jeffries v. Evans, supra.

So, "the sole right of shooting and fishing over the whole estate" of the grantor is not an interest in the land, within the meaning of a statute providing for compensation to persons whose interest in land is injured by the construction of a railroad. Bird v. Great Eastern R. Co. 19 C. B. N. S. 268, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 366, 11 Jur. N. S. 782, 13 L. T. N. S. 365, 13 Week. Rep. 989. The court said that the instrument creating the shooting privilege was not under seal, and could not be enforced, if enforceable at all, against anyone but the grantor, and was therefore not enforceable against the railway which purchased its right of way from the grantor. However, it was intimated that even if the instrument had been under seal the result would have been the same, since, in the absence of a covenant to the contrary, the grantor would not be liable for any act in the enjoyment of his estate which was not wilfully committed but very near it, the elevation of the surface of the water in the lakes is about 3 feet higher than the surface of the water in the Willamette slough. In the dry season the depth of the water in the lakes is from 4 inches to a foot. The evidence shows that two of the lakes cover about 40 acres of ground, while the portion of the other two, situated on defendant's land, cover nearly as much. Part of the farm is covered with timber and part with brush, while the lakes are bordered with willows. Willamette slough flows within 200 or 300 feet of two of the lakes. Defendant's residence is between Wapato lake and the slough, and she uses the farm as a stock and dairy farm.

From the time of the execution of the deed from defendant to the Bingham, there have been disputes as to the rights of the Bingham and their successors, and continual trouble between plaintiffs and defendant. Plaintiffs' grantors treated the grant as a license to use defendant's place as they pleased, as was found by this court in Bingham v. Salene, 15 Or. 208, 3 Am. St. Rep. 152, 14 Pac. 523, and plaintiffs now contend for rights which can only be sustained upon the theory that they have a freehold interest in the land, rather than an incorporeal hereditament. In 1909 the rights of plaintiffs, under defendant's deed, were again before this court (Salene to injure the hunting or fishing privilege, or was calculated directly to interfere with it.

And the lessor of a shooting privilege cannot be enjoined by the lessee from dividing the land into lots and selling the same subject to the shooting privilege, upon the ground that the same may interfere with the shooting; but to warrant an injunction it must appear that such will be the inevitable result. Pattison v. Gilford, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 524, L. R. 18 Eq. 259, 22 Week. Rep. 673.

Fishing privilege—generally.

With respect to the different kinds of fisheries, Mr. Farnham says at p. 1390 of vol. II. of his work on Waters: "Much discussion has occurred as to the kinds of fishery which may exist, most of which is merely curious learning at the present time. The principal kinds which have been mentioned are four,—(1) several, (2) free, (3) common fishery, (4) common of fishery. 'Attempt has been made to distinguish between the last three kinds, but not with marked success. In Benett v. Costor, 8 Taunt, 183, 2 J. B. Moore, 83, 19 Revised Rep. 491, an action for interfering with plaintiff's fishery when the plaintiff declared on the right to a common fishery whereas he should have alleged a common of fishery, the court, in discussing the difference between the two rights, said a common of fishery is a right in common with certain other persons in a particular stream. Though text writers have used the terms communem piscariam and communiam piscaria, a common fishery extends to all mankind. Holt, Ch. J., divided fisheries into three classes,—(1) separalis, (2) libera, (3) communis. Smith v. Kemp, Holt, 322, 2 Salk. 637, Carth. 285, 4 Mod. 186. Schultes, Aquatic Rights, 60, after a careful consideration of the question, concluded that there are in fact only two sorts of fishery, free or common of fishery and several fishery, or fishery in gross, though fisheries may acquire various provincial denominations, and be subject to peculiar and different restraints according 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to the locality of their situation and the usage of the neighborhood. And in Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68, Fitzgerald, B., said that 'the most important distinction in fisheries lies in their being exclusive or otherwise. Still, the exclusive right of fishing may be either in the soil of the owner or not.' It thus appears that the main division of fishery is into those which are exclusively in an individual and those which are shared in common with others, the latter receiving various names which depend upon the manner in which the right is shared. The distinction between free fishery and several fishery goes back to the Year Books, 17 Edw. IV. 6 pl. 5, and lies in the fact that the latter is exclusive, while the former may be in common with others. Hall, Sea Shores, 68; Melvin v. Whiting, 7 Pick. 79. Libera piscaria cannot be held to refer to an exclusive fishery in case of a large inland sea and without warrant by subsequent usages or the act of the parties. Johnston v. Bloomfield, supra. A free fishery is merely the right to fish in a certain place in common with all others who may have a right to fish there, and is the same as an unlimited common of fishery. Woolrych, Waters, p. 123; Johnston v. Bloomfield, supra; Yard v. Carman, 3 N. J. L. 937. Blackstone thought that a free fishery was an exclusive right of fishing through franchise in a public river, and differs from a several fishery in that the latter must be connected with, or derived from, ownership of the soil, while the former need not be. 2 Bl. Com. 39. But that distinction does not meet the necessities of the case, because it merely defines a several fishery in gross, while the idea carried by the term 'free fishery' is that the one possessing it has a right of fishery in a certain place, of which he cannot be deprived, but which is not exclusive. The grant by a riparian proprietor of a 'free fishery' in a non-navigable stream passes nothing more than the same right of fishery as is claimed by everyone who has land in the manor along the bank of the river. Lamb v. Newbiggin, 1 Car. & K. 549. 'A man may have a free fishery on his own soil, as, for

v. Isherwood, 55 Or. 263, 106 Pac. 18), in which plaintiffs were restrained from certain encroachments beyond the terms of the deed, and by this suit they again ask to have defendant limited in the improvement and use of her farm. In the opinion in the case last referred to, plaintiffs' right to tempt the ducks to the lakes in increased numbers by placing feed for them there, under the terms of the deed, was held doubtful; but, as the owner had previously recognized the right, plaintiffs were sustained in the exercise of it.

Plaintiffs now contend for rights not expressly granted by the deed, but implied therein, which can only be sustained on the theory that plaintiffs' interest, not only in the lakes, but in the lands bordering there-instance, he may have a river in his own manor, and another may have a right of fishing there with him.' Gibbs v. Wooliscott, 3 Salk. 291, Comb. 433, 464. See also 18 Vin. Abr. title Piscary, (B). A riparian proprietor has no such property in libera piscaria as to be able to call the fish his own and maintain trespass for their taking by another. Upton v. Dawkin, 3 Mod. 97."

—general nature and incidents of right.

On this aspect of the question the present note supplements subdivision II. c. of the note in 60 L.R.A. 481.

A right to take fish from the private waters of another is not a mere easement, but is a right of profit in the land, and therefore can be acquired only by prescription or grant, and not by custom or dedication. Cobb v. Davenport, 33 N. J. L. 223, 97 Am. Dec. 718.

And where the ownership of the soil is in another, a several fishery is such an incorporeal hereditament as will support an action of trespass. Holford v. Bailey, 13 Q. B. 426, 18 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 109, 13 Jur. 278.

So, in Albright v. Cortright, 64 N. J. L. 330, 48 L.R.A. 616, 81 Am. St. Rep. 504, 45 Atl. 634, the decision that the defendant had no right to fish on waters on the private lands of the plaintiff was arrived at by this line of reasoning: It was held that since the defendant had no express license from the plaintiff, whatever right he could have must have been by way of easement, custom, or prescription; that the right claimed was not an easement, but a profit à prendre; that the right to take profit from the land of another could not be acquired by custom; and that the defendant could not, merely as one of the public, claim the right by prescription, since the public could not prescribe.

A devise to a daughter, her heirs, and assigns of certain land. "with a privilege of digging 10 barrels of clams yearly" on lands of the devisor, creates, so far as the fishery is concerned, not a mere personal privilege, but an estate of inheritance which 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) on, is a freehold interest. The right to hunt under such a grant is limited to the usual and reasonable methods generally used in the vicinity at the time of the execution of the deed. Salene v. Isherwood, supra; Bingham v. Salene, 15 Or. 208, 3 Am. St. Rep. 152, 14 Pac. 523; Hilton v. Green, 2 Post. & F. 821. Under such a deed, the grantor is under no obligation to maintain a preserve for the pleasure and sport of the grantees, but they must exercise the right in the condition it may be at the time.

We are cited to no cases upon the questions involved here other than the two Oregon cases, supra, and there are but few American cases on the subject, and none discuss this question, viz., the extent of is assignable. Lakeman v. Butler, 17 Pick. 436, 28 Am. Dec. 311.

But a right to fish on the lands of another, which is merely personal to the owner of the right, and not appendant to any estate, is capable neither of assignment nor inheritance. Mallet v. McCord, 127 Ga. 761, 56 S. E. 1015.

In Grove v. Portal, 71 L. J. Ch. N. S. 209, [1902] 1 Ch. 727, 86 L. T. N. S. 350, 18 Times L. R. 319, it was held that a covenant against subletting in a lease of the exclusive right of fishing in a certain portion of a river, together with liberty of ingress and egress for the lessee and his authorized friends, was not broken by the lessee granting a license to another person to fish in the waters embraced within the lease, provided the licensee should use but two rods at the same time,—the court saying that the covenant not to underlet "the said premises" referred to the whole premises, and did not operate to prevent a leasing of a part of the premises. It was intimated, however, that if the lessee had granted an exclusive license for two rods, the effect would have been to transfer the premises to the licensee, and therefore would have effected a breach of the covenant.

The owner of a fishing privilege on flats, which has been severed from the uplands, may maintain trespass against the occupant of the uplands who places a weir on the flats. Wyman v. Oliver, 75 Me. 421. In this case it appeared that, upon the distribution of an intestate's estate, the uplands were divided between his heirs, and the fishing privilege was set off to the wife as dower; and it was held that this severed the fishing privilege from the uplands, and that the widow's subsequent release or conveyance of the dower to the heirs did not restore the privilege to its former status as an incident of the uplands.

Since the owner of flats located in waters in which the right of fishery is common, has no right to convey the fishery, his lease of "the exclusive privilege of fishing with nets" on a certain portion of the flats is not a lease of the fishery, but only of a certain part of the flats for the convenience the rights of the grantee in a hunting privilege. Bingham v. Salene, supra, is one of the principal American cases cited in the text-books and cyclopedias upon the effect of such a grant, but there are several English cases quite in point. Jeffryes v. Evans (1865) 19 C. B. N. S. 246, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 716, is a case where the defendant leased the land to Rees, reserving to himself the exclusive right to shoot, fish, and sport thereon, and thereafter he demised to plaintiff the hunting and fishing privilege reserved in the former lease. Rees, the lessee under his lease, cut down certain furze cover and woods on the land, which constituted shelter for rabbits and other game, of which plaintiff complained. In deciding the case, Erle, Ch. J., says of drawing nets; and while it seems that the lessee cannot maintain an action against a member of the public for taking fish upon the flats, he may maintain an action of trespass for drawing nets thereon. Brink v. Richtmyer, 14 Johns. 255.

And while the grantee of the right of taking certain specified fish on the shore frontage of the grantor, together with all privileges necessary for carrying out the fishery, has no right to attach fixtures for the express purpose of taking fish other than those mentioned in the grant, nevertheless, fish of other kinds which the grantee finds in a weir constructed solely for the purpose of taking the fish specified belong to him upon the theory that fish, before they are taken, are the property of no one, but that, when taken, they, like all animals, feræ naturæ, belong to the taker. Treat v. Parsons, 84 Me. 520, 24 Atl. 946.

—several fishery as including title to soil.

Lord Coke took the stand that the soil did not pass with the grant of a several fishery. He says in Co. Litt. 4b: "If a man be seised of a river, and by deed do grant separalem piscariam in the same, and maketh livery of seisin secundum formam chartæ, the soile doth not passe, nor the water; for the grantor may take water there; and if the river become drie he may take the benefit of the soile; for there passed to the grantee but a particular right, and the livery being made secundum formam chartæ cannot enlarge the grant. For the same reason, if a man grant aquam suam the soile shall not passe, but the piscary within the water passeth therewith. And land covered with water shall be demanded by the name of so many acres aqua co-operta, whereby it appeareth that they are distinct things." So, he says at 122 a: "A man may prescribe to have separalem piscariam in such a water, and the owner of the soyle shall not fish there; but if he claim to have communiam piscariam or liberam piscariam, the owner of the soyle shall fish there."

However, the courts have uniformly tak-

"The next question arises upon the second breach, which alleges that Rees, lawfully claiming, and in fact having, through and under the lessors, the right to cut down divers furze covers, woods, and plantations in and upon the lands over which the plaintiff had under, and by virtue of the said indenture the exclusive right of shooting and sporting. . . . It is contended on the part of the plaintiff that the covenant for quiet enjoyment of the premises demised and granted was impliedly a covenant not to grub up or destroy the furze and underwood; and so the breach of it was an eviction of the plaintiff from his right of sporting. To this it seems to me there is a short answer. There has been no eviction. The plaintiff has just as en the position that prima facie the soil is in the owner of a several fishery. Holford v. Bailey, 13 Q. B. 426, 18 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 109, 13 Jur. 278; Foster v. Wright, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 438, 49 L. J. C. N. S. 97, 44 J. P. 7; Partheriche v. Mason, 2 Chitty, 658.

With this position, the court in Johnston v. Bloomfield, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 68, are inclined to agree, the specific holding being that there is a difference between libera piscaria and separalis piscaria, and that the grant of libera piscaria does not amount to an exclusive fishery or pass title to the soil.

So, it was held in Anonymous, Lofft, 364, that notwithstanding the dictum of Lord Coke, the presumption is that the owner of a several fishery is the owner of the soil. This case is decided upon the authority of Smith and Kemp, Skinner, 342, 2 Salk. 637, 4 Mod. 186, Holt, 322, Carth. 285, which holds that the owner of a free fishery can maintain trespass against one who takes fish therefrom, and that fisheries are divided into three kinds,—(1) separalis piscaria, (2) libera piscaria, (3) communis piscaria. In the case of the first two it was held that trespass would lie, but that in the case of the third, it would not lie; and this upon the ground that the owner of a several fishery was the owner of the soil, that where a free fishery was granted, the grantee had a property in the fish and might bring a possessory action for them without making any title, while communis piscaria was similar to any other common, at least with respect to the fact that a commoner cannot maintain any action with respect thereto.

While a several fishery may exist, either apart from or as incident to the ownership of the soil over which the stream flows, it is settled that where a several fishery is proved to exist, the owner of the fishery is to be presumed the owner of the soil unless there is evidence to the contrary. Hanbury v. Jenkins [1901] 2 Ch. 401, 70 L. J. Ch. N. S. 730, 65 J. P. 631, 49 Week. Rep. 615, 17 Times L. R. 539 (the court added in effect that this was especially so where the grant of the fishery expressly included "weirs," the court saying that a grant of much right to shoot and sport over the 30 or 40 acres of land which has been so treated as he had before; and that is all the plaintiff covenanted that he should have." Willes, J., in the same case, says: "As to the other point, the argument urged on the part of the plaintiff would have been entitled to much weight if the grant had been of the woods and underwoods, though, if it had been a grant of the latter, I should have thought that the tenant might lawfully have cut the underwood in the usual and accustomed way. . . . The grant is of the exclusive right of fishing and sporting over, and taking the game, rabbits, and wild fowl on the land demised, and on that under lease to Rees. I apprehend that such a grant as that does not prevent the landowner or his tenants from using the land in the ordinary and accustomed way, provided they do not resort to any expedients for destroying or driving away the game. Cutting furze and underwood in the ordinary course of the cultivation of land cannot be said to be a wilful destruction of the game." Smith, J., in the same case, says: "It appears to me that the cutting of the furze and underwood, which may have been done in the ordinary course of good management of the farm, was not an interruption of the enjoyment of the incorporeal hereditaments granted to the plaintiff. He had the same right to sport over the land as before. If he wished to have the condition of the land as to furze and underwood preserved, he weirs necessarily granted the soil to which they were attached).

And this presumption displaces the presumption that would otherwise arise in favor of the riparian proprietor. Ecroyd v. Coulthard, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 751, [1897] 2 Ch. 554, 77 L. T. N. S. 357, 46 Week. Rep. 119, 61 J. P. 791.

In Atty. Gen. v. Emerson [1891] A. C. 649, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 79, 65 L. T. N. S. 564, 55 J. P. 709, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 739, holding that proof of the ownership of a several fishery over a part of the foreshore raised a presumption against the Crown that the freehold of the soil in that part of the foreshore was in the owner of the fishery—Lord Herschell said that he was not inclined to inquire upon what basis this presumption rested, though he pointed out that in earlier days the exclusive right of fishing over the foreshore being no doubt the most valuable right of property connected with it, it might have been thought probable that where this right was granted, either the fishery would be conferred upon one who was already owner of the soil, or that the soil would be granted with it.

It was held in Marshall v. Ulleswater Steam Nav. Co. 3 Best & S. 732, 9 Jur. N. S. 988, 32 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 139, 8 L. T. N. S. 416, 11 Week. Rep. 489, that although the description of a fishery was left uncertain, where the deed which conveyed it was a feoffment with livery of seisin duly indorsed, and conveyed subject to a free rent, the fishery must be deemed to be several, and it therefore presumably included the soil.

It was held in Rex v. Old Alresford, 1 T. R. 358, that where there was rented to a pauper "the fishery of a pond with the spear-sedge, flags, and rushes growing in or about the same," it was presumed that the soil passed with it, and that the same was a tenement within the statute relating to settlements of paupers. Here the court said in a general way that the letting of a fishery of this kind raised the presumption that the soil passed with it.

said that there was no magic in the words "public" and "navigable" employed in the rule that the owner of a several fishery in a public navigable river is presumed the owner of the soil, and declared that those words were used as referring to the owner's right even though the river was public and navigable, and that a fortiori the presumption attached where the stream was neither public nor navigable. In this connection the court cites Foster v. Wright, L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 438, 49 L. J. C. P. N. S. 97, 44 J. P. 7.

By the application of the doctrine of accretions and relictions, it was held in Foster v. Wright, supra, that the owner of a several fishery continued to have the exclusive right of fishing notwithstanding a gradual change in the course of the stream, and could maintain an action of trespass against the owner of land which was originally nonriparian, but a portion of which became the bed of the river when in the course of the change the intervening strip and a part of the defendant's land was washed away, and the extent of the encroachment upon the latter was clearly defined.

Hindson v. Ashby [1896] 2 Ch. 1, involved a dispute between a riparian owner on a nontidal stream, and the owner of a several fishery therein, as to the respective rights of the parties in a strip of land which had formerly formed a part of the bed of the stream, but which at times now became dry. Refraining from deciding the general question whether the riparian proprietor could claim the accretions, and instead, apparently invoking the rule that even if a riparian proprietor in such circumstances may ordinarily claim the accretions, such right yields to the presumption that the owner of a several fishery is the owner of the bed of the stream,—the court held that, since the accretions had not ceased to constitute the bed of the stream, they belonged to the owner of the several fishery. In reaching this conclusion the court said: "Treating the defendant as the owner of a several fishery, and as presumptively, as well as by admission of the plaintiffs, the owner of the bed should have expressly stipulated that the present mode of cultivation of the land should not be altered."

In Boyle v. Holcroft [1905] 1 I. R. 245, 250, Barton, J., says: "I take it that, as a general rule, so long as the tenant is bona fide and reasonably managing and using the lands, the owner of the fishing rights must be content to exercise his right upon the lands in the condition in which they may happen to be from time to time." In Fetherstonhaugh v. Hagarty (1878) Ir. L. R. 3 Eq. 150, where a lease was given, reserving to the owner the hunting privilege, the lessee ploughed 40 acres of ground and thus broke up and smothered the rabbit burrows, to the injury of the hunting. It is held that a tenant under a lease such as this, where an exclusive profit à prendre is reserved or granted to the landowner, cannot be made answerable for acts done in the ordinary and proper cultivation of the farm, even though they result in the destruction of game. In Gearns v. Baker (1875) L. R. 10 Ch. 355, it is held that a landowner who has demised for a term of years the right to shoot over his lands is not thereby prevented from cutting timber, as he thinks fit, in the ordinary management of his land, although injurious to the shooting. Sir W. M. James, L. J., says: "The agreement is an ordinary agreement for letting shooting, and I must say that it would be an immense surprise to many persons who let shooting lease for twenty-one years is to be interfered with by this court or by any other court in their mode of managing their own property. It is preposterous to suppose that a man who grants a shooting lease for twenty one years is to be dictated to by this court as to whether he shall cut down a tree or remove a copse, because by so doing he would be driving away the hares or interfering with the breeding of pheasants. If men mean to acquire such rights, they must express their meaning clearly. I am of opinion that such rights are not expressed, and not implied in the ordinary grant of shooting, and that this court has no right to interfere in the way suggested."

These cases reflect the views of eight different judges, and cover a period from 1863 to 1905, and we think their reasoning is sound. We find no case to the contrary. The opinion in Bingham v. Salene, 15 Or. 208, 3 Am. St. Rep. 152, 14 Pac. 523, construes this deed to be a conveyance of license or a profit à prendre, and holds that the right cannot be extended beyond the terms of the deed. Lord, Ch. J., says: "While 'the supposed odiousness of this right,' as Lord Campbell said, 'cannot influence our decision,' the fact, at least, admonishes us that no intentions or presumptions are to be indulged in in the construction of the grant, not warranted by the plain import of its terms and provisions. A grant of this description is construed strictly." And speaking of this same deed in Salene v. Isherwood, 55 Or. 267, 106 Pac. 18, it is said that the deed is to be construed strictly. Although the conveyance was upon a valuable consideration, yet it was merely nominal; and the grantors evidently had no thought that they were deeding away their right to control and farm one sixth of their land, and they did not grant more than the privilege of shooting in certain places on the farm such wild fowls as might by their own inclination be found there in certain seasons in their migrations, and the granof the river within the limits of the fishery, it is very difficult to see how either his rights or those of the riparian proprietor can be affected either by accretions to the bed or by the lowering of the level of the water, so long as the accretions or the soil from which the water has receded are still in fact part of the bed of the river. So long as this is the case, so long will the riparian proprietors continue to be such, and to be entitled to free access to and from their lands to the water across the accretions and soil left dry, and otherwise to use such accretions and soil to the same extent as they were entitled to use the bed of the river before any change in it became observable. On the other hand, in the case supposed, the owner of the several fishery will have the same rights to such accretions and soil as parts of the bed of the river, as he had to the old bed of the river before any change took place." Whether the accretions could ever become the property of the plaintiffs, or cease to be the property of the defendants, when, for instance, it ceased to be a part of the bed of the river, the court expressly refused to decide.

It was held in Fitzgerald v. Faunce, 46 N. J. L. 536, that a conveyance by an owner of land adjoining the Delaware river, of the sole right, use, and enjoyment for all purposes of fishing whatsoever and none other, of a strip of land described by courses and distances beginning along an artificial embankment, made to prevent the tide from flowing over the low lands, and running out to low-water mark, conveyed an actual estate, and not merely an easement; passed the fee of the land next the river; and made the grantee the riparian owner; and that the successor in title of the grantor by mesne conveyances executed subject to the former conveyance could not, as against the grantee in such former conveyance, avail himself of a grant to him by riparian commissioners of the state rights in the land under the water in front of the strip. L. A. W. ants, when, for instance, it ceased to be a part of the bed of the river, the court expressly refused to decide.

tees of the privilege or their assigns have no ground upon which to ask more; nor is the court justified in implying more than is expressed in the deed.

This brings us to the application of the facts to this statement of the law. It is quite apparent that there is bad feeling between the parties hereto; and, if defendant has endeavored to throw every obstacle in the way of successful shooting, as claimed by plaintiffs, that fact might tend to give her acts in cutting brush and making fires on the immediate border of the lakes the appearance of an effort to drive away the birds or make it more difficult for plaintiffs to shoot them, and not for the bona fide purpose of clearing the land in the interest of better farming. If she is systematically clearing her land, evidencing a bona fide intention to improve it, no complaint can be made against her.

As to the draining of the lakes, the complaint is that she threatens to drain them, and she admits such a purpose. Much evidence was taken upon the question whether they could be profitably drained. If they cannot be successfully drained, then the water will still remain for the ducks. If they can be, then surely, in the interest of good farming, she should be permitted to do it, and it is not for the court to say whether she can or cannot. We can only determine whether, by virtue of the conveyance of the hunting privilege, she can be permitted to do so, and the same may be said as to the use she can make of the land when drained. She may get much or little off the ground when drained, but this is her affair, and not plaintiffs.

For cutting and burning brush in bad faith, in a manner to injure the hunting, defendant would be liable to plaintiffs in damages. But the deed is not ambiguous nor of doubtful meaning, and plaintiffs have shown no ground for equitable relief.

If defendant is wrongfully destroying plaintiffs' hunting privilege, or in bad faith committing acts that drive or keep away the birds from the lakes, the remedy is adequate and complete at law, where a jury may determine whether cutting and burning brush at the time and place, and in the manner complained of, was done in bad faith, and, if so, plaintiffs can be fully compensated in damages.

The decree is reversed, and the suit is dismissed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

FRANK H. DOWNEY, Respt.,

v.

THOMAS W. FINUCANE et al., Impleaded, etc., Appts.

(205 N. Y. 251, 98 N. E. 391.)

Corporation — promoter — fraud in sale of stocks — liability.

1. Promoters of a scheme to consolidate several independent corporations into one business enterprise cannot escape liability for fraudulent representations of an agent in the sale of the stock of the consolidated corporation, on the theory that they were merely directors of that corporation, and not personally liable for the fraud of an agent employed to market its stock, if whatever functions they assumed were in furtherance of a common enterprise to market the securities necessary to the success of the enterprise.

Evidence — fraud in sale of corporate stock — separate transactions.

2. In an action by the purchaser of bonds of a consolidated corporation, to hold the promoters liable for fraud in inducing the sale by means of a prospectus which stated that one of the corporations which went into the consolidation owned a franchise acquired under advice of eminent counsel, which if good would be very valuable, evidence is admissible that under the law it was extremely doubtful if it had any value whatever, and that they suppressed the fact that they turned the franchise over to the corporation for more than 150 times what they paid for it.

Same — issuance of stock for property — excessive valuation.

3. In an action to hold promoters liable for fraud in the sale of bonds of a corporation, the jury may consider the question of fraud in a statement of the prospectus that a certain number of shares of stock had been issued, or directed to be issued, when a portion of such stock represented property turned over by the promoters at more than 150 times what they paid for it.

Same — payment of unearned dividends.

4. In an action to hold promoters liable for fraud in selling bonds of a consolidated corporation, the jury may consider statements in the prospectus that dividends had been paid on the stock of one of the constituent corporations, when in fact they were never earned.

Note. — As to the duty and liability of promoters to the corporation and its members, see notes to Yale Gas Stove Co. v. Wilcox, 25 L.R.A. 90, and Lomita Land & Water Co. v. Robinson, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1106, and later cases Harrill v. Davis, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1153, and Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Bigelow, post, 314.

Corporations — promoters — fraudulent intent — ambiguous language.

5. Promoters of a corporation cannot escape liability for fraud in the sale of bonds by means of ambiguous language in the prospectus, on the ground that they intended no fraudulent misstatement of facts, if the general public would almost inevitably infer the fraudulent meaning from the language used.

Jury — challenge — party — joint defendants.

6. Several defendants joined in one civil action, whose interest is common, whose answers are substantially identical, and whose defense is conducted in the common interest of all, are treated as but one party, within the meaning of a statute allowing a certain number of peremptory challenges to each party in a civil action.

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Monroe County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for fraud and deceit. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John G. Milburn, with Messrs. Taylor & Goodwin, and Walter S. Hubbell, for appellants Sibley et al.:

If the transaction was a company transaction, Fenn was the agent of the corporation, not of the directors. Except under special circumstances, the directors would not be liable to third persons for the acts of such an agent. Those special circumstances are the personal participation of individual directors in the acts which have produced injury to a third person.

Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a civil action to recover damages for fraud and deceit. There was a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and twenty special questions were submitted to the jury to answer.

A curious feature in the record is the form of the verdict as originally rendered. After announcing that the jury had agreed, the foreman said: "We find for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,212.93, and recommend the clemency of the court for Messrs. Eastman, Sibley, Strong, and Watson."

It is suggested that the nature of the action had not been brought clearly within the comprehension of jurors who could agree upon such a verdict as this, and that they evidently supposed that they were sitting in a criminal tribunal. The appellate division might have granted a new trial on this ground; but the form of the verdict was corrected by direction of the trial judge, and it now presents no legal error cognizable in this court.

The basis of the action is the alleged falsity of a prospectus published to promote the sale of the securities of the United States Independent Telephone Company. This prospectus was not prepared or signed by any of the appellants. The sole signature to the prospectus is that of Albert O. Fenn, care Alliance Bank, Rochester, New York. The plaintiff's right to recover therefore, rests upon the agency of Fenn to act in their behalf in endeavoring to procure subscriptions by means of the prospectus. The United States Independent Telephone Company was a holding corporation organized to acquire the control of several corporations, through whose powers, rights, and franchises an independent telephone business might be established in New York and other parts of the country. At the time of the publication of the prospectus, it had obtained a majority of the authorized capital stock of two other corporations: First, the New York Independent Telephone Company; and second, the Stromberg-Carlson Telephone Manufacturing Company. The New York Independent Telephone Company had acquired an alleged franchise originally granted to the Mercantile Electric Company, which was supposed to authorize the introduction, construction, and operation of an independent telephone system in the streets of the city of New York; and this alleged franchise plays the most prominent part in the present litigation. The Stromberg-Carlson Telephone Manufacturing Company was a corporation engaged in the manufacture of telephone instruments and appliances in the city of Rochester.

The defendant Finucane was largely interested in the latter company, and in 1904 he and the defendant Eugene Satterlee (now deceased) appear to have formed a scheme to unite the interests of the Stromberg-Carlson Company with a number of telephone operating companies, for the purpose of establishing an independent system to compete with the so-called Bell companies, particularly in the city of New York. With the assistance of Mr. William H. Page, of New York, a lawyer, a syndicate agreement was prepared to carry this design into effect. The plaintiff was not able to procure this agreement or a copy of it to introduce into evidence upon the trial. The original appears to have been kept by Mr. Page, who was not a witness. It was clearly proved, however, that the appellants became parties to this agreement, and that most, if not all, of them, actually signed it. Sibley admits subscribing $50,000 to the syndicate. Strong admits that he subscribed $25,000 through Fenn. Eastman admits subscribing $25,000, although he remembers no paper, and Watson admits subscribing $50,000. Further proof justified the inference that the defendants Sibley, Strong, Eastman, and Watson entered into this undertaking for the establishment of an independent telephone system, for purposes of individual profit, irrespective of any relation they might assume as directors of such corporation or corporations as might be contemplated by Mr. Finucane and Mr. Page as necessary or appropriate agencies in carrying out the scheme, these two gentlemen and Fenn, the common agent, being largely trusted to devise and carry out the details of the enterprise. Messrs. Sibley, Strong, Eastman, and Watson, as their own testimony indicated, were quite indifferent as to the methods to be pursued. They confided in the others and contributed their money liberally, apparently convinced that the investment would yield large returns.

If Fenn was the agent of these defendants as members of such syndicate, his acts in furtherance of the enterprise and all that he did in reference to the prospectus must be deemed binding upon them.

The promoter of a company, whether he be a director or not, who knowingly issues or sanctions the circulation of a false prospectus, containing untrue statements of material facts naturally tending to mislead and to induce the public to purchase its stock or other securities, is unquestionably responsible to those who are injured thereby. Morgan v. Skiddy, 62 N. Y. 319, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 74.

Where there are a number of such promoters, all the coadventurers are liable in damages for the fraud of an agent employed by them to effect the sale of the corporate securities, without reference to their own moral guilt or innocence. Hornblower v. Crandall, 7 Mo. App. 220, affirmed in 78 Mo. 581. In the case cited it was said that, where an associate in such an enterprise abstains from knowing, and leaves the details to his companions, while the illicit gains go to the common accounts, his ignorance ought not to avail him. "The law would be helpless if its obligations could be avoided by this convenient ignorance. Where the parties sought to be charged might have known, and where it can fairly be inferred that they with the wrongdoers received the benefit of the contrivance, their ignorance cannot avail them."

The appellants, however, contend that Fenn, instead of acting for the individual members of the syndicate, was solely the agent of the United States Independent Telephone Company, and, this being so, that they cannot be held liable for his fraudulent misrepresentations, inasmuch as they were merely directors of that corporation. They invoke the doctrine that the mere fact of being a director is not per se sufficient to render a party liable for the fraud and misrepresentation of the active managers of a corporation, or the fraudulent representations of an agent employed to market its stock. Arthur v. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Griswold, 55 N. Y. 400, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 46. This contention is the foundation of the first legal proposition argued in their behalf, namely, that it was error to refuse to charge the jury that "if Mr. Fenn was selling bonds for the United States Independent Telephone Company, and not for the syndicate, then he was not the agent for the individual directors of the company, and they in that relation only would be liable for personal misconduct." The answer to this proposition is that the rule thus limiting the liability of directors of a corporation to cases where they are chargeable with some personal knowledge of the act claimed to be fraudulent has no application here, because the evidence did not permit an inference that Fenn in issuing the prospectus was the agent of the United States Independent Telephone Company, rather than the agent of the appellants as members of the syndicate. Upon all the proof in the case as it stood at the end of the trial, the jury would not have been justified in making the desired distinction between the acts of the appellants as directors of that company, and their acts as individuals. As has already been suggested, their own testimony showed that they were promoters, and that whatever functions they assumed, whether as directors or otherwise, were in furtherance of a common enterprise to market the securities of such corporations as might be formed to introduce and operate an independent telephone system in New York.

The appellants complain of four alleged errors in submitting to the jury questions as to the truth or falsity of statements contained in the prospectus:

(1) It is contended that it was error to leave to the jury any question respecting the statements of the prospectus relating to the New York Independent Telephone Company. This was one of the corporations in which the United States Independent Telephone Company had acquired a majority of the stock, and it was the franchise of this corporation which was held out as the basis of the entire independent telephone scheme. "This company," said the prospectus, "is incorporated under the laws of the state of New York, with an authorized capital of $50,000,000. It owns a franchise in the city of New York acquired under the advice of eminent counsel, under which it is its purpose to begin as soon as practicable, and in the near future, the construction of an independent telephone system in that city." This so-called franchise had undergone several transfers. It was originally granted in 1894 by the board of electrical control in the city of New York, to a corporation known as the Mercantile Electric Company, and the only business which had ever been done thereunder was the maintenance and operation of a burglar alarm system in a portion of the financial district about Wall street. In 1905 the Mercantile Electric Company was merged with the New York Independent Telephone Company, which acquired all of its capital stock, amounting at par to $5,000. This stock had been purchased by the promoters for $250,000, and by them turned over to the New York Independent Telephone Company for $41,000,000 of its stock. At the time when the prospectus was prepared and published, no permit had been granted by the municipal authorities to the Mercantile Electric Company or its corporate successors in interest for any extension of its lines, and they could not lawfully be extended without such permit. Legal advice of capable counsel had been taken by the promoters as to the validity and sufficiency of the alleged franchise, and the opinions obtained from them, which appear in the record, show that the question was at least doubtful. Their attention had been expressly called to a recent decision by the appellate division in the first department, holding that, before a franchise became effective for any purpose, the consent of the common council of the municipality must first be obtained. West Side Electric Co. v. Consolidated Tel. & Electrical Subway Co. 110 App. Div. 171, 96 N. Y. Supp. 609. The representation in the prospectus was unequivocal. It plainly imported the ownership of a franchise which could be exercised without encountering any legal obstacle whatever. The New York Independent Telephone Company did not own such a franchise, and the authors of the prospectus are chargeable with knowledge that such was the fact. Where a prospectus is circulated as an inducement to take stock in a corporate enterprise, the language of the prospectus is to be interpreted by the effect which it would produce upon an ordinary mind. Wiser v. Lawler, 189 U. S. 260, 261, 47 L. ed. 802, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 624, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 630. The same case is authority for the proposition that, in estimating the probability of subscribers being misled by a prospectus, the court may take into consideration not only the facts stated therein, but the facts suppressed. In Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310, 49 L.R.A. 725, 57 N. E. 656, it was held that the promoters of a corporation were guilty of a fraud in issuing a prospectus to the public inviting subscriptions to the stock, without disclosing the fact that they had caused to be issued to themselves, for their services as promoters, one third of the whole capital stock by way of remuneration. Here it is obvious that, if the facts which have been stated in regard to the limited use to which the franchise had been put by the original grantees, for burglar alarm purposes only, had been set forth in the prospectus, together with the discrepancy between the cost of the franchise to the promoters and the amount of stock issued therefor, no careful investor would have been induced to put any money into bonds based on such a foundation.

(2) The prospectus stated that "413,030 shares of the capital stock of the United States Independent Telephone Company have been issued or are contracted to be issued." The appellants insist that it was error to submit to the jury the question whether this statement was fraudulent or not. There was abundant evidence to make this an issue for the jury. The statement conveyed the idea that the stock had been issued or contracted to be issued for money or property its equivalent in value. Of course, the so-called franchise is to be included in the property; but the disparity between the $250,000 at which the franchise was purchased from the Mercantile Electric Company, and the $41,000,000 of stock which the New York Independent Telephone Company issued on account thereof, was so great as of itself to warrant an inference of fraud. See Boyn-ton v. Andrews, 63 N. Y. 93.

(3) There is no sufficient foundation for the complaint that it was error to allow the jury to pass upon the character of the representations in the prospectus with reference to the amount of dividends paid by the Stromberg-Carlson Telephone Manufacturing Company. A declaration that dividends have been paid imports that they have been earned, and the testimony of Mr. Finucane, the treasurer and general manager, showed clearly that these dividends or some of them had not been earned in fact.

(4) In speaking of the bonds which it was the purpose of the prospectus to induce the public to buy, the prospectus contained a statement that $17,000,000 were to be issued immediately, and the balance of $8,000,000 was to be held in escrow by the trustees. It continued: "Such $17,000,000 of bonds are to be issued pursuant to contracts already made by the company and binding on it, and as a result of the performance of said contracts, the company will have $5,000,000 cash in its treasury in addition to the securities pledged under the mortgage." The truth or falsity of this statement depends on what it means. The appellants contend that it does not mean to convey the idea that contracts had already been made which obligated anybody to purchase the bonds, but only that contracts had been made binding the company to sell. On the other hand, the respondent insists that it plainly implies the existence of bilateral contracts enforceable at the instance of the corporation, and therefore practically certain to insure the receipt of $5,000,000 in cash by the treasury. In answer to a specific question on this branch of the case, the jury found that the language of this part of the prospectus fairly meant that contracts had been made which were mutually binding upon both parties, and when performed the company would have $5,000,000 in the treasury; and, in answer to another question, they found further that the prospectus was falsely worded so as to represent that the contract for the sale of the bonds was bilateral, when the contract with Mr. Fenn did not bind him to take the bonds. The evidence amply warranted these findings. Speaking of an equivocal prospectus which was condemned as fraudulent by the House of Lords in Aaron's Reefs v. Twiss, [1896] A. C. 273, 285, Lord Halsbury calls the language "ambidextrous;" and this expression aptly characterizes that in the present case. In the case cited it was argued, as it is suggested here, that there was no specific allegation of fact which is proved to be false; but the lord chancellor protested against this being regarded as the true test, and declared that the question was whether, taking the whole thing together, was there a false representation. "I do not care by what means it is conveyed,—by what trick or device or ambiguous language. All those are expedients by which fraudulent people seem to think they can escape from the real substance of the transaction. If by a number of statements you intentionally give a false impression, and induce a person to act upon it, it is not the less false, although, if one takes each statement by itself, there may be a difficulty in showing that any specific statement is untrue." The general reader would almost inevitably infer from this assertion in the prospectus that the United States Independent Telephone Company was a party to contracts with solvent purchasers, which would enable it, within a reasonable time, to realize $5,000,000 in cash, and the proof shows that nothing could have been further from the truth.

The prospectus was prepared by Mr. Page and issued by Fenn, who conducted the sale of the bonds thereunder. Fenn died before the trial, and the defendants did not call Mr. Page as a witness. Nevertheless, it is argued in their behalf that it was essential for the plaintiff to show fraudulent conduct on the part of these persons, and that his failure to do so was fatal to the plaintiff's cause of action.

It is enough to say as to this proposition, that a fraudulent intent on the part of the author and publisher of the prospectus may be inferred from the falsity of the statements therein contained, and that alone. See Meyer v. Amidon, 23 Hun, 553.

Our attention is called to some alleged errors in rulings on evidence, but we think that such rulings as were incorrect were harmless.

The five defendants claimed to be entitled to six peremptory challenges each, but the court allowed only six peremptory challenges in all, treating the defendants collectively as but one party, within the meaning of § 1176 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that upon a trial of an issue of fact joined in a civil action in a court of record, each party may peremptorily challenge not more than six. The question does not appear to have been considered in any reported case in this state. Numerous authorities from other states are cited in the briefs of counsel, but they are only relevant where statutes exist similar in phraseology to our own; that is to say, where a given number of peremptory challenges is allowed to each party. Such is the statute in Illinois in force since the year 1827, and "during all that time it has been the general practice, and so understood by the entire profession, that each side to the case, without reference to the number of persons in each, in all civil cases, have but three peremptory challenges." Schmidt v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 83 Ill. 405. The appellants rely upon Hundhausen v. Atkins, 36 Wis. 518, where the court was called upon to construe a statute regulating peremptory challenges, which provided that in civil causes each party should be entitled to three. The defendants had appeared by different attorneys and severed their defenses, and the court held that, inasmuch as their defenses were essentially different, and each had a distinct issue to maintain, each was to be considered a party, within the meaning of the statute. The court, however, added this qualification: "Undoubtedly when several defendants in a civil action join in their defense, or severing in their answers set out but one defense common to them all, they constitute one party, limited to the statutory number of challenges given to a party as ruled in this cause in the court below. In such a case they might and perhaps ought to join in one answer setting up the common defense; and they should not be permitted to gain additional challenges by the mere act of severing in their pleadings. They have a community of interests, and should be left to a community of challenges." Such is the case here. The defendants had a common interest, their answers were substantially identical, and the defense was conducted in the common interest of all. Under the circumstances,—whatever might be the rule if different defenses, possibly antagonistic to one another, had been interposed,—the defendants were properly treated as only one party, within the meaning of § 1176 of the Code.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Hiscock, J., dissents because of error committed by the court in refusing to charge as requested by the defendants, that "if Mr. Fenn was selling the bonds for the United States Independent Telephone Company, and not for the syndicate, then he was not the agent of the individual directors of the company, and they in that relation only would be liable for personal conduct."

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

OLD DOMINION COPPER MINING & SMELTING COMPANY

v.

ALBERT S. BIGELOW.

(203 Mass. 159, 89 N. E. 193.)

Appeal—findings—equity case.

1. Where the evidence in an equity proceeding is partly oral, the findings of fact of the single justice will not be disturbed by the law court unless plainly wrong.

Trial—evidence—weight—finding.

2. A trial court cannot be said to be plainly wrong in its determination that stock of a corporation was intended to be issued directly to the general public subscribing therefor, and not to the promoters to be sold to the subscribers, where such intention appears from the contemporaneous acts, entries, and other writings with their natural inferences, although it is opposed to the oral testimony of the promoters.

Corporation—property—subscription—value.

3. The value of a mine which is turned into a corporation organized to operate it in consideration for its stock may be determined from what its former owners sold it for, where they were men of large business operations, not unaccustomed to mining, and were under no compulsion to sell.

Conflict of laws—corporation—stock subscription—consummation.

4. The liability of promoters to the corporation, for transferring property at a fictitious value to it in exchange for stock, is to be determined by the law of the place where the agreements were to be carried out, the deeds delivered, the stock issued, and the corporation to have its principal place of business, although the vote authorizing the purchase of the property from the promoters in exchange for stock was passed in another state.

Appeal—foreign law—finding—conclusiveness.

5. A finding by a single justice that the law of a foreign state is the same as the local law, which is founded entirely upon decisions of the courts of such state, creates no presumption in its favor when it is reviewed by the law court.

Same—Federal decision.

6. The decision of a Federal court sitting in a state on a matter of general law is not evidence of what the law of that state is.

Corporation—promoter—liability—ratification of acts.

7. That, at the time of the sale by promoters of property to a corporation organized to purchase it, they are the owners of all the stock which has been issued, no issue having been made of that intended for the public, or that a ratification of the purchase is secured, does not, if at the time of the ratification a substantial portion of the stock intended for

Note.—The decision in the above reported case, as to the effect of the New York judgment under the "full faith and credit" provision of the Federal Constitution, was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court on writ of error. 225 U. S. 111, 56 L. ed. 1009, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 641.

the public remains unissued, avoid the operation of the rule that promoters who organize a corporation to purchase property from them for stock the par value of which is largely in excess of the value of the property, and as part of the scheme sell to the general public as original subscribers a portion of the stock for cash at par, to secure a working capital, without providing an independent board of officers to pass upon the wisdom of the purchase, having the purchase ratified by such board, or disclosing their extraordinary profit to purchasers of stock, are liable to account to the corporation for the profit of the proceeding.

Same — ratification by promoters — effect.

8. A promoter of a corporation who has wrongfully sold property to it at an undue profit cannot avoid repayment to the corporation of the profit so secured, on the ground that it will result in a benefit to the stock taken by himself and his co-promoters, who have ratified the act, and whose stock is all but a small part of that issued.

Same — secret dealings — illegality.

9. The law will not approve a transaction by which property is purchased by a promoter of a corporation with money solicited in substantial part from associates by representations that he intends to form a corporation with a specified capitalization, and sell the property to it for a certain amount of stock, followed by its actual sale to the corporation for a much larger amount, the settlement with the associates at the price agreed upon, and the retention by the promoter of the difference as a secret profit, and taking cash subscriptions from the general public, who understand that the corporation is organized under a statute which requires property to be taken for stock only at its true value.

Conflict of laws — Federal decisions.

10. The mere contrary conclusion reached by the Supreme Court of the United States upon a similar state of facts is not alone a sufficient consideration for a state court's overruling one of its own decisions.

Corporation — purchase from promoter — knowledge.

11. The knowledge of promoters of a corporation, who own all its issued stock, when they ratify the purchase by the corporation from them, of the details of the purchase, does not bind the corporation.

Same — promoters' syndicate — rights.

12. Persons joining a syndicate to purchase property for sale to a corporation whose organization for its purchase is under contemplation, with the understanding that the property is to be sold at a certain profit in stock of the corporation, are, as stockholders of the new corporation, entitled to a disclosure, if the promoter actually turns the property over at greater profit, for an increased portion of the corporate stock.

Same — corporate rights — stockholder's combination.

13. The right of a corporation to compel a repayment of illegal promoters' profits for the benefit of all its stockholders is not defeated by the fact that, after the suit was instituted, certain of the stockholders entered into an illegal agreement as to the disposition of the proceeds of the suit.

Same — laches — means of knowledge.

14. There is no laches on the part of a corporation in failing to take steps to compel an accounting for illegal promoters' profits, until they release their absolute control of its affairs, so that it can secure a knowledge of the facts.

Same — limitation of actions — concealment.

15. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against the liability of a promoter of a corporation, to account to the corporation for illegal profits, so long as he remains absolutely in control of the corporate affairs, so that the fact of his breach of trust cannot be discovered.

Promoter — joint wrongdoer — liability.

16. One of two promoters of a corporation, who by joint acts secure an illegal profit in the sale of property to it, is liable in solido for the profits so secured, regardless of the division which they may have made between themselves.

Corporation — promoter's profit — recovery.

17. The remedy of a corporation whose promoter has taken an illegal secret profit in a sale of property to it is not limited to a rescission of the transaction, but it may compel a return of it to the corporation.

Damages — measure — promoters' profits.

18. In case a promoter owns property before he undertakes the organization of a corporation to purchase it, the amount which the corporation can recover for secret profits secured by him in the sale is not measured by the difference between what the property originally cost him, and the market value of the stock received by him; nor between the intrinsic value of the property and that of the stock, but by the difference between the market value of the property and that of the stock.

Pleading — supplemental answer — post litem decree.

19. It is not an abuse of discretion for a trial judge to permit the filing of a supplemental answer after a hearing on the merits, which sets up a decree of a court of last resort in another state claimed to be res judicata of the matter in controversy, although the decree of the lower court, which was affirmed by the decree sought to be set up, had been entered before such hearing.

Judgment — res judicata — demurrer.

20. A decree on demurrer may, under proper circumstances, be a bar to another suit, as well as one founded on a hearing of evidence.

Same — full faith and credit — privies.

21. The full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution does not require the courts of a state in which a party is domiciled to follow the rule of the courts of another state within whose jurisdiction a decree was entered in favor of one having a common interest with him, in a suit to which he was not a party, in determining whether or not he was a privy because he assisted in the defense of the suit, so as to be entitled to the benefit of it as res judicata in a subsequent proceeding against him at his domicile.

Same — joint wrongdoer.

22. One of two promoters who take a wrongful secret profit in the sale of the property to a corporation organized by them to purchase it is not a privy to a suit against the executors of the other in another state, to rescind the contract and recover the price, to which he was not made a party, and in which he was not served with process, and did not appear, so as to be entitled to set up the judgment against the corporation in bar of a suit against him at his domicile for the same cause of action, although he assisted through counsel in the defense of the foreign suit.

Recovery — joint wrongdoer.

23. Pursuing one joint tortfeasor will not prevent a subsequent suit against the other on the theory of election.

Injunction — interference with suit.

24. The courts of one state in which a litigation has progressed to a final decree, from which an appeal has been taken, may enjoin the defeated party from maintaining a suit in another state, to enjoin his adversary from proceeding with the prosecution of the cause.

CROSS APPEALS from decrees of the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County in plaintiff's favor in suits to recover secret profits made by promoters of the plaintiff corporation in the sale of their own property to the plaintiff; plaintiff appealing from the amounts given them by the decree; and defendant appealing from the decree holding him liable. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward F. McClennen, with Messrs. Brandeis, Dunbar, & Nutter, for complainant:

It is not a defense to a promoter that he caused the corporation to vote to acquire the property from him before the remainder of the organization was completed by obtaining the subscription to the balance of the original issue of capital stock.

The decree in favor of Lewisohn's executors is not a defense to Bigelow.

Hewlett v. Wood, 67 N. Y. 394.

The dismissal of a suit is not a bar to a second suit, unless it appears from the judgment roll itself that the judgment was upon the merits.

Genet v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 170 N. Y. 278, 63 N. E. 350, 163 N. Y. 173, 57 N. E. 297; New York Code, § 1209.

The Lewisohn judgment is not binding in Massachusetts.

Board of Public Works v. Columbia College, 17 Wall. 521, 21 L. ed. 687; Hall v. Lanning, 91 U. S. 160, 23 L. ed. 271; D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648; *Phelps v. Dec. 587; Looney v. Reeves, 5 Kan. App. 279, 48 Pac. 606; Middlesex Bank v. Butman, 29 Me. 19.

By the law of Massachusetts, the decree in favor of Lewisohn's executors does not affect Bigelow.

Such judgment is not an estoppel in favor of the other person, when sued by the same person for the same act or transaction.

Sprague v. Waite, 19 Pick. 455; Lansing v. Montgomery, 2 Johns. 382; Marsh v. Berry, 7 Cow. 344; Moore v. Tracy, 7 Wend. 229; Gittleman v. Feltman, 122 App. Div. 385, 106 N. Y. Irwin*, 18 Pick. 108.

Conversely, a judgment against one of two persons liable jointly and severally is not an estoppel against the other.

Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 35; Bigelow, Estoppels, 5th ed. 112; Booth v. Powers, 56 N. Y. 22; Bath Gaslight Co. v. Rowland, 178 N. Y. 631, 71 N. E. 1127, 84 App. Div. 563, 82 N. Y. Supp. 841; McLelland v. Ridgeway, 12 Ala. 482; Buckingham v. Ludlum, 37 N. J. Eq. 137; Sturges v. Beach, 1 Conn. 507; Moore's Appeal, 34 Pa. 411; Runkel v. Phillips, 9 Phila. 619; Marr v. Southwick, 2 Port. (Ala.) 351; Fletcher v. Jackson, 23 Vt. 581, 56 Am. Dec. 98; Board of Public Works v. Columbia College, 17 Wall. 521, 21 L. ed. 687; Hall v. Lanning, 91 U. S. 160, 23 L. ed. 271; D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 105, 13 L. ed. 648; State Bank v. Robinson, 13 Ark. 214; Leake & W. Orphan House v. Lawrence, 11 Paige, 80.

A stranger to a judgment cannot take advantage of it.

Brower v. Bowers, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 214; Shipman v. Fanshaw, 15 Abb. N. C. 288; Wallace v. Straus, 113 N. Y. 238, 21 N. E. 66; Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 155, 30 L. ed. 620, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 472.

Bigelow was not a proper party to the suit against Lewisohn in the sense that Bigelow or Lewisohn could have insisted that he be made a party.

Chapman v. Forbes, 123 N. Y. 532, 26 N. E. 3; Jackson ex dem. Hogarth v. Nelson, 6 Cow. 248; St. John v. Andrews Institute, 192 N. Y. 382, 85 N. E. 143; Jackson v. Griswold, 4 Hill, 522; Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 35; Park v. Ensign, 66 Kan. 50, 97 Am. St. Rep. 352, 71 Pac. 230; McConnell v. Poor, 113 Iowa, 133, 52 L.R.A. 312, 84 N. W. 968; Fletcher v. Jackson, 23 Vt. 581, 56 Am. The result is not changed by any participation of Bigelow in the defense of the suit against Lewisohn, or any knowledge thereof on the part of the plaintiff.

Andrews v. National Foundry & Pipe Works, 36 L.R.A. 139, 22 C. C. A. 110, 46 U. S. App. 281, 76 Fed. 166; Lane v. Welds, 39 C. C. A. 528, 99 Fed. 286; Cramer v. Singer Mfg. Co. 35 C. C. 43 N. W. 792; 2 Van Fleet, Prior Adjudication, § 523; 2 Black, Judgm. § 540.

Control of the suit by the person participating is necessary in order to make a judgment binding as an estoppel as to him.

Wilgus v. Germain, 19 C. C. A. 188, 44 U. S. App. 369, 72 Fed. 773; Burr v. Bigler, 16 Abb. Pr. 177; Mankato v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 73 C. C. A. 439, 142 Fed. 329; Rumford Chemical Works v. Hygienic Chemical Co. 148 Fed. 862; Wilkie v. Howe, 27 Kan. 518; 2 Black, Judgm. § 540.

An interest of the participant's own in the event of the suit is necessary to make the judgment an estoppel as to him.

2 Black, Judgm. § 540.

Participation for the purpose of obtaining a favorable precedent upon a similar state of facts, or upon an identical state of facts, does not of itself render the judgment binding as to the participant.

Rugg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are suits in equity, by which the plaintiff seeks to recover secret profits made by the defendant as one of its organizers, in selling to it, while under the absolute control and management of himself and his associate, one Lewisohn, certain mining properties belonging to him and Lewisohn. The allegations of the bills are set out at length in 188 Mass. 315, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 653, where one of the cases was considered upon demurrer. After the overruling of the demurrer the defendant answered, and the cases were heard before a single justice who entered decrees in favor of the plaintiff in both cases, and filed a report of the facts found by him. Except as to matters immaterial so far as the questions of law are involved, he found that the allegations were sustained. Briefly recapitulated, the facts appearing in the report upon which the plaintiff rests its claim are that in April, 1895, the defendant and Lewisohn formed a device to secure the control of the stock (the par value of which was \$500,000) of the Old Dominion Copper Company of Baltimore City, called the "Baltimore company," and the title to certain other neighboring mining properties, called the outside properties, and to cause these properties and the real estate of the Baltimore company to be transferred to a new corporation (which they should procure to be organized with a much larger capital), for an increased price. Options were secured upon these properties, and the price agreed to be paid by the defendant and Lewisohn to the owners was \$1,000,000, divided in the proportion of $\frac{547}{1000}$ by the defendant, and $\frac{453}{1000}$ by Lewisohn. The outside properties were regarded by all parties as of little or no value, and were thrown in as a makeweight in the purchase of the stock of the Baltimore company. The single justice, while finding that they could not be said to be of no value, was satisfied that their value did not exceed \$50,000. No examination to ascertain their value was made by the defendant or Lewisohn, or by anyone in behalf of the plaintiff. For the purpose of providing himself with funds to meet in part his financial obligations for the purchase of the properties, the defendant, before taking up the options, organized an underwriting syndicate and another syndicate called the "Old Dominion Syndicate." It is not necessary to state the details of these arrangements, further than to say that it is found as a fact that the defendant did not deal fairly with the members of the syndicate in the division of his profits, and did not disclose to the great majority of them the fact of the secret profit. The obligation of purchase was assumed wholly by the defendant and Lewisohn, and the device for the organization of the new corporation was entirely theirs.

Although, as first conceived, it was the avowed intention of the defendant and Lewisohn (which the defendant expressed to various members of the syndicate) to form a new corporation with a capital stock of $2,500,000, which should take the property of the Baltimore company and the outside properties for $2,000,000 of its capital stock, and procure a working capital of $500,000 by the sale of the rest of the capital stock to the public for cash at par, they proceeded to organize the plaintiff corporation under the laws of New Jersey, with a capital stock of $3,750,000, divided into 150,000 shares of the par value of $25 each. But it was the intention of the defendant and Lewisohn (as found by the single justice) that "20,000 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff should be issued to new subscribers at par; and this was done in the summer and fall of 1895." This organization was conducted and controlled wholly by the defendant and Lewisohn, through themselves and their agents and representatives. Without providing the plaintiff with an independent board of officers or representatives, they, as the responsible and only managers of the plaintiff, acting in its name, contracted with themselves as mine owners to sell to it the real estate of the Baltimore company, for $2,500,000 of the capital stock of the plaintiff, and the outside properties, of trifling value at best, for $750,000 of such capital stock, and to sell to the general public for working capital the remaining $500,000 of capital stock of the plaintiff at par, without disclosing that they had sold property costing them only $1,000,000 for three and a quarter times its cost.

The first meeting of the stockholders was held on July 7, 1895, at which $1,000—the lowest amount of capital with which a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey could begin business—was paid in by Lewisohn. This money, although deposited to the credit of the plaintiff company upon its organization, was afterwards returned by it to Lewisohn in an accounting with him. A meeting of the directors was held in New York on July 11, 1895, at which the defendant became a director and the president of the plaintiff, and Lewisohn a director. Votes were passed to increase the capital stock, and two separate votes for the purchase of the mining properties for the prices in stock before indicated. The stock, the market value of which was fully as great as its par value, was issued to the defendant and Lewisohn and one Dumaresq, their nominee, by votes of September 18, 1895, on that or the following day. At the same time a certificate for the remaining 20,000 shares of stock of the par value of $500,000 was made out in the name of "Thomas Nelson, treasurer," but this stock is found to have belonged to the corporation, and Nelson had no right to act respecting it, as it was taken up by direct subscriptions of the public. The conveyances of the mines by the Baltimore company, and of the outside properties by Lewisohn, were not made until December, 1895, or January, 1896. The intrinsic value of the property conveyed by the Baltimore company is found to have been not more than $1,000,000, although its market value, largely due to the skilful manipulation of the defendant and Lewisohn, and "the ingenious manner in which they created a desire on the part of men interested in mines as investors or speculators, to be allowed to join in the transaction they were carrying out," was something less than $2,000,000. The report proceeds:

"But taking the most favorable view of the situation possible for the defendant, he and Lewisohn did, by reason of their failure to disclose the real facts as aforesaid, make out of their sale to the plaintiff company a secret profit of 50,000 shares of its capital stock, of which the defendant's portion was 27,350 shares, and Lewisohn's portion was 22,650 shares. If he had fully disclosed the facts to the plaintiff company, and secured for it independent advice, it would not have given to him this secret profit. . . . Lewisohn and he were acting in the formation and execution of the scheme together and in concert. Each of them was doing his part to carry out a joint scheme which was intended to inure to the advantage of both. The control exercised by them over the plaintiff company was a joint control, and was exercised by them for the benefit of both. A proper disclosure of the real facts by either would have frustrated the schemes of both. They both acted together in pursuance of a common design, and for the profit of both." "During all these transactions the full control of the plaintiff company was in the hands of and was exercised by the defendant and Lewisohn, who were its promoters, and who themselves determined upon and dictated, under the advice of their counsel, everything that was done by the plaintiff company or in its behalf. It had no directors, representatives, or advisers other than themselves or their agents, and they did not disclose to it any of the facts which have been stated. This continued to be the case until April, 1902.

. . . The result of his and Lewisohn's transactions with the plaintiff company was that, for the $1,000,000 of their own and their associates' money which they invested, they received, subject to the payment of legitimate expenses of not over $20,000, stock to the par value of $3,250,000 and of the actual value of at least that amount; that is, at the rate of more than three dollars for one. He gave to the members of his syndicate two dollars for one, either wholly in stock, or half in cash and half in stock, as they elected. With a few individual exceptions he did not disclose the facts to them. The very great majority of the members of his syndicate did not become aware of the details of what he and Lewisohn had done."

The capital stock issued to defendant and Lewisohn was stamped "issued for property purchased." The law of New Jersey required that such stock be issued only "to the amount of the value" of the property so purchased. Pub. Laws of New Jersey, 1889, p. 414, § 4; 1893, p. 444, § 2. The vote of July 11, 1895, to purchase the mining properties, was in fact passed by a majority only of the board of directors, for three do not appear to have been present at that time. At the directors' meeting of September 18, 1895, when the votes to issue $30,000 full-paid shares to defendant and Lewisohn, and 100,000 like shares to their nominee, Dumaresq, were passed, seven directors were present, the five aside from Bigelow and Lewisohn being their tools, and at the end of the record of that meeting all the directors signed an assent to the acts done; and Bigelow and Lewisohn, signing for 30,000 shares of the capital stock, Dumaresq, signing for 100,000 shares of the capital stock, and "Thomas Nelson, treasurer," signing for 20,000 shares of capital stock, being the whole number of shares, signified a written approval of the acts of that meeting. The single justice found that the 20,000 shares were the property of the plaintiff, and that Nelson had no right to attempt to act as their holder.

1. The defendant strenuously contends that certain facts found by the single justice are not supported by the evidence. He first attacks the finding, vital to the plaintiff's case, that the scheme of the defendant and Lewisohn, as framed and executed, contemplated that 20,000 shares of stock in the plaintiff corporation should be issued to new subscribers at par; and that the defendant and Lewisohn did not agree to take all the stock in the plaintiff corporation in return for the mining properties conveyed to it, and $500,000 in cash for a working capital. He argues that the evidence required a finding that Bigelow and Lewisohn agreed, as a part of their scheme, to take all the capital stock in return for the mines and $500,000 in cash. He also assails the findings that the property conveyed to the plaintiff by the defendant and Lewisohn, for 130,000 of its shares of a par value of $3,250,000, was worth intrinsically not more than $1,000,000, and that its market value, due to the skillful manipulation of the defendant and Lewisohn and their ingenious baiting of the stock market, was less than $2,000,000; and he contends that the evidence demonstrates the truth to be that the plaintiff paid no more than it was worth.

The evidence was oral, documentary, and in depositions. The rule of practice respecting such a contention as this has been often declared. In an appeal in equity from a final decree, where all the testimony is reported, it is the duty of the appellate court to examine the evidence and decide the case on its merits, both as to the facts and the law; but where the evidence upon disputed issues is partly oral, the findings of fact of a single justice will not be disturbed unless plainly wrong. Jennings v. Vahey, 183 Mass. 47, 97 Am. St. Rep. 409, 66 N. E. 598; Lindsay v. Bird, 193 Mass. 200, 79 N. E. 263. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the evidence upon this point somewhat in detail.

The offers of the Baltimore company for the sale of its property to the plaintiff, and of Lewisohn for the sale of the outside properties, were in writing, and the votes of the plaintiff accepting them were spread upon the records of the directors' meeting of July 11, 1895. These provided distinctly for the issue of 130,000 shares of the plaintiff's capital stock in payment for these conveyances. The records of the plaintiff show no vote touching the issue of the remaining 20,000 shares. If, as claimed by the defendant, it was then contemplated that these shares should be issued to him and Lewisohn at par for cash, it seems probable that a vote to this effect would then have been passed. The only vote respecting the issue of these remaining shares was that of the directors on September 18, 1895, when, after a vote authorizing the issue of a certificate for 100,000 shares to Dumaresq (who was the nominee of Bigelow and Lewisohn), and another for 30,000 shares to Bigelow and Lewisohn, it was voted that the treasurer of the company be "instructed to issue 20,000 shares . . . to such parties as have subscribed for the same." If it was then understood that Bigelow and Lewisohn had agreed to take all the shares, including the 20,000, for cash at par, and were the subscribers therefor, no sufficient reason appears for not saying so in the vote, instead of adopting a phrase suited to express an intent to issue the shares to the general public. Moreover, at this time, as shown by the only subscription list of the plaintiff, the general public had subscribed generously for stock. The language of the vote aptly refers to such subscribers. The only paper which appears by the evidence to have been signed by subscribers for stock was dated July 18, 1895, two months before the vote to issue the 20,000 shares was passed. The certificate for the 20,000 shares was issued in the name of "Thomas Nelson, treasurer," he being the treasurer of the plaintiff.

It is ingeniously argued that in this matter Nelson was acting as the treasurer of those who had become subscribers to stock, and not as treasurer of the plaintiff. But he treated their payments as if made to the treasurer of the plaintiff. If this certificate had been in truth issued to the nominee of Bigelow and Lewisohn, in return for their obligation to pay cash for its face value, naturally it would have been issued without any official title attached, as was that to their nominee, Dumaresq. It is a significant coincidence that the form of certificate selected was the same which, in other companies controlled by the defendant, was used when stock was in fact treasury stock. This certificate was subdivided in the autumn of 1895, and 19,650 shares were issued to various subscribers, who paid for them directly to the plaintiff, and not to Bigelow or Lewisohn. The remaining 350 shares, although subscribed for, were not taken by subscribers. They were not taken or paid for by Bigelow or Lewisohn, but about two years later were sold by direction of Nelson, who was still the treasurer of the plaintiff, through brokers, and their face value credited on the plaintiff's books to treasury stock, and the excess above par for which they were sold to the interest account. This sum does not appear to have been the equivalent of interest due from the defendant, and which should have been paid if he originally subscribed for the shares, and his name does not appear in connection with them on the plaintiff's books. The transaction respecting the subdivision of this certificate was conducted in substance on the footing of original subscribers, and not of purchasers from Bigelow. The names of those to whom the shares were issued appear upon the "corrected list" of the plaintiff, which was its only record of subscription, and in which the shares taken by each are described as "allotments." If they were subscribers to the defendant and Lewisohn merely for stock held by them, there was no reason why their names should appear on the plaintiff's subscription list. Notices were sent to these subscribers by the treasurer of the plaintiff, and not by Bigelow, and checks were returned payable to the order of the treasurer, and were deposited directly to the credit of the plaintiff, although notices and subscriptions to the syndicate formed by Bigelow to aid him in furnishing the purchase price were sent by and returned to Bigelow. Various written statements of Bigelow, as for instance that they proposed "to open the bag just a little to the public," and that the public were "starving" for the shares, appear inconsistent with the theory that he and Lewisohn were the subscribers for the entire capital stock. These and other circumstances are sufficient to warrant the finding of the single justice. Apparently he credited contemporaneous acts, entries, and other writings with their natural inferences, rather than the direct oral and other testimony to the contrary given at the trial. It cannot be said that in this he was plainly wrong.

The finding as to the value of the property conveyed by the defendant and Lewisohn to the plaintiff is also supported by testimony and cannot be disturbed. The evidence touching this matter came from various sources. The former owners had operated the mine with some degree of success on a capitalization of $500,000. They had greater experience and a more intimate knowledge respecting it than anyone else, and they seemed to have been men accustomed to large business operations, and not unfamiliar with mining. They do not appear to have been under any compulsion to sell. The price for which such owners in fact sold their property might well have been regarded as the best test of its value. But the finding was approximately double this sum. Although other circumstances perhaps might have supported a higher valuation, there is no ground for holding this plainly, or even probably, wrong.

These are the main facts relied upon by the plaintiff. Other findings are controverted by the defendant. Without discussing them in detail, it is enough to say that a careful examination of the voluminous record discloses no reason for doubting their correctness.

2. At the threshold lies the question as to what law determines the character of these transactions and the liability of the defendant therefor. The votes to purchase the real estate of the Baltimore company and the outside properties were passed at a meeting of the plaintiff's board of directors held in New York, but they were not New York contracts in the sense that they are to be governed necessarily by the law of New York. As found by the single justice: "It was the intention of the parties that these agreements should be carried out and consummated by the delivery of the deeds and the issue of certificates of stock in Massachusetts, where it was intended that the offices of the company should be, and where they were established, in Boston, and where, in fact, they were so carried out. It was intended that the business of the company, outside the actual mining and smelting operations, which were to be conducted in Arizona, should be carried on in Massachusetts; and this was done." Where a contract is made with a purpose by the parties to it, that it shall be performed in a particular place, its validity and interpretation are to be determined by the law of the place where it is to be performed. It is made with a view to that law. Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 27 L. ed. 104, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 102; Hall v. Cordell, 142 U. S. 116, 35 L. ed. 956, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 154; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. 65, 10 L. ed. 61; Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery [1894] A. C. 202, 6 Reports, 188, 71 L. T. N. S. 1, 58 J. P. 540; American Malting Co. v. Souther Brewing Co. 194 Mass. 89, 80 N. E. 526. The ruling of the single justice that the transaction is to be determined according to the law of this commonwealth appears to have been right.

But, however that may be, the single justice has found as a fact that the law of New York applicable to the case is the same as that of Massachusetts. The only evidence as to the New York law before the single justice was the following cases, decided by the courts of that state: Blum v. Whitney, 185 N. Y. 232, 77 N. E. 1159; Seymour v. Spring Forest Cemetery Asso. 144 N. Y. 333, 26 L.R.A. 859, 39 N. E. 365; Barr v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 263, 26 N. E. 145; Brewster v. Hatch, 122 N. Y. 349, 19 Am. St. Rep. 498, 25 N. E. 505; Getty v. Devlin, 54 N. Y. 403, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 29; Campbell v. Cypress Hills Cemetery, 41 N. Y. 34; Colton Improv. Co. v. Richter, 26 Misc. 26, 55 N. Y. Supp. 486. And there were also admitted de bene Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn, 79 C. C. A. 534, 148 Fed. 1020, s. c. (C. C.) 136 Fed. 915, and McCracken v. Robison, 6 C. C. A. 400, 14 U. S. App. 602, 57 Fed. 375, decided in the United States circuit court for the district of New York. The defendant's attack upon this finding stands upon a somewhat different basis from that upon the other findings of fact, because this rests wholly upon documentary evidence, and the appellate court stands precisely as did the justice who heard the case, in respect of opportunities to weigh evidence and draw inferences from it. The trial court has not here the advantage of seeing the witnesses and judging of their credibility by personal observation. Hence no special presumption exists in favor of his finding. Harvey-Watts Co. v. Worcester Umbrella Co. 193 Mass. 138, 78 N. E. 886. But the decision must be made upon the evidence which was before the single justice. The cases in the Federal courts are not evidence as to the law of New York, for the reason that, this being a question of general law, the Federal courts declare the law upon their own views, and are not bound by decisions of state courts. Olcott v. Fond Du Lac County, 16 Wall. 678, 689, 21 L. ed. 382, 386; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 33, 34, 27 L. ed. 359, 365, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10; Pleasant Twp. v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 138 U. S. 67, 73, 34 L. ed. 864, 867, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 215. Moreover, the Federal cases cited do not purport to declare what is the law of New York. While none of the decisions of the New York courts is based upon facts precisely like those in the case at bar, Brewster v. Hatch, 122 N. Y. 349, 19 Am. St. Rep. 498, 25 N. E. 505, and Campbell v. Cypress Hills Cemetery, 41 N. Y. 34, are so nearly akin in essential features, and the statement of legal principles in each is such, as to lead to the conclusion that the finding of the single justice was correct.

Blum v. Whitney, 185 N. Y. 232, 77 N. E. 1159, is relied upon by the defendant as announcing a different doctrine; but it does not so appear to us. Several corporations and their officers there joined in a written contract for the formation of a new corporation with a fixed capitalization, and for the transfer of their several properties to it for a definite amount of its stock. The maximum amount that might be paid for the capital stock of a certain other corporation was fixed by implication in the agreement. All the persons contemplated, and none others, became members of the new corporation. These were treated by the court as together constituting the organizers of the corporation. The fact that the maximum price permitted by the agreement was in fact paid for the capital stock of the other corporation, and that a great profit was obtained by some of the organizers, was regarded not as a fraud upon the corporation, but upon the associates in the organization. It was held not to be a case for the application of the law governing promoters. This case cannot be considered as stating a rule in conflict with the finding of the single justice.

In its practical results it is not of much consequence whether the law of the situs, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

either of Massachusetts or New York, or of the forum, governs, for upon this record and the findings before us the law of this commonwealth controls the rights and obligations of the parties.

3. The next inquiry is as to the liability of the defendant. The plaintiff seeks to establish this on the ground that the defendant and Lewisohn framed a scheme which was an entirety, and which as a whole comprised the organization and continued management of the plaintiff by themselves, their agents, and representatives, until the completion of the project. This scheme was the capitalization of the plaintiff for $3,750,000; the sale to it of their property, costing and intrinsically worth $1,000,000, but having in the market a value not over $2,000,000, for $3,250,000; the sale to the general public at par for cash, of the remaining $500,000 of stock; and all this without providing the plaintiff with any independent board of officers or advisors to pass upon the wisdom of the purchase, and without disclosing the substance of the transaction and their extraordinary profit to the purchasers of its stock for cash at par. This scheme was an entity, one part of it was just as essential as any other part, and one part was the procurement of $500,000 in cash from the unenlightened public, as a working capital for the new company.

It has been decided, apparently by a unanimous court, that such a transaction creates a liability on the part of the defendant to account for his profits to the plaintiff in this proceeding. Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310, 49 L.R.A. 725, 57 N. E. 656. One of the present suits was before the court as reported in 188 Mass. 315, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 653, and after an elaborate review of the authorities and examination of the grounds, for judgment, it was held that the defendant was liable, notwithstanding the opposing decision on the precise point by the United States circuit court in Old Dominion Copper Min. Co. v. Lewisohn, 136 Fed. 915. Since the decision reported in 188 Mass. 315, the above-entitled case against Lewisohn has been considered by the United States circuit court of appeals (79 C. C. A. 534, 148 Fed. 1020) and by the supreme Court of the United States (210 U. S. 206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634) and without dissent a conclusion has been reached contrary to that of this court. The deference due to a decision by the highest court in the land, and the intrinsic importance of the question at issue, require a reconsideration of our own cases, a re-examination of the authorities, and a careful consideration of the principles involved.

The plaintiff seeks to recover a secret profit made by the promoters in the sale of their own property to the corporation, basing its claim on the general and well-recognized proposition that a promoter cannot take lawfully a secret profit, and will be held to account for it if he does.¹ Fundamentally the action is to recover profits obtained by a breach of trust. There is a distinct finding by the single justice that the defendant and Lewisohn were the promoters of the plaintiff. This finding is amply justified by the evidence. In their brains it was conceived, by their direction the formalities of its incorporation were carried out, their resources provided its mines, their influence and reputation with those desiring to invest in mines procured its working cash capital. The word "promoter" has no precise and inflexible meaning in this country. In England it is defined by statute. Stat. 7 & 8, Vict. chap. 110, § 3. See also Stat. 30 & 31 Vict. chap. 131, § 38. But even there the duties of promoters as fiduciaries to the company are matters of common-law cognizance. Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218, 1269, 30 L. T. N. S. 269, 27 Week. Rep. 65, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 777. In a comprehensive sense, "promoter" includes those who undertake to form a corporation and to procure for it the rights, instrumentalities, and capital by which it is to carry out the purposes set forth in its charter, and to establish it as fully able to do its business. Their work may begin long before the organization of the corporation, in seeking the opening for a venture and projecting a plan for its development, and it may continue after the incorporation by attracting the investment of capital in its securities, and providing it with the commercial breath of life. It is now established without exception that a promoter stands in a fiduciary relation to the corporation in which he is interested, and that he is charged with all the duties of good faith which attach to other trusts. In this respect he is held to the high standards which bind directors and other persons occupying fiduciary relations.²

That the promoter stands in the relation of a fiduciary to the corporation which he organizes seems to be conceded in Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn, 210 U. S. 206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634. The questions to be answered are whether this rule is applicable, and, if it is, whether the plaintiff is in a position to assert its claim.

Notwithstanding this fiduciary relation, the promoter may sell property to the company which he is promoting. But in order that the contract may be absolutely binding, he must pursue one of four courses: (a) He may provide an independent board of officers in no respect directly or indirectly under his control, and make full disclosure to the corporation through them. (b) He may make a full disclosure of all material facts to each original subscriber of shares in the corporation. (c) He may procure a ratification of the contract after disclosing its circumstances, by vote of the stockholders of the completely established corporation. (d) He may be himself the real subscriber of all the shares of the capital stock contemplated as a part of the promotion scheme. The defendant does not contend upon this report that either of the first two courses was followed. He does rest his claim chiefly upon the third and fourth courses. As applied to the facts of this case these two come to the same thing, for the reason that on the findings of the single justice the defendant and his associate were subscribers for only 130,000 shares out of a total 150,000, and in the light most favorable to them they held all the shares which had been issued at the time of the ratification, but not all which it was proposed to issue as a part of the scheme of promotion. The point to be determined, therefore, is whether the promoter is immune from liability if he and his associates are owners of all the issued stock at the time of the act complained of, although intending as a part of their plan the immediate issue of further stock to the public without disclosure, and whether, while a substantial portion of the stock intended to be issued to the public remains unissued, a vote of ratification of the breach of trust will protect him.

A review of the authorities seems to demonstrate that there is a liability of the promoter to the corporation when further original subscribers to capital stock contemplated as an essential part of the scheme of promotion came in after the transaction complained of, even though that transaction is known to all the then stockholders, that is to say, to the promoters and their representatives.

Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218, 39 L. T. N. S. 269, 27 Week. Rep. 65, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 777, is one of the most important and thoroughly considered cases, and, as it has been said to be a case often misunderstood (Lord Davey in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. [1897] A. C. 22-67, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 35, 75 L. T. N. S. 426, 45 Week. Rep. 193, 4 Manson, 89), it is well to consider it at length. It was first heard by Vice Chancellor Milans under the name of New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 73, 36 L. T. N. S. 222, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 425, 25 Week. Rep. 436, then by the justices of appeal (L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 102), and finally by the House of Lords, where it was twice argued. The facts were these: Erlanger and his associates, hereafter spoken of as the "syndicate," bought of the official liquidator of a broken-down company the lease of a phosphate island for £55,000. The agreement for purchase was signed on September 11th, and was subject to the approval of the judge, which was given on September 15, 1871. By its terms the contract was to be completed on November 15, 1871. The syndicate then organized the New Sombrero Phosphate Company under Stat. 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 89 (L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1264). The articles of association of the new corporation were signed on September 20, 1871, and the company registered on September 20th or 21st (L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

76). On registration the corporation was created under Stat. 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 89, § 18 of which provided that upon registration "the subscribers . . . shall thereupon be a body corporate, . . . capable forthwith of exercising all the functions of an incorporated company." The signers of the articles of association were tools of the syndicate. The members of the first board of directors were named in the articles of association. Two were out of the country and would not attend meetings; others were an employee of Erlanger, a retired admiral of the English navy, whose shares necessary to qualify him as a director were paid for by Erlanger (L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 107, 108), and the mayor of London; three directors made a quorum, and the last three named attended the meetings. The syndicate anticipated its payments required by its contract, and acquired the lease of the island on September 21, 1871. The first meeting of the directors was held on September 29, 1871, at which was produced, and approved by resolution, an agreement between one Evans (in whose name, in behalf of the syndicate, the contract for the purchase of the lease from the official liquidator was made) and one Pavy (acting for the new company), dated September 20, whereby Evans sold, and Pavy for the company bought, the lease of the island for £80,000 in cash and £30,000 in paid-up stock. In the discussion of this case in 210 U. S., at page 216, 52 L. ed. 1080, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638, this contract is stated to have been "provisional on the shares being taken and the company formed," but we do not so understand it as set forth in L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 75, 76, and 95. It was subject to the new company being registered (which was done on September 20th or 21st), and to the contract with the official liquidator being approved by the judge (which was done on September 15th), and duly performed (which was done on September 21st), and to the confirmation by the company (which was given by vote of the directors on September 29th, who were in this regard clothed by the articles of association with all the authority of the corporation itself [L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1273-1274]), but it contained no other provisional features. The directors adopted the contract between Evans and Pavy without investigation into its merits, and in ignorance of the profits made by the syndicate, except as Evans had such knowledge. After this the public over-subscribed. The stock was issued, £30,000 to the syndicate and £100,000 to the public; and on November 2d £80,000 was paid to the syndicate by the company. (L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 96). Respecting this agreement for sale by the syndicate, it is further said in 210 U. S., at page 217, that "the contract seems to have reached forward to the moment when they [the public] subscribed. As it is put in 2 [1 is meant] Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 292, there was really no company till the shares were issued," and on this ground it is stated by the court at page 216 of 210 U. S., that the English case "seems to us far from establishing a different doctrine for that jurisdiction."

We cannot accede to this interpretation. The company was fully formed the moment it was registered. The subscription for the shares required as a prerequisite to registration under the English statute established the company as fully as the forty shares subscribed, and the $1,000 for capital stock paid into the plaintiff's treasury on or before July 11, 1895, established it. It was enabled to make any contract within the scope of its powers. That is settled by the plain language of Stat. 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 89, § 18, quoted above. But it also has been expressly so decided. It was said in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. [1897] A. C. 22, at page 51: "When the memorandum is duly signed and registered, though there be only seven shares taken, the subscribers are a body corporate 'capable forthwith,' to use the words of the enactment, 'of exercising all the functions of an incorporated company.' Those are strong words. The company attains maturity on its birth. There is no period of minority,—no interval of incapacity." This apparently demonstrates the error of the further statement in 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. p. 279, that "before any shares were issued the existence of the corporation was a fiction." The remark of Lord Cairns (L. R. 3 App. Cas. at page 1239) to the effect that the contract for the sale of the island was "provisional on the shares being taken and the company completely formed" was made in connection with the defense of laches, and not in the discussion as to the liability of the defendants (which he had concluded on an earlier page), and refers only to the fact that the scheme of the defendants to get £80,000 in cash out of the new company under their contract with it was dependent as a practical matter on the shares being taken by the public, and does not and cannot apply to the phraseology of the contract itself, for respecting that it is not correct. The only conditions named in the contract were that the company should be registered and confirm the contract, and the contract of the syndicate with the official liquidator be performed. See L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 75, 76, 95.

The distinction which appears to be established between the Erlanger Case and the present one, by the decision of the United States Supreme Court, 210 U. S. 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634, is that if promoters organize a company with a capital of $3,750,000, and sell to it, through their dummy directors, property bought by them for this purpose, for $3,250,000 in paid-up shares, and then get by public subscription $500,000 for working capital, the transaction is valid. But if promoters, having bought property for $55,000, organize a company with a capital of £130,000, and while they are the only bona fide stockholders, by vote of their directors, sell to it their property for £110,000, to be paid £80,000 in cash, and £30,000 in paid-up shares, £100,000 being subscribed in cash by the public, the transaction is void. The only difference between the two cases is that in the Erlanger Case the promoters were paid a part of the purchase price in money, the proceeds of public subscription, and received paid-up shares which they took in payment of the balance of the purchase price when the stock was issued to subscribers, while in the present case the whole purchase price was paid in stock, which was issued before any stock was issued to the public, although after a substantial public subscription. In other words, the order in which the transaction is carried out, and not its substantial nature, makes the difference between liability and immunity of the promoter. It is true that in the Erlanger Case, until after ratification by the company of the contract previously made in its behalf for the purchase of the lease of the island, the mayor of London, by acting as a director, was liable to take shares of stock, and intended to, and did subsequently, take and pay for fifty shares. He, and possibly one other (L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1228), appear to have been the only persons up to that time connected with the company, who subsequently became stockholders, who were not agents of the promoters. But it is also the fact (as stated by Jessel, M. R., in L. R. 5 Ch. Div. at page 112) that "up to that time there was not really a single bona fide shareholder distinct from the promoters," and, of course, all these assented to the transaction. If this is a vital circumstance, that case is distinguishable in principle from the one at bar, and from the case decided by the United States Supreme Court. This appears to us to be a difference upon an immaterial matter. It is of no consequence whether in fact the dummy directors know of the terms of sale and the breach of trust of the promoters. It does not appear in the present case that the nominees of Bigelow and Lewisohn knew any more about the profit the latter were making than did the directors of the New Sombrero Company of the profits of the syndicate. The point is that in both cases the directors were selected with the purpose that they should be the mere instruments of the promoters, and they carried out the will of their masters. Under the English statute the instruments of the promoters in the New Sombrero Company, while its directors, were as fully clothed with all the powers of the corporation and as much the holders of all its stock, as were the seven directors of the plaintiff, holding in all forty shares of the plaintiff at the time the contract of sale in the present case was made. If the assent of all the stockholders is good in the one case, by the same token it should be equally good in the other; and the breach of trust in the one is equally a breach of trust in the other. This case seems to us an authority in favor of the plaintiff.

In New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 73, 123, it was said by Baggallay, J. A.: "The syndicate were in substance not only the vendors of the property, but also the promoters of the company, and in such a case, the syndicate, as promoters, being in a fiduciary relation to the company, it was essential that the public, who were invited to become, and who were expected to become, the shareholders of the company, and to constitute the company, should have the fullest information as to all the surrounding circumstances." See also Jessel, M. R., at page 113. In Re British Seamless Paper Box Co. L. R. 17 Ch. D. 467, at page 471, it was said by Jessel, M. R.: "If promoters make an arrangement to get a profit for themselves out of what is apparently paid to the vendors, it is immaterial whether the contract with the vendors is approved of by the directors of the company, who are the promoters, just before the allotment or just after. In both cases it is intended to cheat the future shareholders; and, of course, it makes no difference whatever, that the persons who, at the time the allotment was made, were in fact the promoters or their nominees, knew of the fraud. You can defraud future allottees as well as present allottees." In the same case on appeal, Cotton, L. J., said (L. R. 17 Ch. Div. at page 470): "The directors stand in a fiduciary relation to the whole company; that is, not only to the existing members, but to all whom they intend to bring in." In Broderip v. Salomon [1895] 2 Ch. 323, at page 329, it was said by Vaughan Williams, J. (whose conclusion was approved in s. c. sub nom. Salomon v. Salomon & Co. [1897] A. C. 22, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 35, 75 L. T. N. S. 426, 45 Week. Rep. 193, 4 Manson, 89): "Of course, purchasing at an exorbitant price may be a fraud even if all the shareholders know of it, if there is an intention to allot further shares at a later period to future allottees." This point was apparently left open in the House of Lords [1897] A. C. at page 37. In Re Leeds & H. Theatres [1902] 2 Ch. 809, at page 823, occurs this language: "At first there were only four directors . . . and the seven necessary signatories of the memorandum of association. When it is said that the promoters stood in a fiduciary position towards the company, that does not mean that they stood in such a relation to these directors and these seven signatories. It means that they stood in a fiduciary relation to all future allottees of shares,—to the persons who were invited to come and take up the shares of the company." In Gluckstein v. Barnes [1900] A. C. 240, 257, Lord Robertson says: "The people for whom these gentlemen [the promoters] were bound to act were their coming constituents, the persons out of whose money they proposed to make their gain."

In Densmore Oil Co. v. Densmore, 64 Pa. 43, at page 50, 3 Mor. Min. Rep. 569, it is said: "Where persons form such an association, or begin or start the project of one, from that time they do stand in a confidential relation to each other, and to all others who may subsequently become members or subscribers, and it is not competent for any of them to purchase property for the purposes of such a company, and then sell it at an advance, without a full disclosure of the facts." This language is quoted with approval and applied in Burbank v. Dennis, 101 Cal. 90, 98, 35 Pac. 444, and in South Joplin Land Co. v. Case, 104 Mo. 572, 580, 16 S. W. 390. To the same point, Pittsburg Min. Co. v. Spooner, 74 Wis. 307, 321-323, 17 Am. St. Rep. 149, 42 N. W. 259, 17 Mor. Min. Rep. 226. In Pietsch v. Milbrath, 123 Wis. 647, at page 656, 68 L.R.A. 945, 107 Am. St. Rep. 1017, 101 N. W. 388, 391, 102 N. W. 342, it is held that "persons who act as promoters of a corporation do not necessarily cease to be such when the corporation is organized to do business. . . . So long as there are prospective original subscribers for stock, and the promoters and those concerting with them remain in control of the corporation, it is in a situation to be deceived. . . . It is deceived in a legal sense when it is rendered helpless by its managers as to protecting those invited to subscribe for its stock, and is then used to aid in defrauding them." This is supported by Fred Macey Co. v. Macey, 143 Mich. 138, 152, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1036, 106 N. W. 722, a case singularly like the one at bar in its essential features, where relief was granted to the corporation against the promoters, although they subscribed for all the capital stock. Other cases which in principle reach the same result are Yeiser v. United States Board & Paper Co. 52 L.R.A. 724, 46 C. C. A. 567, 107 Fed. 340, 348; London Trust Co. v. Mackenzie, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 870, 3 Reports, 597, 68 L. T. N. S. 380; Hinkley v. Sac Oil & Pipe Line Co. 132 Iowa, 396, 119 Am. St. Rep. 564, 107 N. W. 629. It was said in Groel v. United Electric Co. 70 N. J. Eq. 616, 622, 61 Atl. 1061, 1063: "There can be no question that promoters are liable to the corporation for profits secretly made by them in its promotion, and that such liability arises in cases where future allottees of stock are concerned. Knoop v. Bohmrich, 49 N. J. Eq. 82, 23 Atl. 118; Plaquemines Tropical Fruit Co. v. Buck, 52 N. J. Eq. 219, 27 Atl. 1094; Loudenslager v. Woodbury Heights Land Co. 58 N. J. Eq. 556, 43 Atl. 671, affirming the principle established in the court of chancery in Woodbury Heights Land Co. v. Loudenslager, 55 N. J. Eq. 78, 35 Atl. 436." In Central Trust Co. v. East Tennessee Land Co. (C. C.) 116 Fed. 744, and Camden Land Co. v. Lewis, 101 Me. 78, 95, 63 Atl. 523; Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310, 49 L.R.A. 725, 57 N. E. 656, to this point is cited with approval. St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Tiernan, 37 Kan. 606, 15 Pac. 544, and Stewart v. St. Louis Ft. S. & W. R. Co. (C. C.) 41 Fed. 736, were both decided on the assumption that the promoters took all the stock, although it appears that later some stock was issued to municipalities through which the tracks of the promoted railroad corporation ran, but whether as a part of the original plan of promotion does not appear, and no weight is attached to this circumstance in the opinions.

Numerous other cases which have been cited do not bear upon this point, for the reason that in each of them the owners of the property conveyed have owned either the entire capital stock of the corporation, or all that it was contemplated to issue. See Foster v. Seymour (C. C.) 23 Fed. 65; McCracken v. Robison, 6 C. C. A. 400, 14 U. S. App. 602, 57 Fed. 375; Barr v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 263, 26 N. E. 145; *Blum v. In all these cases it was also true that no shares were ever issued (so far as appears) other than those to the promoters, except that in Re British Seamless Paper Box Co. L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 467, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 497, 44 L. T. N. S. 498, 29 Week. Rep. 690, at a time considerably subsequent to the organization of the corporation, a change in the scheme was made in good faith, by which others were brought in as subscribers.

In this respect the question is one of intention of the promoters. If they actually intend at the time the company is brought out to remain its sole owners, and that it shall not receive the money of innocent shareholders in the future, then, although thereafter the exigencies of the company may be such as to require the issue of additional stock, they may not be responsible. Re British Seamless Paper Box Co. supra, is an illustration of this principle. There it was found that the promoters were, and intended to remain, the sole proprietors of the property of the company and the sole members of the company. Cotton, L. J., at page 479, said: "Here it is an established fact that when the company was formed it was intended to be a private company, that is, it was intended to carry it on without calling in the public, or issuing any shares except to the then existing shareholders. Therefore the doctrine that directors may not make a profit for themselves is inapplicable, because all the members knew that they intended to make a profit. It is true that some new members were subsequently taken in. If shortly after this transaction a prospectus had been issued, and the public had been invited to come in and take shares, no court would have listened to directors who said that it was not intended to take in fresh members; but this was commenced and carried on entirely as a private company, and a considerable time elapsed before they asked anyone to join them." In Wills v. Nehalem Coal Co. 51 Or. 70, 96 Pac. 528, a corporation was organized by promoters with a capital of $150,000. More than half was issued to promoters and their tools in return for property of one of them conveyed at an overvaluation.

Afterwards shares were sold to the public without disclosure of the great profit made by promoters. Relief was granted. The contention that the corporation had assented with full knowledge of the facts by all who were the stockholders at the time of the sale was disposed of on the ground that in substance a wrong was done the corporation in diminishing the common fund held for the benefit of all the stockholders, by issuing a part of its capital stock for property worth less than its face value. In Richlands Oil Co. v. Morris, 108 Va. 288, 61 S. E. 762, the facts as stated in the opinion were that the promoters, having acquired the control of certain oil leases for an insignificant price, "proceeded to transfer these leases to a company which they organized upon a capitalization of 1,000,000 shares [the par value of each share being $1], and distributed 600,000 of those shares among themselves; and, having perfected the organization of the company by making themselves the president, secretary, treasurer, and directors, undertook to market the residue of the shares of stock, amounting to 400,000 shares, without informing the public as to the true condition." The suit of the corporation was upheld. Upon the point we are now discussing, these two cases are indistinguishable in principle from the cases at bar.

This review of decisions seems to establish abundantly the proposition that promoters stand in a fiduciary position toward the corporation, as well when, as a part of the scheme of promotion, uninformed stockholders are expected to come in after the wrong has been perpetrated, as when at that time there are shareholders to whom no disclosure is made. We find no authority opposed except the Lewisohn Cases in the Federal courts. 210 U. S. 206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634.

If the question is examined on principle apart from authority; the same result appears clear. The starting point is that a promoter is a fiduciary to the corporation. To use the words of Lord Cairns in Erlander v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218, at page 1236, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 777: Promoters "have in their hands the creation and molding of the company. They have the power of defining how and when and in what shape and under what supervision it shall start into existence" and begin business. The corporation is in the hands of the promoter like clay in the hands of the potter. It is to this person, absolutely helpless and incapable of independent initiative or uncontrolled action, that the promoter stands as trustee. It is not necessary to inquire how far he may be trustee also for shareholders or associates. In the present case the inquiry relates wholly to his obligation to the corporation. The fiduciary relation must in reason continue until the promoter has completely established according to his plan the being which he has undertaken to create. His liability must be commensurate with the scheme of promotion on which he has embarked. If the plan contemplates merely the organization of the corporation, his duties may end there. But if the scheme is more ambitious, and includes beside the incorporation not only the conveyance to it of property, but the procurement of a working capital in cash from the public, then the obligation of faithfulness stretches to the length of the plan. It would be a vain thing for the law to say that the promoter is a trustee, subject to all the stringent liabilities which inhere in that character, and at the same time say that, at any period during his trusteeship, and long before an essential part of it was executed, or his general duty as such ended, he could, by changing for a moment the cloak of the promoter for that of director or stockholder, by his own act alone, absolve himself from all past, present, or future liability in his capacity as promoter. The plaintiff was fully organized and authorized to do business on July 8 and 11, 1895, when only $1,000 in capital stock had been paid in. It would be an idle ceremony indeed to establish for promoters the obligations of trustees, and at the same time hold that, by their tools and with only $1,000 paid in, and that as a mere form (for it was soon after repaid to one of them), they could vote to themselves a wholly unwarranted profit of $1,250,000, kept secret from other initial shareholders, because at that moment they were the only stockholders. By such a course the law would be holding out apples of Sodom to the wronged corporation. Corporation can be formed through irresponsible agents with ease. If these agents can vote away a substantial part of the capital stock for property of comparatively small value, and still, with immunity to themselves and their principals, receive from the uninformed public cash subscriptions for the rest of the capital stock, the organization and management of corporations might readily become a "system of frauds." Peabody v. Flint, 6 Allen, 52-55. It is answered that the plaintiff has assented to the transaction with full knowledge of the facts. But it has not assented when it stood where it could act independently. The assent to the wrongful act of the promoters was given at the behest and by vote of the promoters themselves, while still occupying the position of protectors to their own creature, while it was bound hand and foot by them, and prevented from taking any action except through them as a step in its farther exploitation, and while their trust was uncompleted. The corporation, although by law fully organized, was still in its swaddling clothes, so far as the plans of the promoters were concerned. The value of their stock taken in return for their mining property was dependent in a substantial degree upon the corporation having $500,000 in cash for a working capital. They could not perfect their plans nor reap their contemplated profit, except by retaining their hold upon the corporation until the public had made this contribution. In one sense it is true that the plaintiff was completely organized on July 11 and on September 20, 1895. It was fully competent to be bound by its contracts and ratification of contracts with those dealing with it at arm's length. But it was not free from its wardship to its promoters, whose scheme from the first looked forward to a corporation with treasury filled by subscriptions from the unenlightened public. The corporation was not dealing with these fiduciaries upon an independent ground. The plaintiff, although a legal corporation from July 8th, leaned wholly upon its promoters, because they made it so to lean, until long after the events here in controversy. An assent under those conditions can be of no greater effect than the assent of a minor under guardianship to the breaches of trust of his guardian.

The situation is akin to the conveyance of property by a man solvent, but in contemplation of insolvency. Such conveyance is not wrong until the contemplated indebtedness is incurred, which makes him an insolvent. Then the executed evil intent stretches back and invalidates the original conveyance. Here the conveyance to the corporation with the secret profit, when there are no uninformed subscribers to stock, if nothing more is ever done, is not an actionable tort. But the vicious intent looks forward to the procurement of money from the ignorant public by means of original subscriptions, and the execution of this evil intent extends backward to contaminate the sale and its profit.

Stress has sometimes been laid upon the fact that the promoters were paid a part of their purchase price out of the public subscriptions. But there is no difference in principle between such a case and the present, where a substantial part of the value of the stock taken by the defendant and Lewisohn depended upon the cash subscriptions to be made by the public for the remaining shares not issued to the promoters.

But it is further argued that the entire capital stock outstanding at the time being in the hands of the promoters, the sale of the property to the corporation was merely changing the form of title of the promoters from owners of real estate to that of shares of stock, and that, there being then no other shareholders, no wrong was done. It has been decided that where persons own the entire authorized capital stock of the company, and take it in payment for the conveyance of their property at a grossly exaggerated price, nobody can be heard to complain. The leading English cases upon this point are Re Gold Co. L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 701, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 281, 40 L. T. N. S. 5, 27 Week. Rep. 341; Re Ambrose Lake Tin & Copper Min. Co. L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 390, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 457, 42 L. T. N. S. 604, 28 Week. Rep. 783; Re British Seamless Paper Box Co. L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 467, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 497, 44 L. T. N. S. 498, 29 Week. Rep. 690; and Salomon v. Salomon & Co. [1897] A. C. 22, 75 L. T. N. S. 426, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 35, 45 Week. Rep. 193, 4 Manson, 89. But these and many other like cases cited on page 331, ante, are where the promoters owned all the outstanding capital stock and intended to remain the sole proprietors, and did not purpose that there should be, as a part of the promotion plan, a substantial issue of stock for cash to the public. This is pointed out in London Trust Co. v. Mackenzie, 62 L. J. Ch. N. S. 870, 875, 3 Reports, 597, 68 L. T. N. S. 380. The distinction is clear between cases of that class and those like the present, where the promoters took for themselves a large number of shares of stock without adequate consideration and without disclosure, to the detriment of the corporation and all its future shareholders, at the same time planning that there should be immediate public subscriptions. It is one thing to take all the shares of a corporation in payment for physical property conveyed. It does not much matter to the stockholders in such a case whether the total is 130,000 shares or 150,000 shares. But it is a very different thing to take 130,000/150,000 of capital stock of a corporation whose assets consist of the same physical property, and, in addition, $500,000 in money subscribed by others. The latter course affects the other stockholders and the corporation itself, and it gives the promoters something appreciably more valuable than what they contribute. It is true that in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. and in some other cases there was a part of the authorized capital stock which was not issued, but it was not proposed to be issued.

as a part of the scheme of promotion, and the original shareholders intended to remain the only shareholders. It was to be issued or not in the remote future, as the exigencies of the corporation in the actual conduct of its business might require, but, in any event, it was not to be issued for the purpose of starting the corporation on its course. This circumstance materially affects the question here to be considered. Most, if not all, corporation laws provide in some form for an increase of capital stock. It is of no consequence upon such a point as this, whether the capital stock originally authorized is large, but not all issued, or whether it is at first small and subsequently an increase is authorized. This seems to be the view taken by the English courts, for it is said by James, L. J., in Re British Seamless Paper Box Co. L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 476: "If they [the promoters] were intending, although then constituting the whole company, that other people should come in afterward, to whom what had been done would be injurious, the court would feel no difficulty in saying, as Lord Langdale did in Society for Illustration of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, 2 Beav. 559, 9 L. J. Ch. N. S. 307, 4 Jur. 453, that they intended to commit a fraud."

The fundamental reasoning upon which these cases can rest is not that no wrong has been committed, but there is no one to enforce the remedy. All courts recognize the soundness of the doctrine that no man can be on both sides of the same bargain with justice to all interests. The principle that one cannot rightfully sell property belonging to him in his private right, to himself in a trust capacity, is universal.

If this aspect alone is looked at, and the corporation is regarded as a distinct person, it cannot be said that the corporation is not wronged by such a breach of duty by promoters. It is only when the corporate personality is disregarded, and its component elements as stockholders alone are considered, that it can be said that no harm is done, on the ground (as was said in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. [1897] A. C. at page 57) that "the company is bound in a matter intra vires by the unanimous agreement of its members." But looking through the form of the corporation to the stockholders, and treating them as the corporation, is an exception to the otherwise firmly established universal rule that the corporation is a separate legal entity for all purposes, even though all its stock be held by a single interest, and it be to all practical intents merely the instrument of the stockholder. Conley v. Mathieson Alkali Works, 190 U. S. 406, 47 L. ed. 1113, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 728; Peterson v. Chicago, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

R. I. & P. R. Co. 205 U. S. 364-390, 51 L. ed. 841-851, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 513. We perceive no reason for extending this exception in a case like the present.

The real ground of the decisions of which Salomon v. Salomon & Co. is a type is that the corporation is estopped by the circumstance that all persons with financial concern in the matter have assented with knowledge, and thus the lips of everybody are sealed. It is not that no wrong has been done, but that whatever wrong has been done has been condoned. The maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, is invoked. This, however, is setting up confession and avoidance, and not a bar to the main cause of action.

The theory upon which corporations are founded is that they are artificial persons, distinct and separate from officers and stockholders. Corporate liabilities do not attach to the latter. The wrong which the defendant and his associate did in this case was in selling property worth intrinsically $1,000,000, and in the market at most $2,000,000, for $3,250,000, without revealing that they were making a secret profit. The wrong was done to the corporation. It affected all its shareholders, present and future alike. It is generally admitted that, if there are existing stockholders ignorant of the wrong, redress may be had. But it is had through the corporation or for the benefit of the corporation, and not by the stockholder in his own right. The wrong is not done to the shareholders as individuals, nor to the shareholders collectively. It is done to the corporation as an independent being, and thus indirectly the rights of those who are or who may become stockholders are affected. In buying the promoters' mine, the directors of the corporation acted for the corporation, as such, without regard to who were the then stockholders, or even if there were no stockholders. Whoever becomes an originally contemplated shareholder coming in afterwards has as much right to say that the rights of the corporation were not protected, and to assert that it should assert its remedy for the wrong done it, as one in at first, but not informed. Subsequent subscriptions to original stock, as a part of the scheme of promotion, do not change the identity of the corporation, but remove an impediment to the enforcement of a remedy for a wrong previously done the corporation. The wrong is not done when the innocent public subscribes, but when the sale was made to the corporation at a grossly exaggerated price with secret profit. The occasion for complaining of this wrong comes when the promoters issue to the public the balance of the stock, in order to provide the money necessary to set the corporation on its feet and to give thereby the contemplated value to the stock taken by themselves in payment for their mines. The exemption of the promoter from liability to the corporation for a sale without disclosure, when he takes the entire issue of capital stock, is an exception to the general rule imposing upon him the liabilities of a trustee. If this exception is to be extended to a case like the present, it leaves nothing of substantial value in the original rule. It might still reach small and grosser forms of want of fidelity to corporations, but would leave unharmed the vastly greater and more refined variety illustrated by the present case. It would point the way to general immunity for the wary.

It is also urged that the maintenance of this suit works an injustice to the defendant in requiring a repayment to the corporation which will result in a benefit to the $\frac{13}{15}$ of the capital stock taken by the defendant and Lewisohn (who condoned the wrong), as well as to the $\frac{2}{15}$ subscribed for by the innocent public. The size of the repayment which may be required of the defendant is due to the enormous profit taken at the outset. Apart from the unjust profit taken by the promoters, their interest in the plaintiff was only $\frac{5}{17}$, or, tested by the cost and intrinsic value of the property conveyed, $\frac{4}{17}$. The true answer, however, is given by Jessel, M. R., in New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. at page 114: "It is said that is not doing justice, and that the suit cannot be maintained in this form, because it will not do justice. But that argument goes too far, because it would apply to a case of the grossest fraud in every instance in which one or more of the actual shareholders of a company took part in that fraud. If the argument were once allowed to prevail, it would only be necessary to corrupt one single shareholder in order to prevent a company from ever setting the contract aside. It may be said, you give to the shareholder, who was a party to the fraud, a profit, because he will take it in respect of his shares, and since, as between co-conspirators, there is no contribution, therefore his brother conspirators, who are made liable for the fraud, cannot make him repay his proportion. But the doctrine of this court has never been to hold its hand and avoid doing justice in favor of the innocent, because it cannot apportion the punishment fully amongst the guilty. A dozen parties to a fraud may be defendants, and one decree or judgment go against all, and if it is a fraud of such a character that none of them can bring an action for contribution, the plaintiff may, at his will 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) and pleasure, enforce that judgment against any one of them, and perhaps pass over the most guilty of them; still there is no remedy as between those who commit the fraud. It is one of the punishments of fraud that there is no such remedy, and that a guilty party, though not the most guilty, may suffer the greatest amount of punishment. It is one of the deterrents to men to prevent their committing fraud." See also Stockton v. Anderson, 40 N. J. Eq. 486, 4 Atl. 642.

It is said further that the result reached is harsh from the business man's point of view. A discussion of this aspect of the case involves ethical considerations. Courts are constantly dealing with the various relations of the business world. Legal principles are applied to these transactions, but such principles have "almost always been the fundamental ethical rules of right and wrong." Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802, 817, 44 L. J. C. P. N. S. 362. Upon its distinctly moral side, there is little to the credit of the defendant and his associate. The offering by the defendant as promoter, for public subscription for cash at par, a substantial part of the capital stock of a corporation, the rest of whose capital stock had been issued for property conveyed to it under a law which permitted such stock to be issued only for the real value of property, was equivalent to a representation that no fictitious value had been placed upon the property so acquired. But the distinct finding of the single justice is that the real value was less than one third the price for which the defendant and Lewisohn sold it. Nothing can be said in support of a business enterprise carried on by promoters, which involves the purchase by them of mines costing and intrinsically worth $1,000,000, with money in substantial part solicited from associates on representations that a corporation is to be formed with a capitalization of $2,500,000, of whose stock $2,000,000 is to be issued for conveyance to it by them of the mines, and the rest for cash; the actual organization of the corporation under the laws of a state which permitted the issuance of capital stock for property conveyed only to the real value of the property, with a capital stock of $3,750,000, of which $3,250,000 is issued as fully paid for conveyance of the mines; the settlement with a very great majority of the associates on the basis of a sale for $2,000,000 of stock as at first represented, the promoters retaining $1,250,000 of shares as a secret profit, intending also to procure from the public subscriptions for $500,000 of stock in cash at par, and actually carrying out this purpose, the promoters themselves during all these manipulations having entire control of all executive offices of the corporation. In the absence of compelling authority, we cannot set the seal of judicial approval upon such business policies. See Bigelow v. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 457, 71 Atl. at pages 176, 177.

Both on authority outside of our own cases, and on principle, it appears to us that the defendant should be held liable. But in this jurisdiction the matter does not stand quite on the basis of an original proposition. In two thoroughly considered opinions in recent years (Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310, 49 L.R.A. 725, 57 N. E. 656, and Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Bigelow, 188 Mass. 315, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 653), this court has held that liability existed in a case like this. It is not necessary to repeat the arguments of these decisions. There is thus added to considerations which otherwise exist, the force of the doctrine of stare decisis. One or both of these cases have frequently been cited by courts of other jurisdictions, and always with approval until Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn, 79 C. C. A. 534, 148 Fed. 1020, s. c. 210 U. S. 206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634. No arguments have been adduced not considered in those cases, and no points now brought forward were not there discussed. While the rule of stare decisis does not prevent the overruling of those cases, they should not be disturbed unless they now appear to be so clearly wrong as to have no sound support. Ma-bardy v. McHugh, 202 Mass. 148, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487, 132 Am. St. Rep. 484, 88 N. E. 894, 16 Ann. Cas. 500. It must appear that the law was "misunderstood or misapplied." 1 Kent. Com. 475. There was no misconception of the points involved when these cases were decided, nor any lack of discernment in their application to the affairs of corporations. It does not appear that they have become archaic or inapplicable by reason of business evolutions since they were announced. On the contrary, the tendency of custom since the first case was decided has been rather in the direction of more strict accountability of those owing duties to corporations and their stockholders. At all events, we perceive no occasion to relax these principles of accountability for breaches of trust. The mere fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has since decided the question differently is not alone a sufficient consideration for reversing our decisions. It is only when the reasoning of its decision is of convincing power, and compels the conclusion that our cases were wrongly decided, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that it must command our support in other branches of the law than those where it is supreme under the Federal Constitution. With great respect to the decision in 210 U. S. 206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634, we are constrained to adhere to the laws as laid down in the earlier cases in this commonwealth.

We have discussed the question as if the same legal principles are involved now as were presented upon the demurrer. There are, however, certain aspects of the evidence which seem to us to make it essentially different and materially stronger for the plaintiff. When the votes to purchase the mines of the promoters were passed on July 11th, only forty shares of stock had been subscribed for or issued. The votes were passed by the directors alone, and there was no vote by the stockholders at this time. It is true that the directors comprised all the stockholders, but on that date they were acting wholly in their capacity as directors,—that is, as trustees. They did not attempt, so far as any records show, to shift their character as trustees for that of individual stockholders. They did not pursue the careful course of separation of these dual capacities by calling a stockholders' meeting, which was followed in North-West Transp. Co. v. Beatty, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 589, 50 L. J. P. C. N. S. 102, 57 L. T. N. S. 426, 36 Week. Rep. 647; nor did they assent in writing as stockholders. So far as the records show up to this point, there was only a directors' vote for the purchase. Moreover, the records of the plaintiff show that at the opening of this meeting only six of the seven directors were present. Four of these six directors resigned, as did also the absent seventh director; their resignations were accepted and their successors were chosen. But of the five newly chosen directors, only two were present and took their seats. Thus there were four directors, a bare quorum and majority, present when the offers for the sale of the mines were presented and the votes for their purchase were passed. These votes to purchase were not consummated until December, 1895, and January, 1896, when the deeds were delivered to the plaintiff. The vote to issue the certificates of stock in payment for the conveyances of mines was passed on September 18, 1895. Under date of July 18, 1895, the only subscription list of the plaintiff was signed. Upon this list appear the names of those outside persons who subscribed for the $500,000 of working capital for the plaintiff. The money was paid by some of the outside stockholders before September 18, and at least as early as September 10, 1895. Stock certificates were made out for the number of shares allotted to each under date of September 18th. The rights of all these persons as subscribers had become fixed at least as early as September 10, 1895, before which date the subscriptions were all received, and when notices of their acceptance and demands for payment were sent out. These circumstances amply support the finding of the single justice that issuance of the 20,000 shares to the public was in the summer or fall of 1895. These stockholders were entitled to have a disclosure made to the corporation through independent officers. There is no pretense that any disclosure was made to these subscribers. On September 18, 1895, the directors of the plaintiff voted to issue the stock as before stated,—30,000 shares to Bigelow and Lewisohn, 100,000 to the nominee Dumaresq, and there was made out the certificate for the remaining 20,000 shares to Thomas Nelson, treasurer,—and these four, professing to represent all the stock of the plaintiff, signed the written approval of all previous acts of the directors. This is the first attempt of the stockholders to act respecting this subject.

As before pointed out, the certificate to Nelson was wrongfully issued; except as it belonged to outside subscribers, it was treasury stock. There were then other stockholders of the plaintiff who had paid for their stock, although they had not received their certificates, but the plaintiff had their money and they were entitled to be treated as stockholders. Chester Glass Co. v. Dewey, 16 Mass. 94, 8 Am. Dec. 128; Chaffin v. Cummings, 37 Me. 76; Hawes v. Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Co. 101 Mass. 385-395. Their certificates were dated September 18, 1895, and issued directly. These circumstances show that at the first and only time when there was an effort on the part of the promoters to secure a ratification of their wrongful acts, there were certain shareholders who were not represented, and who did not themselves sign in assent, and who were in fact ignorant of the wrong done the corporation. Further, they do not show that at any time from the organization of the corporation onward was there a moment when all the stockholders or directors knew of the material facts as to the defendant's relation to the corporation. In this view of the facts, which is supported fully by the evidence, there appears to be no assent by the corporation, with knowledge of the facts by all those who at any time constituted all the stockholders, except by assuming the knowledge of Bigelow and Lewisohn on July 11, 1895, when there were only forty shares of stock, for which the latter had paid, to be the knowledge of all the stockholders, although there were then seven shareholders as to whose actual knowledge of the scheme there is no evidence, although all were the tools of the defendant and Lewisohn. It is only by treating these subscriptions as a sham that knowledge even of the owners of the forty shares can be found. But these subscriptions were necessary to the organization under the New Jersey law. Hence the rule of Salomon v. Salomon & Co. [1897] A. C. 22, 75 L. T. N. S. 426, 65 L. J. Ch. N. S. 35, 45 Week. Rep. 193, 4 Manson, 89, and like cases, has no application to these facts, nor does the difficulty meet "the petitioner at the outset that it has assented to the transaction with a full knowledge of the facts" (210 U. S. 211, 212, 52 L. ed. 1028, 1029, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634, 636), unless it is said that in fact knowledge by the plaintiff's dominant stockholders is knowledge by the corporation. But the defendant was committing a breach of trust on his principal, the plaintiff, and where one is committing a wrong in his own interest, his knowledge does not bind the corporation, which might in an innocent transaction be affected by his knowledge. Indian Head Nat. Bank v. Clark, 166 Mass. 27, 43 N. E. 912; Produce Exch. Trust Co. v. Bieberbach, 176 Mass. 577-588, 58 N. E. 162. These considerations mark the case as different in material respects from that which was stated in Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn, 210 U. S. 206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634, and bring it clearly within the well-recognized rule of promoter's liability, laid down in the numerous and undisputed cases before cited. The Supreme Court of the United States has never passed upon these facts nor upon such a case as is thus presented. We know of no authority which countenances a different decision upon them than that here reached. The conflict between the Federal courts and this court in this respect appears to be not upon the merits of the case as disclosed upon the present record. See Bigelow v. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 457, 71 Atl. 153-175.

But there is still another aspect in which the case differs from that presented in the Federal court and in our previous decision. The defendant held out to subscribers of his syndicate, before the incorporation of the plaintiff, that its capital stock was to be $2,500,000, and that they would get for one share in the Baltimore company two in the new company, and that the rest would be sold to furnish the working capital. The right of these parties to become stockholders in the plaintiff company was fixed before its first meeting of stockholders was held, because they had signed the syndicate agreement and had made two payments on account of their subscriptions. They were sharers thus in the profit of $1,000,000 above the costs of mines. But they were also entitled to disclosure of the secret profit of $1,250,000 more, taken by the defendant and Lewisohn, and it is found that most of them were ignorant of it. Respecting any sale to the plaintiff in which they had agreed to become shareowners on any other basis than that of two for one, they were entitled to disclosure. This is quite aside from any rights they may have had against Bigelow for not treating them fairly on the division of profits. It stands on different ground. In that relation they were sharers in promoters' profits, and they received what they expected. But they had also agreed to be subscribers to stock of the plaintiff. In that character they were not promoters, but stockholders and entitled to all their rights. That they knew there was to be a sale for $2,000,000 and a profit of two for one was no reasonable ground for expectation that the defendant would take a large additional secret profit. As to this secret profit, the members of the syndicate had the same rights as the outside public; that is, they were entitled to a disclosure to an independent and impartial board of officers who should be in a position to act for the interests of the corporation as opposed to those of the promoters. In this regard the case is like Arnold v. Searing, 73 N. J. Eq. 262, 67 Atl. 831, where the defendants were held liable.

4. It is argued that even though the ratification in writing be disregarded, still the acts of the stockholders of the plaintiff, after some of them knew of the fact that there was some profit to Bigelow and Lewisohn beyond that accruing to all the other members of the syndicate, have amounted to a ratification. The complete answer to this argument is that the single justice has found, until shortly before the bringing of these suits, neither the stockholders nor the company had gained any knowledge as to the facts upon which the claim is now based; that the very great majority of the stockholders never knew or assented to the operations by which the secret profit was obtained, and did not have knowledge of or access to the books or records of the corporation. The votes of ratification of 1899 and 1901, being passed under these conditions, do not bind the plaintiff.

5. Several other objections are made to the granting of relief to the plaintiff. It is urged that the plaintiff ought not to recover because, a larger majority of its stock being held by a Maine corporation, an agreement has been entered into by that corporation and certain trustees, by which it was attempted to provide for the conduct of these suits and sequester the proceeds to holders of negotiable certificates. But this agreement is one to which the plaintiff is not a party, and it was made long after these suits were instituted. If it is illegal, it may be set aside in appropriate proceedings; but the rights of the plaintiff for the benefit of all its stockholders cannot be refused enforcement on such ground.

6. The defense of laches cannot prevail. It is found as a fact that as soon as the defendant and his associates released their absolute control of the plaintiff, the action was seasonably begun. The plaintiff is held to the exercise of diligence after the discovery of the facts, but there can be no laches so long as there is no knowledge of the wrong complained of, and no failure to avail one's self of reasonable opportunities to ascertain the facts. So long as the plaintiff was wholly in the power of the defendant, it could not be charged with knowledge. Mere lapse of time is no bar to relief under these circumstances. Lydney & W. Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 85, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 875, 55 L. T. N. S. 558, 34 Week. Rep. 749; Lagunas Nitrate Co. v. Lagunas Syndicate [1899] 2 Ch. 392-433, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 699, 48 Week. Rep. 74, 81 L. T. N. S. 334, 15 Times L. R. 436; Twin-Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587, 23 L. ed. 328.

7. Nor is the statute of limitations a bar. The time limited by the statute does not begin to run against a breach of trust, where there is a fiduciary duty to disclose the facts on which the cause of action rests, until the facts have or ought to have been discovered. Atlantic Nat. Bank v. Harris, 118 Mass. 147; Rev. Laws, chap. 202, § 11. The ground of the defendant's liability is his breach of trust as a promoter.

8. It follows, from what has been said as to the nature of the wrong done by the defendant, that he is liable in solido. The act of the defendant and Lewisohn was a joint act for the benefit of both. Their subdivision of the profits made cannot affect the right of the plaintiff. The breach of trust which they as promoters committed was in the nature of a tort. This renders them liable severally as well as jointly, and for the whole damage. Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310-324, 49 L.R.A. 725, 57 N. E. 656, and cases cited; Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Bigelow, 188 Mass. at page 328, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 659; Feneff v. Boston & M. R. Co. 196 Mass. 575-581, 82 N. E. 705; Gluckstein v. Barnes [1900] A. C. 240, 69 L. J. Ch. N.

S. 385, 82 L. T. N. S. 393, 16 Times L. R. 321, 7 Manson, 321; Bigelow v. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 457, 71 Atl. 153-176.

9. As to the character of relief which can be afforded, it is said, first, that rescission is the only remedy open to the petitioner. The single justice has found that the situation of the parties and the properties is not such as to make it just at this time to order a rescission. The evidence justifies this finding. It was decided in this case at its earlier stage (188 Mass. 315-329, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 653) that rescission is not the only remedy. Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310-321, 49 L.R.A. 725, 57 N. E. 656; Parker v. Nickerson, 137 Mass. 487. We are not disposed to question the correctness of the decision upon this point. When one has committed a breach of trust, there is no occasion to be oversolicitous to see that the faithless fiduciary should not make reparation for the wrong done. Re Olympia [1898] 2 Ch. 153-169, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 433, 78 L. T. N. S. 629, 14 Times L. R. 451, 5 Manson, 139; Lydney & W. Iron Ore Co. v. Bird, L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 85-94, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 875, 55 L. T. N. S. 558, 34 Week. Rep. 749. The essence of the suit is that a secret profit was taken by the promoters. The obvious reason is a return of the secret profit. The difficulty of ascertaining the amount of that profit, which troubled the court in Re Cape Breton Co. L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 795, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 822, 33 Week. Rep. 788, 53 L. T. N. S. 181, does not exist here. See Cavendish-Bentinck v. Fenn; L. R. 12 App. Cas. 652, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 552, 57 L. T. N. S. 773, 36 Week. Rep. 441; Gluckstein v. Barnes [1900] A. C. 240, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 385, 82 L. T. N. S. 393, 16 Times L. R. 321, 7 Manson, 321; Re Leeds & H. Theatres [1902] 2 Ch. 809, 51 Week. Rep. 5, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1, 87 L. T. N. S. 488, 10 Manson, 72; Yale Gas Stove Co. v. Wilcox, 64 Conn. 101, 25 L.R.A. 90, 42 Am. St. Rep. 159, 29 Atl. 303.

10. The plaintiff has also appealed from the decrees in its favor. It presses its appeals on the ground that it is entitled to recover the difference between the market value of the shares received by the defendant and Lewisohn, and the cost to them of the property conveyed to it. This is the measure of recovery where there is a fiduciary relation at the time of the purchase. But there is no finding here that such relation existed at the time the defendant and Lewisohn purchased the property. There is no evidence which requires such a finding. The corporation was not organized until a considerable period after the options had been secured. The defendant and Lewisohn were, during all this time, free to do as they chose with their purchase so far as the plaintiff was concerned. This has been before decided. 188 Mass. 321, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 653. The plaintiff contends in the alternative that its measure of damage is the difference between the intrinsic value of the property conveyed, and the value of the stock issued therefor. Market value is the standard commonly applied where property has such value. It is only in cases where the value of property cannot be fairly ascertained by the application of this test that resort is had to any other. The single justice appears to have experienced no difficulty in determining that value of these mines. There are no exceptional circumstances which call for the application of any other than the ordinary rule.

11. Since the decision of this case on demurrer, reported in 188 Mass. 315, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 653, and the entry of the decrees by the single justice after a full hearing upon the facts, the defendant has been permitted to file a supplementary answer. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Bigelow, 199 Mass. 488, 86 N. E. 660. He there sets up, as a bar to the plaintiff's claim, a judgment of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, entered on July 23, 1908, in favor of the defendants in a suit like one of the present suits in all particulars, except that it was prosecuted against the executors of the will of Lewisohn, the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's bill being sustained and the final decree being entered, whereby the claim against Lewisohn was held to be without foundation; and he contends that the matters is thereby res judicata as to himself. The supplemental answer further avers that the issues were the same as those here involved, and that the present defendant was a privy to the judgment in that case, and participated in the defense, and acted with Lewisohn's executors throughout the entire pendency of the suit. The Lewisohn suit was heard in the circuit court of the United States, and on appeal in the United States circuit court of appeals, and afterwards upon certiorari in the Supreme Court of the United States, 210 U. S. 206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. 634. On these supplemental answers a hearing was had before a single justice, who reserved questions arising thereon for the consideration of this court upon the pleadings and all the evidence.

One of the two suits before us seeks to set aside the conveyance of the outside properties and secure the return of the 30,000 shares of capital stock issued therefor, and the other to recover damages resulting from the conveyance to the plaintiff of the mines and other real estate of the Baltimore company for the excessive valuation of 100,000 such shares. In other respects the two bills are alike. Two suits (the bills in which have the same allegations as these, mutatis mutandis) were brought against the executors of Lewisohn in the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York. The one relating to the outside properties and the issue of the 30,000 shares was decided ultimately by the United States Supreme Court, and final decree was entered dismissing the suit. In the other suit, respecting the issue of the 100,000 shares for the mines and other real estate of the Baltimore company, no decree has been entered, and it appears to be still pending. Separate offers of sale were presented, and separate votes were passed by the directors of the plaintiff for the purchase of the outside properties for 30,000 shares of its full paid nonassessable capital stock, and for the purchase of the property of the Baltimore company for 100,000 like shares. Separate votes were also passed to issue the 30,000 shares to defendant and Lewisohn, and to issue the 100,000 shares to Dumaresq. Probably the defense of res judicata cannot apply to the suit respecting 100,000 shares, for the suit touching those shares against Lewisohn's executors has never gone to judgment and is still pending. The res at issue in that suit, which appears to be somewhat different from that involved in the other, has therefore never become judicata. This circumstance is noted in passing. In some aspects of the case it may be important and perhaps decisive. In view of the ground upon which this opinion is based, however, it makes no difference in the result, and we do not further advert to it. It appears that the fundamental questions in the suit in the Federal court were precisely the same as those raised in the present suit, relating to the 30,000 shares, and passed upon in 188 Mass. 315, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 653. The present defendant was not a party to the suit in the Federal court, but there is evidence that he participated in the defense of it.

The plaintiff objects that the order of the single justice allowing the defendant to file the supplemental answers was erroneous. This order was made in the exercise of judicial discretion, and unless such discretion was wrongly exercised it must stand. The facts averred in these answers could not have been pleaded when the original answers were filed, for the events they set up have occurred since. It is urged that the decree in favor of the executors of Lewisohn was entered in the United States circuit court before the trial upon the merits in this court, and might have been pleaded in bar, notwithstanding the proceedings in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of certiorari. But even if this be the law, the single justice cannot be said to have erred in permitting the defendant to set up a decree which rests upon a decision of the court of last resort, made after the close of the hearing upon the merits in the present suits. The decree in the Federal court, although founded upon a demurrer, may under proper circumstances be a bar to another suit, as well as one founded upon a hearing of evidence. Yates v. Utica Bank, 206 U. S. 181-183, 51 L. ed. 1015, 1016, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 646; Northern P. R. Co. v. Slaght, 205 U. S. 122, and cases cited at page 130, 51 L. ed. 738, 741, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 442. In the view that we take of the case, it is not necessary to discuss other objections urged by the plaintiff to the force of this decree, or the similarity of the issues in the two sets of suits.

12. The most important and difficult question is whether the contention of the defendant is sound that the decree of the Federal court is a complete bar to the present suits. His argument is that, under the law of New York, the decree of the circuit court of the United States is a bar to the maintenance of another suit for the same cause of action by the same plaintiff against him, and that, under article 4, § 1, of the Constitution of the United States, the effect given by the law of New York to the decree must be given by this court, in order that it receive the constitutionally required full faith and credit. The constitutional provision is as applicable to a decree of the circuit court in the southern district of New York as to a decree in the state courts. Deposit Bank v. Frankfort, 191 U. S. 499-515, 48 L. ed. 276-382, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 154; Central Nat. Bank v. Stevens, 169 U. S. 432-460, 42 L. ed. 807-817, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403. The general effect of the decree (except as to matters of law or practice arising under the statutes of the United States, which have no bearing in the present case) is governed by the law of the state of New York, where the Federal court was sitting. Hancock Nat. Bank v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 645, 44 L. ed. 619, 621, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506, citing Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 141, 147, 30 L. ed. 614, 617, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 472; Metcalf v. Watertown, 153 U. S. 671, 676, 33 L. ed. 861, 863, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 947; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Long Island Loan & T. Co. 172 U. S. 493, 43 L. ed. 528, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 238.

But before we reach the consideration of the effect of the decree and the interpretation that should be given to it under the laws of New York, there is a preliminary and fundamental question as to the precise meaning of the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution as applied to the circumstances of this case. An analysis of the defendants' contention shows that his defense of estoppel by res judicata rests upon the ground that he was either a party or privy to the New York judgment. It is not and cannot be urged that the New York suit was a proceeding in rem as to the plaintiff's cause of action. It was a personal suit. Except in proceedings in rem, there is no such thing known to the law as an adjudication of a cause of action, which can be availed of as res judicata by any others than by parties and their privies. The doctrine of stare decisis stands on a wholly different ground. The contention is that, even though the court was convinced that its former decision upon the merits was erroneous, and desired to correct the mistake by deciding the later cases differently, the decision against the plaintiff would prevent such correction of error. The fact that a party has fully litigated his cause of action in one suit, and has been defeated, is of no avail in another suit to which a stranger to the first suit is a party, involving precisely the same issues. This principle is illustrated by many cases. Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 38 L. ed. 450, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592; Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 141, 155, 30 L. ed. 614, 619, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 472; Moore v. Albany, 98 N. Y. 396; Trimmer v. Rochester, 130 N. Y. 401, 29 N. E. 746; Stone v. State, 138 N. Y. 124, 33 N. E. 733; Wallace v. Straus, 113 N. Y. 238, 21 N. E. 66; Collins v. Hydorn, 135 N. Y. 320, 32 N. E. 69; Groth v. Washburn, 39 Hun. 324; Furlong v. Banta, 80 Hun. 248, 29 N. Y. Supp. 985.

The defendant can prevail on his supplementary answers only upon the ground that he was either a party or privy to the judgment rendered in the United States circuit court. The defendant Bigelow was not a party to that suit, and he does not assert that he was. The extent of his contention is that he was in privity with the executors of Lewisohn, and therefore entitled to the benefit of the judgment in their favor. The first matter for determination is this: Does the full faith and credit clause require the courts of all other states to give effect to the law of any particular state, where a judgment may be entered, as to who are privies to such judgment; or does it permit or require the courts of the state where a third person sets up the defense that he is privy to a judgment entered in the courts of another state, to decide that question according to its own law? Hence it becomes necessary to inquire what has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decisions upon this, as a Federal question, are binding upon all state courts.

It was said in Smithsonian Inst. v. St. John, 214 U. S. 19, at pages 28, 29, 53 L. ed. 892, 897, 898, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 601, at page 603: "Without doubt the constitutional requirement (art. 4, § 1), that 'full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state,' implies that the public acts of every state shall be given the same effect by the courts of another state that they have by law and usage at home. This is clearly the logical result of the principles announced as early as 1813, in Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481, 3 L. ed. 411, and steadily adhered to even since.' Hancock Nat. Bank v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 642, 44 L. ed. 619, 620, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506." But the broad language of this decision, as well as the comprehensive phrase of the Constitution itself, and of the act of Congress in pursuance thereof, is to be read and interpreted in the light of the thing intended to be accomplished, and "of some established principles which they were not intended to overthrow." Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657-685, 36 L. ed. 1123-1134, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224. Many cases have arisen in which this phase of the subject has been discussed. It has been generally held that, no matter how clear may be the language of the statute, nor how decisive the decisions of the courts, of the sister state, as to the scope and effect of judgments upon residents of other states, yet in certain aspects such judgments may and ought to be narrowly scrutinized, and the constitutional injunction given a reasonable interpretation. It was said in Board of Public Works v. Columbia College, 17 Wall. 521, at page 528, 21 L. ed. 687, 691; "The clause of the Federal Constitution which requires full faith and credit to be given in each state to the records and judicial proceedings of every other state applies to the records and proceedings of courts only so far as they have jurisdiction. Wherever they want jurisdiction, the records are not entitled to credit." This was a case where three of five partners appeared in an action against the copartnership, the other two members being nonresidents, not served with process and not appearing, and under the law of New York a judgment could be rendered under these circumstances against the copartnership. But it was held that the absent partners were not bound by a judgment so entered. In D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648, a judgment was entered against a nonresident defendant who had not appeared or been served with process, in accordance with a statute of New York permitting such course where joint debtors were sued and one only appeared. This statute had been adjudged valid by the courts of New York. It was admitted that the defendant was a joint debtor with the person served in New York, yet it was held that the Constitution and act of Congress did not purport to give effect to state judgments as binding upon nonresident defendants not served with process and not appearing. See Goldey v. Morning News, 156 U. S. 518-521, 39 L. ed. 517, 518, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 559.

It was said in the recent case of Brown v. Fletcher, 210 U. S. 82-88, 52 L. ed. 966-970, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702, 703, that "the constitutional provision does not preclude the courts of a state in which the judgment . . . is presented from inquiry as to the jurisdiction of the court by which the judgment was rendered. See the elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, in Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. ed. 897. That opinion has been followed in many cases. . . . Even record recitals of jurisdictional facts do not preclude oral testimony as to the existence of those facts." Old Wayne Mut. Life Asso. v. McDonough, 204 U. S. 8, 15, 51 L. ed. 345, 348, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236. These principles are illustrated in application to a variety of facts, for example, as to whether attachment of property gives power to enter a judgment of effect beyond the property attached (Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714-730, 24 L. ed. 565-571); as to the limits of jurisdiction of parish courts in the settlement of estates (Simmons v. Saul, 138 U. S. 439-448, 34 L. ed. 1054-1059, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369); as to whether the return of service is sufficient to confer jurisdiction (Knowles v. Logansport Gaslight & Coke Co. 19 Wall. 58, 22 L. ed. 70); as to whether the judgment is responsive to the issues tendered (Reynolds v. Stockton, 140 U. S. 254-265, 35 L. ed. 464-467, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 773); as to whether an attorney had authority to appear (Cooper v. Newell, 173 U. S. 555-566, 43 L. ed. 808-811, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506; Hall v. Lanning, 91 U. S. 160, 23 L. ed. 271); as to whether the cause of action was such as to give the state court jurisdiction to render a judgment entitled, according to settled principles of public and international law, to enforcement by other courts (Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, 32 L. ed. 239, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1370); as to whether judgment rendered upon appearance by prothonotary, authorized by 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) statute of state where judgment was entered, was within the terms of a power of attorney (Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 295, 34 L. ed. 670, 672, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92); as to validity of decree of foreign court respecting devolution of real estate within another state (Clarke v. Clarke, 178 U. S. 186-195, 44 L. ed. 1028-1032, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 873); as to effect of decree for future payment of alimony (Lynde v. Lynde, 181 U. S. 183, 45 L. ed. 810, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555); as to whether divorce obtained by the court having jurisdiction of persons of both parties must be recognized in their domiciliary state (Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 47 L. ed. 366, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237; German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Dortmitzer, 192 U. S. 125-128, 48 L. ed. 373, 376, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221); as to effect of foreign divorces obtained ex parte (Bell v. Bell, 181 U. S. 175, 45 L. ed. 804, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 551; Streitwolf v. Streitwolf, 181 U. S. 179, 45 L. ed. 807, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553; Atherton v. Atherton, 181 U. S. 155, 45 L. ed. 794, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544; Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 562, 50 L. ed. 867, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525, 5 Ann. Cas. 1); as to whether one was "holder" of note within the meaning of a warrant of attorney authorizing confession of judgment (National Exch. Bank v. Wiley, 195 U. S. 257-269, 49 L. ed. 184-190, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 70); as to whether determination of domicile of deceased person, by appointment of personal representatives, foreclosed similar inquiry in other states (Thormann v. Frame, 176 U. S. 350, 44 L. ed. 500, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 446); as to whether service on public officer impliedly authorized to receive service for a foreign corporation, in respect of business transacted by it in one state, was also impliedly authorized to the same extent as to business not there transacted (Old Wayne Mut. Life Asso. v. McDonough, 204 U. S. 8-22, 51 L. ed. 345-351, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236); as to whether a corporation is really doing business in the state in which service is made, within the rule that it is essential to jurisdiction over a foreign corporation having neither property nor agent in the state, that it be doing business there (Commercial Mut. Acci. Co. v. Davis, 213 U. S. 245, and cases cited at page 255, 53 L. ed. 782, 787, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 445, 448; Caledonian Coal Co. v. Baker, 196 U. S. 432, 49 L. ed. 540, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 375); as to whether administration could be granted upon the estate of a living person (Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34, 38 L. ed. 896, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1108); as to the sufficiency of service by publication (Smith v. Woolfolk, 115 U. S. 143, 29 L. ed. 357, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177, and cases cited; Clark v. Wells, 203 U. S.

164-171, 51 L. ed. 138-141, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 43); as to whether in fact hearing had been granted to one alleged to be an alien enemy (Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914); as to judgment of foreclosure against alien enemy (Lasere v. Rochereau, 17 Wall. 437, 21 L. ed. 694); as to sufficiency of scire facias to keep alive a judgment (Owens v. Henry (Owens v. McCloskey) 161 U. S. 642, 40 L. ed. 837, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693); as to legality of constructive service (Brooklyn v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 99 U. S. 362, 25 L. ed. 416; Freeman v. Alderson, 119 U. S. 186, 30 L. ed. 372, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165; Empire Twp. v. Darlington, 101 U. S. 87, 25 L. ed. 878; Pana v. Bowler, 107 U. S. 529, 27 L. ed. 424, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 704); as to validity of statute imposing personal liability for local assessment upon nonresident landowner (Dewey v. Des Moines, 173 U. S. 193, 43 L. ed. 665, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379); as to sufficiency of any steps necessary to confer jurisdiction (Howard v. De Cordova, 177 U. S. 609, 44 L. ed. 908, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 817); as to validity of statute authorizing collection of execution for unpaid balance due on stock subscriptions from foreign stockholders in a corporation (Wilson v. Seligman, 144 U. S. 41, 36 L. ed. 338, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 541); as to whether recital of settlement of cause in a judgment rested on an unfulfilled promissory agreement (Jacobs v. Marks, 182 U. S. 583, 45 L. ed. 1241, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865); as to whether the state court, having once rendered final judgment, could without notice reopen case and enter a different judgment (Wetmore v. Karriek, 205 U. S. 141-149, 51 L. ed. 745-748, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 434). In all these cases it was held that judgments of the courts of sister states, valid there, might be refused recognition elsewhere, without doing violence to the Federal Constitution. This review of some of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States shows how full and complete is the inquiry permitted into the circumstances by which it is contended that the judgment of the court of the sister state binds the person as to whom it is invoked. Such judgments do not stand upon the same footing as domestic judgments. They may be attacked collaterally. Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 685, 36 L. ed. 1123, 1134, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224. There is nothing in the Federal Constitution or laws to prevent the most searching investigation "into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment is rendered over the subject-matter or the parties affected by it, or into the facts necessary to give such jurisdiction." Fuller, Ch. J., in Thormann v. Frame, 176 U. S. 350, 44 L. ed. 500, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 446

The present contention is that the judgment in favor of the executors of Lewisohn avails the defendant because they were privies respecting the subject-matter of the suit. We do not find it to be the law of New York that in a suit in New York the defendant would be entitled to prevail on any other ground. The underlying question is one of jurisdiction. The defendant was not a party to the suit against Lewisohn. He was not served with process. No attempt was made by himself or by the plaintiff to join him as a party. Indeed, the bill in the Lewisohn suit alleges that Bigelow cannot be made a party by reason of residence outside the jurisdiction, and this fact is not controverted. It follows that the United States circuit court for the district of New York acquired no jurisdiction to render a judgment binding upon or in favor of Bigelow, unless he was a privy with Lewisohn. It has been several times said that a judgment concludes, and may be invoked by, one who is a privy. Minneapolis Agri. & M. Asso. v. Canfield, 121 U. S. 295, 308, 30 L. ed. 962, 966, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 887; Mitchell v. First Nat. Bank, 180 U. S. 471-480, 45 L. ed. 627, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418, and cases cited. These are general statements, however, and we do not find that the precise point has ever been decided as to the effect which must be given to the judgment in the courts of one state touching privies nonresident in the first state, and domiciled in the one where the question arises. Strong arguments can be conceived to support the proposition that, except as to property rights arising by succession, only those can be bound as privies who are domiciled within the state where the judgment is rendered. But we do not pursue this inquiry. For the purposes of this discussion we assume, without deciding, that such a judgment binds privies of this description. Whether or not he was a privy is fundamental to the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court to enter judgment which as to Bigelow was capable of becoming res judicata. At the outset it is to be observed that the domicile of the defendant is in this commonwealth, and that "domicil generally determines the particular territorial jurisprudence to which every individual is subjected." Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 288, 34 L. ed. 670, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92.

The foundation of the doctrine of res judicata is that there has been a judicial inquiry into the subject-matter in which the person to be affected by the judgment has had an opportunity by representative to be heard fully. The inquiry as to jurisdiction is, in its last analysis, whether one was in such relation to the action in the sister state as to be bound by its judgment. Ordinarily, the question of jurisdiction is whether one was in law a party to the judgment. Whether a court has jurisdiction of a person depends upon whether he was really a party to it. The cases we have reviewed show that this is to be determined by the courts of the government where it arises, according to its jurisprudence, subject to the duty imposed by the Constitution of the United States. The law of the state whose courts entered the judgment does not control. Where it is not contended that one was a party, it is equally an inquiry as to jurisdiction to determine whether he was a privy to one who was a party. By parity of reasoning, whether one is a privy to a judgment rendered in a sister or foreign state must also be determined by the law of the sovereignty where the question arises. Privy was not a matter in issue in the suit, judgment in which is pleaded, nor can it be determined by an inspection of the judgment roll. It must be decided by evidence outside the record. It is not to be settled according to the law of the state where the judgment is rendered. This plainly appears from D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648. The substance of the New York statute there decided not to be entitled to full faith and credit when followed by the courts in entering judgment was that, in cases of joint debtors, all nonresidents should be privies with any domestic fellow or joint debtor duly served with process and bound by the judgment. See, to substantially the same effect, Harris v. Hardemann, 14 How. 334, 14 L. ed. 444; Ewer v. Coffin, 1 Cush. 23, 48 Am. Dec. 587; Stone v. Wainwright, 147 Mass. 201, 17 N. E. 301; Phelps v. Brewer, 9 Cush. 390, 57 Am. Dec. 56. The same principle is illustrated in Hall v. Lanning, 91 U. S. 160, 23 L. ed. 271, and Board of Public Works v. Columbia College, 17 Wall. 521, 21 L. ed. 687, where, by statute or usage, all partners were treated as so much in privy that appearance and defense by one bound all his copartners. Yet such a statute or usage was held not entitled to full faith and credit in the sister state.

We understand those Federal cases in principle to cover the question before us, and to decide in substance that legislation or judicial determination of one state, that its domestic judgments shall bind nonresidents decided by it to be privies, have no extraterritorial force, and are not entitled to recognition under the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution. The same conclusion follows from the cases above cited, which permit inquiry into the extent of the powers of an agent to subject his principal to the jurisdiction of a foreign court.

But whether or not we interpret these decisions aright, as being decisive against this contention of the defendant, it seems to us that on reason it must be the law that the ascertainment of those nonresidents not served with process nor appearing, who are bound by the judgment of a sister state as privies, must be by the courts of the jurisdiction where the question arises, and not by those of the state in which the judgment is rendered. This rests primarily upon the considerations touching the constitutional provision and the reason for its enactment. Its purpose was not to enlarge or change the jurisdiction of the courts of the several states. It was a recognized principle of international law, at the time the Constitution was adopted, that where parties had once fairly litigated a dispute in the courts of any civilized government, the same question ought not to be tried anew. But such judgments were commonly regarded as prima facie evidence of the matter decided, and might be re-examined under some circumstances; the whole subject resting in comity, and not in obligation. Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 462, 6 Am. Dec. 88; Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113-181, 40 L. ed. 95-114, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139. In this regard the several colonies, before the Declaration of Independence, were as to each other foreign nations. Differences of practice grew up as to the way in which judgments of foreign courts should be proved, and the precise weight to be attached to them. It was in this state of the law that the Constitution was adopted. Diversity of practice was turned into uniformity by the Constitution, which prescribed the effect to be given to judgments of courts, and empowered Congress to legislate further as to forms of proof. But it was not intended to enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts of the several states, or confer any new power upon them. It has simply made certain and of universal application between the several states that which before rested only in comity, and does still as to judgments of courts of foreign nations. It was intended merely to be regulative. It "establishes a rule of evidence rather than of jurisdiction." Anglo-American Provision Co. v. Davis Provision Co. 191 U. S. 373, 48 L. ed. 225, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 112, 33 L. ed. 538, 541, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269; Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 462-467, 6 Am. Dec. 88. "Judgments recovered in one state of the Union, when proved in the courts of another [government, whether state or national], differed from judgments recovered in a foreign country in no other respect than in not being re-examinable on their merits, nor impeachable for fraud in obtaining them, if rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties." Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, 292, 32 L. ed. 239, 344, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1370; Hanley v. Donoghue, 116 U. S. 1, 4, 29 L. ed. 536, 539, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242; Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113-185, 40 L. ed. 95-115, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139; Union & Planters' Bank v. Memphis, 49 C. C. A. 455-465, 111 Fed. 561, and cases cited. This is further illustrated by what was said by Mr. Justice Gray in Lynde v. Lynde, 181 U. S. 183, at page 186, 45 L. ed. 810, 814, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555, at page 556: "By the Constitution and the act of Congress requiring the faith and credit to be given to a judgment of the court of another state that it has in the state where it was rendered, it was long ago declared by this court: 'The judgment is made a debt of record not examinable upon its merits; but it does not carry with it, into another state, the efficacy of a judgment upon property or persons to be enforced by execution. To give it the force of a judgment in another state, it must be made a judgment there, and can only be executed in the latter as its laws may permit.'"

In other words, the question whether the plaintiff can try its case here against Bigelow, after failing against the estate of Lewisohn, arises after full faith and credit have been given to the New York decree, and is not included in giving it full faith and credit. The decree does not have the effect contended for by the defendant proprio vigore. Whether it should bar the plaintiff from another suit is a question of public policy. Such a question must be decided according to the law of the state where it arises.

This conclusion is strongly supported by the argument of convenience. It is a principle of the common law that a judgment binds the parties and their privies. But there is no generally prevailing definition of privy which can be automatically applied to all cases. Who are privies requires careful examination into the circumstances of each case as it arises. Its determination is often difficult for a court possessed of plenary jurisdiction. But if the question who are privies is to be decided as a fact under the law of a foreign jurisdiction, upon such evidence as the parties may be able to produce, complication is multiplied. The present case furnishes a capital illustration of the evil workings of such a rule. The courts of authority in New York seem not to have decided the precise question we now have to pass upon. Eminent lawyers have been called by both parties to testify as experts. But no two of them agree in their definition of privies, although several think that the executors of Lewisohn and the defendant were privies. There is great diversity in the details of the views expressed by those called by the defendant, as to the exact grounds upon which they say the plaintiff would be barred in the courts of New York in a suit against Bigelow. We cannot conceive that it was the intent of the framers of the Constitution to put parties to the expense, inconvenience, and unsatisfactory method of resorting to this class of testimony in order to establish their rights, when courts exist in every state, which could with much less difficulty determine the question according to the law of the forum. There is nothing inconsistent with this result in Whitman v. National Bank, 176 U. S. 559, 44 L. ed. 587, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 447, and Hancock Nat. Bank v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 44 L. ed. 619, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506. These cases decided that the liabilities imposed upon stockholders in Kansas corporations, by the Constitution and laws of that state, were contractual in their nature, and were enforceable in the courts of other jurisdictions. These decisions in effect hold that the laws of a sovereign power, as to the rights and liabilities arising out of the relations between a domestic corporation and its stockholders, are binding upon the latter as contracts, because they assented to be so bound by voluntarily becoming such stockholders. Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 516-529, 51 L. ed. 1163-1174, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755; Tilt v. Kelsey, 207 U. S. 43-47, 52 L. ed. 95-97, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, simply decided in substance that a judgment in rem by a court having jurisdiction thereof binds everybody interested in it. Laing v. Rigney, 160 U. S. 531, 40 L. ed. 525, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 366, held that on the facts shown the state court had jurisdiction of all persons sought to be charged. None of these decisions are apposite to the point now under discussion.

We are therefore of opinion that whether Bigelow was in such privy with the executors of Lewisohn, respecting the litigation in New York, as to be able to invoke, in his own defense, the judgment there rendered, is a jurisdictional question to be determined by the law of this commonwealth, subject to the Federal Constitution.

It remains to inquire whether, according to the law of this commonwealth, the circuit court for the district of New York had such jurisdiction of the defendant as to enable him to invoke its judgment as a bar in the present suit, on the ground of res judicata. This in turn depends upon the question whether the defendant was a privy with the defendants, in the Lewisohn suit, or in such relation to it that he can plead the judgment in favor of the Lewisohn estate as an estoppel against the plaintiff. The evidence shows that he knew of the suit, and through his counsel gave such assistance in the preparation of the briefs for the arguments of that suit as might have been expected. But as he was not a party, this fact is not of much importance. It is treated by most of the expert witnesses called by the defendant as to the New York law, as of no consequence. Privity depends upon the relation of the parties to the subject-matter, rather than their activity in a suit relating to it after the event. Participation in the defense because of general or personal interest in the result of the litigation does not make one privy to the judgment. Stryker v. Goodnow (Stryker v. Crane) 123 U. S. 527-540, 31 L. ed. 194-199, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 203; People v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 106 N. Y. 619, 13 N. E. 447. The liability of the defendant, as has been pointed out, according to the law of this commonwealth, is one arising ex delicto. The wrong committed was a tort, in which the defendant and Lewisohn acted in concert. The finding of the single justice, supported by the evidence, is, in substance, that they were joint tortfeasors. The inquiry then is whether one of several joint tortfeasors can plead a judgment in favor of his joint tortfeasor, against a plaintiff claiming to have been injured by their joint act, as an estoppel in a suit by the same plaintiff against himself. This can hardly be regarded as an open question in this commonwealth. In Sprague v. Oakes, 19 Pick. 455, which was an action for trespass quare clausum fregit, it was said, respecting such a defense: "The defendant was neither a party nor privy to that judgment, was not bound by it, nor could he take advantage of it." This case has never been overruled or questioned, and must be regarded as stating the law of this commonwealth. There are other authorities to the same point. Lansing v. Montgomery, 2 Johns. 382; Marsh v. Berry, 7 Cow. 344; Moore v. Tracy, 7 Wend. 229; Gittleman v. Feltman, 122 App. Div. 385, 106 N. Y. Supp. 839; Atlantic Dock Co. v. New York, 53 N. Y. 64; Tyng v. Clarke, 9 Hun, 269; Calkins v. Allerton, 3 Barb. 171, 174; Goble v. Dillon, 86 Ind. 327, 44 Am. Rep. 308; Thompson v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 71 Minn. 89, 73 N. W. 707; Three States Lumber Co. v. Blanks, 118 Tenn. 627, 102 S. W. 79. The reason upon which these decisions rest is that there can be no estoppel arising out of a judgment, unless the same parties have had their day in court touching the matter litigated, and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

unless the judgment is equally available to both parties. It requires no discussion to demonstrate that a judgment in the Lewisohn suit against the defendants would not have fixed liability upon the present defendant. Hence there can be no estoppel under our law or under the general principles of jurisprudence, because it is not mutual. Brigham v. Fayerweather, 140 Mass. 411-415, 5 N. E. 265; Dallinger v. Richardson, 176 Mass. 77-83, 57 N. E. 224; Worcester v. Green, 2 Pick. 425, 429; Biddle & S. Co. v. Burnham, 91 Me. 578, 40 Atl. 669; Moore v. Albany, 98 N. Y. 396. "Estoppels to be good must be mutual." Litchfield v. Goodnow (Litchfield v. Crane) 123 U. S. 549-552, 31 L. ed. 199-202, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210; Nelson v. Brown, 144 N. Y. 390, 39 N. E. 355.

Bigelow could not have appeared as of right and made a defense in that suit. No judgment can be regarded as res judicata as to any matter where the rights in the subject-matter arise out of mutuality, and not by succession, unless the party could, as matter of right, appear and defend, even though he may have had knowledge of the suit. Otherwise, he might be bound by a judgment as to which he had never had the opportunity to be heard, which is opposed to the first principles of justice. Brabrook v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 104 Mass. 228, 233, 6 Am. Rep. 222. There is no privity between joint wrongdoers, because all are jointly and severally liable. Corey v. Havener, 182 Mass. 250, 65 N. E. 69; Feneff v. Boston & M. R. Co. 196 Mass. 575, 581, 82 N. E. 705; Pinkerton v. Randolph, 200 Mass. 24, 28, 85 N. E. 892. There is no right of contribution between joint wrongdoers, where they are in pari delicto with each other. Churchill v. Holt, 127 Mass. 165, 34 Am. Rep. 355. They are equally culpable, and the wrong complained of results from their joint effort. The right of recovery over by a municipality against a person whose wrong created a defect in the highway (Holyoke v. Hadley Water-Power Co. 174 Mass. 424, 54 N. E. 889) is no exception to this rule, because the tort committed by each of the wrongdoers is diverse in character, and rests upon a different basis of liability, and there is a right of indemnity in favor of the municipality. Lowell v. Glidden, 159 Mass. 317-319, 34 N. E. 459. We are aware of no instance of joint participation in a common tortious enterprise where there is any right of contribution. One comprehensive definition of privies is such persons as are "privies in estate, as donor and donee, lessor and lessee, and joint tenants; or privies in blood, as heir and ancestor; or privies in representation, as executor and testator, or administrator and intestate; or privies in law, where the law without privity in blood or estate casts land upon another by escheat." Buckingham v. Ludlum, 37 N. J. Eq. 137, 141; Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 35-53. Joint tort feassors come within none of the classes thus described. The definition in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 535, adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in Litchfield v. Goodnow (Litchfield v. Crane) 123 U. S. 549-551, 31 L. ed. 199-201, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 210, 211, namely, "Mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property" equally fails to include joint tort feassors.

If we turn to the law of privity as illustrated in actions against partnership and joint debtors, the soundness of this conclusion is confirmed. It has been repeatedly decided that an administrator of a decedent in one jurisdiction is not in privity with an administrator of the same estate appointed in another jurisdiction, and that a judgment against one such administrator is not res judicata to the other. Ingersoll v. Coram, 211 U. S. 335, 53 L. ed. 208, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 92, and cases cited; Johnson v. Powers, 139 U. S. 156, 35 L. ed. 112, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525. In Chase v. Henry, 166 Mass. 577, 55 Am. St. Rep. 423, 44 N. E. 988, it was held that discharge in insolvency in this commonwealth did not bar the debt of a copartnership, one member of which was a nonresident, although two were residents and the copartnership had a regular place of business here. It has been several times held that judgment against one surviving partner upon a claim against the partnership was not admissible in evidence against the executors of a deceased partner, although the existence of the partnership was not disputed. Buckingham v. Ludlum, 37 N. J. Eq. 137; Moore's Appeal, 34 Pa. 411; Sturges v. Beach, 1 Conn. 507; Larison v. Hager (C. C.) 44 Fed. 49. The converse, which is exactly parallel to the present case, namely, that a judgment in favor of one partner or joint and several debtor will not avail his associate in liability, has often been decided. Townsend v. Riddle, 2 N. H. 448; McLelland v. Ridgeway, 12 Ala. 482; State Bank v. Robinson, 13 Ark. 214-221; Detroit v. Houghton, 42 Mich. 459, 460, 4 N. W. 171, 287. It is difficult to conceive of persons more closely identified with their common business than joint debtors and partners, and if judgments against one do not bind his associate, we do not see how persons occupying the less intimate relation to each other, which Bigelow and Lewisohn did, can be found as privies. See also 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Apart from authority and on principle, the same result seems necessary. Joint tort feassors act in unison respecting a common wrongful enterprise. It is one of the penalties which the common law (differing in this respect from the civil law) inflicts upon those who jointly engage in intentional violation of the rights of others, that each shall be left to bear the natural results of his conduct. Courts will not lend their aid in adjusting the conflicting claims of wrongdoers touching their own turpitude. An injured party is given the right to pursue his remedy, either singly or together, against those who thus cause injury, and may proceed to judgment against all in separate actions. He is barred only by a satisfaction. An inevitable corollary of these generally undisputed propositions, and one consonant with a fundamental sense of justice, is that a party has a right to try his case against everybody who has done him a wrong by immediate and direct culpable action. He is not precluded by a failure against one alleged joint wrongdoer from attempting to pursue another. He is entitled to his day in court against a particular adversary. We believe there are no exceptions to this rule stated in this form. The cases where judgment in favor of an active agent or servant avails a passive principal or master (Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Stratton's Independence, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 677, 85 C. C. A. 393, 158 Fed. 63, and cases cited), or where the relation of indemnitor and indemnitee exists (Port Jervis v. First Nat. Bank, 96 N. Y. 550), do not constitute exceptions to this rule, but stand on a different ground.

For another reason the New York judgment in favor of Lewisohn seems not to be a bar. The joint actor with the defendant was not the defendant in the New York suit, but it was prosecuted against his executors. If it be assumed that there was a kind of privity between the two who acted in concert, that privity was broken by the death of one. There is no privity between Lewisohn's executors and Bigelow. Ela v. Edwards, 13 Allen, 48, 90 Am. Dec. 174; Merrill v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 103 Mass. 245-249, 4 Am. Rep. 548; Thomson v. American Surety Co. 170 N. Y. 109, 62 N. E. 1073. It cannot be said that the plaintiff has elected to pursue his remedy against the estate of Lewisohn to the exclusion of his rights against Bigelow. As between joint tort feassors the doctrine of election has no application, and moreover the plaintiff sought the New York forum voluntarily only in the sense of being compelled to go there that a court might acquire jurisdiction of those defendants. The determination that the relation between Lewisohn and Bigelow was that of joint tortfeasors respecting a cause of action arising ex delicto disposes also of the argument pressed by the defendant, that Lewisohn was trustee, agent, or representative of Bigelow to such an extent that he was in privity with him. See Bigelow v. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. 74 N. J. Eq. 457, 71 Atl. 153-176. The conclusion is therefore that the matters set up in the supplemental answers do not preclude the plaintiff from continuing the prosecution of the present suits.

Both parties have introduced a large amount of evidence as to the law of New York touching the effect which would by its courts be accorded to the judgment against the plaintiff in the Lewisohn litigation, in a suit like the present pending in its courts against the defendant. In the view which we take of this case that question has become wholly immaterial, and we do not pass upon it.

13. The defendant has briefly argued that a decision for the plaintiff in these suits involves a denial to him of due process of law, the equal protection of the laws, and an impairment of the obligation of contracts. It does not seem necessary to discuss these arguments further than to say that they do not appear to us to have any application to the issues here pending.

14. The present cases were upon the calendar of the full court for argument at its January sitting, 1908. Upon motion of the defendant, based upon representations as to the need of delay to enable him to prepare a brief, they were assigned as the first cases for argument at the March sitting of this court, 1908. A few days before the coming in of the court at that sitting, the present defendant applied to the court of chancery in the state of New Jersey, where the plaintiff is domiciled, and secured a temporary injunction against its prosecution of these suits. The suit in New Jersey was decided adversely to the plaintiff by the chancellor, in whose elaborate opinion one of the vice chancellors concurred, on August 8, 1908. Bigelow v. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. supra. This decision was not by the court of last resort, and the present defendant, the plaintiff there, asserted that he intended to prosecute and appeal to the highest court in the state of New Jersey. Thereupon, on motion, an interlocutory decree was entered by a single justice of this court, restraining the defendant, "his attorneys, agents, and servants, from further prosecuting the action commenced by said Bigelow against the plaintiff in the court of chancery of the state of New Jersey, . . . and from commencing or prosecuting any other suit or proceeding, either in law or in equity, except in this court, against the plaintiff to prevent it from obtaining the final decision and decree of this court, or in any manner to delay or impede the presentation of said case." These suits were then pending before the full court under Rev. Laws, chap. 159, § 19. This statute, however, does not prevent the entering by a single justice of decrees respecting interlocutory matters which may call for a speedy hearing and decision, but in no wise affecting the questions covered by the final decree. Rev. Laws, chap. 159, §§ 17, 21, 22; Parker v. Nickerson, 137 Mass. 487, 491. The defendant appealed from this interlocutory decree and from a refusal of the single justice to modify or vacate it.

It is a general principle of chancery jurisprudence that, as between courts of co-ordinate and concurrent jurisdiction, the court which first obtains possession of a transaction shall dispose of it without interference from other courts. Riggs v. Johnson County, 6 Wall. 166, 196, 18 L. ed. 768, 776; Home Ins. Co. v. Howell, 24 N. J. Eq. 238. The jurisdiction of courts of equity to restrain a citizen suitor from prosecuting litigation in another state is well settled. Cunningham v. Butler, 142 Mass. 47, 56 Am. Rep. 657, 6 N. E. 782; s. c. sub nom. Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269. The present suits were begun October 7, 1902. This court plainly had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties. The defendant made no contest in these respects, but proceeded to hearing upon the merits, and accepted the jurisdiction of the court up to the point of argument before the full bench. It was manifestly proper that at this stage of the proceedings, in view of his conduct of the suits theretofore, he should be restrained from attempting to interfere in courts of other jurisdiction with the conclusion of this litigation. It is hardly necessary to say that the interlocutory decree does not purport to restrain him from enforcing whatever rights he may have to a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to the final judgments which may be entered in this court. His full rights under the Federal Constitution are preserved.

The decrees are to be so modified as to include the costs of these appeals, and as modified are affirmed.

So ordered.

Knowlton, Ch. J., dissenting:

This is an important case. The decrees from which the appeal was taken to this court call for the payment of considerably more than $2,000,000. The questions of law involved are far-reaching. As I do not agree to the opinion of the majority of the court, I deem it my duty to state the reasons for my dissent.

The fundamental question is: What right and power has a corporation to bind itself, acting through its stockholders in confirmation of the doings of its directors, in the transaction of business, after it has been completely organized under the law of the state of New Jersey, and after the amount of the capital required to authorize it to do business under the statute has been paid in, but before the whole of its capital stock has been issued or subscribed for? The plaintiff corporation was established under the laws of the state of New Jersey. Its rights and powers, and the rights of its stockholders, depend upon the law of that state. Unless it has suffered a wrong as a corporation of that state, it has no standing here.

To organize a corporation under the laws of New Jersey, articles of association in writing must be signed by not less than three persons, stating the name of the company, the place or places where its business is to be conducted, the object for which it is to be formed, "the total amount of the capital stock of such company, which shall not be less than $2,000 the amount with which they will commence business, which shall not be less than $1,000, and the number of shares into which the same is divided, and the par value of each share." It must also contain a statement of the names and residences of the stockholders and the number of shares held by each, with the "periods at which such company shall commence and terminate, not exceeding fifty years." 1 Gen. Stat. (N. J.) 1895, pp. 912, 946, "Corporations" §§ 10, 11, 189. The certificate must be proved and acknowledged, and then recorded as deeds of real estate are required to be recorded. It must also be filed in the office of the secretary of state. When this has been done, the company is a corporation from the time of the commencement of the period fixed in the certificate.

The report of the single justice, with the evidence, shows that the plaintiff corporation was organized in all respects in compliance with the statute, that the requisite amount of capital to qualify it to commence business was paid in in cash, and that the corporation was legally authorized to do any business within the purposes of its organization. Although by a small part of its authorized capital had been paid in or subscribed for, it was permitted by law to exercise all the powers of a corporation and to perform all its contemplated functions for fifty years, if it could obtain money or credit sufficient for the purpose. It then made contracts with the defendant, Bigelow, and his associate, Lewisohn, who were the promoters of it, and who therefore stood in fiduciary relations to it, which contracts would be voidable as fraudulent for that reason, unless there was a full and fair disclosure of the facts to the corporation, as represented either by an independent board of directors, who were in a position properly to protect its rights, or by its existing stockholders, who were the owners of it. The directors were selected by the defendant and Lewisohn, and they were not impartial and independent officers, qualified properly to represent the corporation in matters where its interests might be adverse to those of the promoters. Indeed, as stockholders, they were then the representatives of the promoters. The capital which they paid in under their subscriptions was paid with money furnished by the promoters, and the beneficial interest in all the stock of the company, as it was then organized, was in the defendant and Lewisohn, who were the real owners of the entire corporation. Under these contracts, and in payment for property conveyed to the corporation, 30,000 shares of stock were issued to the defendant and Lewisohn, and taken in their names, and 100,000 shares were issued to Philip E. Dumaresq, "who took them as the nominee, and for the benefit and subject to the orders, of the defendant and Lewisohn." These shares "were held for and controlled by the defendant and Lewisohn." Twenty thousand shares more, which made up the total authorized capital of the company, were found by the judge to have been still the property of the corporation itself, and they were intended to be issued to independent subscribers for a working capital. They then stood in the name of Thomas Nelson, treasurer. More than two months after the original contracts were made, and while the ownership of the stock was as above stated, all the directors of the corporation signed, in the record book, a statement approving of the previous action of the board in making these contracts, and a similar statement was signed by the defendant and Lewisohn and Dumaresq as stockholders, and by Nelson as a stockholding treasurer.

Upon these findings the defendant and Lewisohn were the owners of all the authorized capital stock of the corporation, except the 20,000 shares in the treasury, which belonged to the corporation, and through the corporation they owned that also. As stockholders, they knew all the facts affecting the validity or propriety of the contracts which they had made with the company. At that time they had no interest adverse to that of the corporation, for they were the sole owners of the corporation. One question is whether this ratification with full knowledge, by all the stockholders, was binding upon the corporation. Another question is whether the contracts were valid when originally made, having been agreed to with full knowledge by the only persons beneficially interested in the corporation. More specifically, the broad question is whether a corporation, which has full power to make every other kind of a contract within the purposes of its organization, is powerless to make a contract, or through its stockholders to ratify a contract, with one standing in a fiduciary relation to it.

There is no question of fraud upon the corporation; for all of the owners of it were fully informed in regard to the transactions and approved of them. Under such circumstances there can be no fraud. After a corporation is fully organized, the stockholders for the time being own and control it. In a broad sense, they are the corporation, although the corporation as a separate entity may exercise its powers as an individual, under their direction and for their benefit. The power of a corporation through its stockholders, choosing proper agents, to deal formally with those in a fiduciary relation to it, is established beyond the possibility of question. It matters not that the fiduciaries are themselves stockholders, if the other stockholders are not misled. And it matters not whether they constitute all of the stockholders, or only a part of them, if all the stockholders know all the facts and consent to the transaction.

The only question that seems to me debatable on this branch of the case is whether the power of the corporation, or of its stockholders, to act in matters of this kind, is taken away by the fact that its stock is not all issued, and that a part of it is retained to be issued to obtain working capital or for other purposes. On principal, it is difficult to see how this can affect its right under the law to do business of this kind, as it may do business of every other kind.

It is suggested that to make contracts with one in a fiduciary relation may be detrimental to the interests of the corporation, and constitute a fraud upon persons subsequently subscribing for stock not then issued, even if the existing stockholders know all the facts and are content. But it is to be noticed that, under the law of New Jersey, the organization of a corporation does not necessarily give any indication or suggestion as to the value of its stock. It does not indicate that more than $1,000 of capital has been actually paid in, if that sum is fixed in the articles of association as the amount necessary to qualify it to do business. As to the balance of the shares, it does not show whether much, or little, or nothing at all, has been paid upon them. It does not indicate that contracts have or have not been made with the corporation, and, if they have been made, whether they are advantageous or disadvantageous to it. Under this system, everybody is bound to know that, apart from the general facts of organization which appear of record, one buying stock or subscribing for it must ascertain by inquiry if he would know whether it is of large value or of no value. Evidently the statute was intended to give very broad latitude to organizers of corporations, and to give corporations full powers to contract while only a small amount of stock has been issued, which may be owned by a very few persons.

Promoters, as well as directors, stand in a fiduciary relation to a corporation. They do not stand in such a relation directly to particular stockholders, or to a particular class of stockholders. Their relation to stockholders is only as the stockholders claim through the corporation by virtue of their ownership of it. Through the corporation, promoters and directors stand in this relation to those who own stock while their fiduciary relation to the corporation continues. They are never in such a relation to those who become stockholders after their relation to the corporation has ended. Their fiduciary relation to the corporation extends through it to all the owners of it. The stockholders for the time being are all the owners of it. These stockholders can sell its property, or wind it up, or control it, as they please. No one else has any interest in it, and the directors or promoters have no relations as such, to anyone else. If additional stock is issued after their relations to the corporations are terminated, they are not, and they never were, in fiduciary relations to the takers of this new stock. In this respect there is no difference between directors and promoters. All this is said in reference to corporations which are regularly and completely organized, and are authorized to do business and fully to exercise their powers and franchises under the law, notwithstanding that a part of their authorized capital has not been taken. Of course, if a corporation is merely in an inchoate condition, and has not acquired the power to exercise its franchises, a different rule would apply. So, too, promoters may enter into arrangements with underwriters or syndicates or single persons who expect to take stock, and may thus assume obligations. In the present cases I do not intimate that the defendant might not be held liable to some of the persons who arranged with him to take a part in the enterprise.

But whatever may be thought of the conduct of promoters who made contracts with a corporation while they are the sole owners of it, and whether it be held that their fiduciary relations extend to future stockholders or only to those who are the owners while this relation exists, the question before us is whether, under the law of New Jersey, a corporation is powerless to bind itself as to such contracts, when they are entered into with the assent of the existing stockholders, all of whom have full knowledge of the facts. On principle, I think that a corporation organized in that state is not so crippled. Let us consider the authorities.

Re Ambrose Lake Tin & Copper Min. Co. L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 390, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 457, 42 L. T. N. S. 804, 28 Week. Rep. 783, was a case in which a sale of property was made to a corporation by the promoters of it, which would have been voidable for fraud if the promoters had not been the owners of its stock. It was held that, inasmuch as the vendors were themselves the stockholders of the company and knew all the facts, there was no fraud upon the corporation. In this case the judges thought that one of the purposes of these promoters was to obtain profit from future purchasers of the stock who were ignorant of the transaction; but under the circumstances the corporation could not avoid the contract. In North-West Transp. Co. v. Beatty, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 589, a contract of purchase of property by a corporation was entered into by directors with one of their number. It was held that the vendor was entitled to exercise his voting power as a stockholder to ratify the contract. He controlled a majority of the votes through ownership of his stock, acquired in a manner authorized by the constitution of the company. It was held that his exercise of his power could not be deemed oppressive for this reason. Sir Richard Baggallay, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the privy council, said: "Unless some provision to the contrary is to be found in the charter or other instrument by which the company is incorporated, the resolution of a majority of the shareholders duly convened, upon any question with which the company is legally competent to deal, is binding upon the minority, and consequently upon the company. And every shareholder has a perfect right to vote 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) upon any such question, although he may have a personal interest in the subject-matter opposed to, or different from, the general or particular interests of the company." Referring to dealings with a director acting in a fiduciary capacity, he said: "Any such dealing or engagement may, however, be affirmed or adopted by the company, provided such affirmation or adoption is not brought about by unfair or improper means, and is not illegal or fraudulent or oppressive towards those shareholders who oppose it." In this case ratification was by only a small majority of the stockholders.

Salomon v. Salomon & Co. [1897] A. C. 22, was a case in which the proprietor of a business organized a corporation with a capital stock of 40,000 shares, of the par value of £1 each. He, his wife, his daughter, and his four sons took (1) share each. With only (7) shares taken, he sold out his business to the corporation for a price which might be found to be much more than it was worth. He then took 20,000 shares more of the stock. The remaining 19,993 shares never were issued. The company soon became insolvent, and a receiver, in the interest of creditors, sought to hold this organizer and promoter for fraud upon the corporation. It was held upon these facts that there was no fraud and no liability. Lord Chancellor Halsbury quoted from the headnote in Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218, 39 L. T. N. S. 269, 26 Week. Rep. 65, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 777, and then said: "But if every member of the company—every shareholder—knows exactly what is the true state of the facts (which for this purpose must be assumed to be the case here), Vaughan Williams's J., conclusion seems to me to be inevitable, that no case of fraud upon the company could here be established." He said this in a case in which only seven shares of stock out of an authorized capital of 40,000 shares had been issued when the contract with the promoter was made. This case seems to me fully to cover the case at bar, in which the only fraud proved was the constructive fraud of a sale to a corporation from one in a fiduciary relation to it.

Other cases establish the proposition that it makes no difference that not all the stock of the company has been issued, if the holders of all outstanding stock agree. In St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Tiernan, 37 Kan. 606, 15 Pac. 544; and Stewart v. St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. (C. C.) 41 Fed. 736, a part of the stock, although not a large amount, was issued to municipalities after the transaction to which the stockholders agreed. In Hutchinson v.

Simpson, 92 App. Div. 382, 87 N. Y. Supp. 369, a large amount of stock was held in the treasury for other corporate uses. The same was true in Blum v. Whitney, 185 N. Y. 232, 77 N. E. 1159, which, in its reasoning and the authorities cited, is a very strong case for the defendant. Only a part of the authorized stock had been issued when the contract was made in Re British Seamless Paper Box Co. L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 467, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 497, 44 L. T. N. S. 498, 29 Week Rep. 690, and more was issued about a year and a quarter afterwards. Tompkins v. Sperry, 96 Md. 560, 54 Atl. 254, is an important case supporting the proposition that stockholders may bind the corporation in transactions of this kind, which are voidable for constructive fraud. Except as I shall state hereafter, I know of no case which holds that it makes any difference that not all the stock has been issued, if the corporation is completely organized and authorized to go on with its ordinary business. There are dicta of some English judges, indicating that such a transaction, when it is expected that a prospectus will be issued under the English practice inviting subscriptions for stock from the public, would be fraudulent as against future stockholders. These are in opinions in which the judges hold that there is no fraud upon the corporation, as there was knowledge and consent of the stockholders, and they seem to assume that the corporation is not fully organized and qualified to do business. But they are without discussion or seeming consideration of the question when a corporation and its stockholders become competent to make binding contracts as to such matters. Other cases which support the defendant's position are Foster v. Seymour (C. C.) 23 Blatchf. 107, 23 Fed. 65, McCracken v. Robison, 6 C. C. A. 400, 14 U. S. App. 602, 57 Fed. 375, and Barr v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 263, 26 N. E. 145.

This court, in Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310, 49 L.R.A. 725, 57 N. E. 656, in dealing with a corporation established under the laws of Tennessee, held that the receivers of the company might maintain a suit for fraud against promoters, notwithstanding that the stockholders, at the time of the transaction, knew all the facts and agreed to the contract. The particulars of the statute of Tennessee as to the organization of corporations do not appear in the report of the case. When the present suits came before the court upon a demurrer, Hayward v. Leeson was followed and held to govern them. 188 Mass. 315, 108 Am. St. Rep. 479, 74 N. E. 653. The precise questions which were then before us have been considered by the circuit court 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the United States and the United States circuit court of appeals in the second circuit, in a suit brought by this plaintiff against Lewisohn's heirs, and upon a demurrer to averments of fact against Lewisohn substantially identical with those against the defendant in the present suits, there was a decision for the defendants. Old Dominion Copper Min. Co. v. Lewisohn (C. C.) 136 Fed. 915, s. c. 79 C. C. A. 534, 148 Fed. 1020. As appears by the record before us, five judges of the Federal courts in that circuit, at different stages of the proceeding, agreed in their view of the law of the case. The suit was then carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the justices of that court were unanimous in sustaining the defendants' demurrer. Upon the averments of the bill, they treated Bigelow and Lewisohn as the real owners of the corporation when the contracts were made, through their appointees, who took the stock which they paid for. The judge who wrote the opinion sat as chief justice with those other members of this court who took part in the decision of Hayward v. Leeson. The view expressed in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States is at variance with a part of the reasoning and with the decision in Hayward v. Leeson. This latest decision must be treated as establishing the law for the Federal courts. The cases cited show that the law is settled in the same way in some of the state courts.

In addition to the deference that a unanimous opinion of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States should receive in any other court, it is for me a very important consideration that, upon questions which will often be litigated in the Federal tribunals by reason of the divorce citizenship of the parties, the law ought to be the same in the state courts as in the Federal courts. It would be unfortunate if, in this large class of cases, the rights of a suitor should depend upon whether he is finally held subject to the jurisdiction of a Federal court or to that of a state court.

It seems to me that the great weight of authority upon the turning point of this case is in favor of the defendant. I do not regard the case of Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218, 39 L. T. N. S. 269, 26 Week. Rep. 65, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 777 (L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 73, 46 L. J. Ch. N. S. 425, 36 L. T. N. S. 222, 25 Week. Rep. 436), relied on by the plaintiff, as having any bearing upon the question on which the present case turns, namely, when is a corporation so far organized that its stockholders, acting with full knowledge, can bind it? No such question arose in that case, and there was no occasation to consider such a question. So far as appears, the question was never thought of. The court was dealing with a fraud upon a corporation whose stockholders were ignorant of the facts that constituted the fraud, and took no action in regard to the matter. It seems to me that the dicta of certain English judges relied on by the majority of the court overlook the fact that the fiduciary relation of promoters of a corporation is of no practical consequence if the promoters are the sole owners of the corporation, and if, at the time of the transaction in question, the corporation is legally organized and qualified to do every kind of business, although this fact is generally recognized by the English courts. I also think that the judges uttering the dicta were influenced by the statutory provision in the English law for the issuing of a prospectus to the public, inviting subscriptions to the stock after the corporation is organized in other particulars. There is no such provision in the statute of New Jersey.

It is also to be remembered that the dicta were uttered in connection with decisions that the corporation was bound by the knowledge and action of all its existing stockholders, notwithstanding that only a part of the authorized stock had been taken. One or two of the dicta are in other cases in which no question in regard to action by all the stockholders with knowledge arose. In Pietsch v. Milbrath, 123 Wis. 647, 651, 68 L.R.A. 945, 107 Am. St. Rep. 1017, 101 N. W. 388, 102 N. W. 342, it appears that the plaintiffs took their stock upon grossly false representations as to the organization of the corporation, and they were allowed a remedy. Yeiser v. United States Board & Paper Co. 52 L.R.A. 724, 46 C. C. A. 567, 107 Fed. 340, 348, was a case of gross, active fraud, and some stockholders who were ignorant of the facts were brought in before the transaction in question was consummated. Of course, this decision is of no effect as against the later adjudication in 210 U. S. 206, 52 L. ed. 1025, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634, covering the precise question before us. Neither of these two cases seems to me important in reference to the question on which the present decision depends. I think the corporation in the present case is bound by the knowledge and consent of its stockholders.

The defendant relies upon the independent defense that the decision against the plaintiff, upon the same averments of fact in the suit against the other of the two joint actors, is a bar to the present claim, as res judicata. Evidence was introduced to 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

prove the law of New York, where the decree was entered. The defendant called thirteen witnesses of the greatest eminence and distinction, who testified as experts in law that, in their opinion, under the law of New York, the decree would be a bar to these suits, if they were brought against this defendant in the courts of that state. Many of these witnesses had had a long judicial experience. Three of them had sat in the court of appeals, two of them for long terms, and one as a chief judge. Several others had served a long time in the supreme court of New York, sitting in the general term and in the appellate division. Others had held other high positions in their profession, and all of them were lawyers whose opinions are entitled to great weight. The plaintiff called two eminent lawyers, who expressed a contrary opinion. Many decisions of the courts of New York were also put in evidence. The defendant contended that, if the decree is a bar under the law of New York, it is equally so when pleaded in Massachusetts.

If it were necessary to consider this branch of the defense, it perhaps would be a grave question whether the defense was or was not made out. But as to that I express no opinion, preferring to rest this opinion on the other ground.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Morton concurs in this opinion.

Hammond, J., dissenting:

Upon the questions (1) whether the facts found by the single justice are supported by the evidence and should stand; (2) whether "the transaction is to be determined by the law of Massachusetts;" (3) whether the plaintiff has been guilty of laches; (4) what shall be the nature of the relief (if there is any relief); (5) what effect shall be given to the judgment rendered in the Lewisohn Case by the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York; (6) whether a decision for the plaintiff in these suits involves a denial to the defendant of due process of law, or the equal protection of the laws; and (7) whether the interlocutory order entered by a single justice enjoining the defendant from further prosecuting his suit against the plaintiff elsewhere except in this court should stand,—I agree with the majority of the court.

But upon the question on the merits, namely, whether upon the facts found the defendant is answerable to the plaintiff, I agree with the dissenting opinion filed by the chief justice; and for the reasons stated therein I think that the bills should be dismissed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA EX REL.
THOMAS H. POOLE, Resp't.,

v.

AMASA P. PEAKE, Adjutant General,
Appt.

(— N. D. —, 135 N. W. 197.)

Certiorari — court-martial proceedings — review.

1. Relator, Thos. H. Poole, as Brigadier General (retired) of the National Guard of this state, was tried and convicted by a general court-martial of certain alleged felonies claimed to have been committed by him in violation of the Articles of War of the United States. The judgment and sentence of such court-martial, which dismissed him from the National Guard, were approved by the Governor and Commander in Chief of the militia, by the issuance of an order accordingly. Relator sued out a writ of certiorari in the district court of Bur-

Headnotes by FISK, J.

Note. — Are state militias subject to the Articles of War of the United States.

It is clear that state militias are not subject to the Articles of War of the United States in times of peace, unless such Articles have been adopted or promulgated by the state as a part of the state regulations. This was the rule adhered to in STATE EX REL. POOLE v. PEAKE, and it finds support in the following additional decisions:

Thus, in Manley v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 137 S. W. 1137, it was held that where the Governor, who alone was authorized to prescribe regulations for the state militia, had not adopted and promulgated the United States Army regulations, such regulations were not applicable thereto in times of peace, and that therefore an officer of the state militia could not be court-martialed thereunder.

And in Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. 19, 6 L. ed. 537, it was held that a state militiaman who has refused to obey an order of the President, calling him into the public service, was not, in the sense of the act of Congress of 1795, chapter 101, "employed in the service of the United States," so as to subject him to the rules and Articles of War; thus, in effect, holding that such Articles do not apply to militiamen 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) leigh county for the purpose of obtaining a review of such judgment and order. This appeal is from the judgment of that court holding the judgment and order aforesaid null and void as being without and in excess of jurisdiction. Held, that certiorari is a proper remedy to review the proceedings of a court-martial for the purpose of determining whether it exceeded its jurisdiction.

Militia — Articles of War — binding effect.

2. The Articles of War of the United States do not govern the militia or National Guard of this state in times of peace, and consequently relator was not amenable to general court-martial for the alleged violations of such Articles of War. Hence, the district court properly held that the judgment and sentence of such court-martial and the order of the Governor and Commander in Chief approving the same were null and void, because in excess of jurisdiction.

(January 6, 1912.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Burleigh County, annulling, upon certiorari, a judgment of a court-martial dismissing relator from service in the National Guard. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Andrew Miller and Melvin A. Hildreth for appellant.

Messrs. Engerud, Holt, & Frame for respondent.

except when they are in the actual service of the United States. And in Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, it was held that the mere calling forth of the militia by the President does not render them subject to the Articles of War. See also 1 Winthrop, Military Law & Precedents, p. 126.

And it has been held that a refusal to obey an order to arms emanating from the Governor of a state does not render a delinquent amenable to the Articles of War. 1 Ops. Atty. Gen. 473.

But the Articles of War of the United States may be adopted and incorporated in a state code of regulations, and in case of such an adoption the state militia is subject thereto. McGorray v. Murphy, 80 Ohio St. 413, 88 N. E. 881, 17 Ann. Cas. 444. And see Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19, wherein it was held that a state may provide that the state militia shall be subject to the Articles of War of the United States, and may also provide for the trial of such militiamen by a state court-martial, and that such a suit is not repugnant to the laws and Constitution of the United States.

As to superintending control of civil courts over courts-martial, see note to State ex rel. Poole v. Nuchols, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 413.

G. J. C.

Fisk, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While fully realizing that we are in no manner responsible either for the facts or the law which must control in disposing of this appeal, the duty which has been assigned the writer of giving expression to the views of the court is not a pleasant one, owing to the nature of the litigation, and more especially in view of the fact that our conclusion does not coincide with the views entertained by the Chief Executive of the state, as well as by prominent officers of the National Guard, who were instrumental in instituting and prosecuting the proceeding before the general court-martial, hereafter mentioned, out of which proceeding this litigation arose. Although the views of these high officials of a co-ordinate branch of the state government are entitled in case of doubt to much respect and weight relative to the extent of the powers delegated to them by the Constitution and statutes, yet such views, when clearly erroneous, must be declared so by the courts, and the acts of such officials, when manifestly in excess of jurisdiction, must be adjudged null and void whenever their legality is properly challenged in court, for otherwise the court would not be discharging its constitutional duty.

The facts necessary to a full understanding of the questions involved are correctly stated in appellant's brief, and in substance are as follows: This cause comes to this court on appeal from a judgment of the district court of the sixth judicial district, entered on the 8th day of January, 1911, which in effect vacates and annuls the findings and sentence of a general court-martial which found the respondent, Thomas H. Poole, guilty of having violated the Military Code of this state, and dismissing him from the service of the National Guard of the state. The respondent was tried before a general court-martial on the 12th day of January, 1909. He was found guilty of having violated both the twenty-first and the sixty-first Articles of War, and sentenced by the court "to be dismissed from the service of the National Guard of the state of North Dakota." This sentence was approved by the Governor of the state. On the 7th day of August, 1909, on application of respondent, a writ of certiorari was issued, directed to Amasa P. Peake, as Adjutant General of the state, requiring him to certify and transmit to the district court of the sixth judicial district a true and full record of all the proceedings of said general court-martial and the orders of the Governor, and praying that all the said proceedings be declared null and void, and that the respondent be restored to his rank of a Brigadier General (retired) in the North Dakota National Guard. The court made findings and an order for judgment, which adjudged and determined that "the order made and issued by Hon. John Burke, as Governor and Commander in Chief of the National Guard of the state of North Dakota, on the 12th day of January, 1909, directing and ordering that a general court-martial be convened to hear and try certain charges and specifications against the relator, Thomas H. Poole, be and the same is hereby held to be null and void and without jurisdiction. And said court-martial convened and held pursuant to said order, and all its proceedings and acts, sentence, and judgment are hereby set aside and annulled. And it is further adjudged, determined, and decreed that the order of the Honorable John Burke, as Governor and Commander in Chief, made March 1, 1909, approving the proceedings, findings, sentence, and judgment of said court-martial and purporting to remove and discharge said Thomas H. Poole from the organized militia of this state, and depriving him of his rank as Brigadier General on the retired list, is hereby declared null and void and of no effect."

The assignments of error challenge the jurisdiction of the court below to inquire into the validity of the proceedings before the general court-martial, or to enter the judgment appealed from. Notwithstanding the statement to the contrary in appellant's additional memorandum brief filed herein, no question was raised in that court that certiorari is not an appropriate remedy, but appellant's contention there was merely as above stated. In such additional brief counsel assert that such question was squarely raised in the court below on the motion to quash the writ. In this they are clearly in error. In the first place, such motion and the ruling thereon are not properly before us, as no statement of the case was settled. Mooney v. Donovan, 9 N. D. 93, 81 N. W. 50. In the second place, conceding, for the sake of argument, that they are properly before us, such motion to quash did not raise such question. The grounds of the motion are, in substance, as follows: (1) It appears on the face of said writ that the general court-martial complained of was legally assembled, organized, and constituted; (2) that said Thomas H. Poole was at the time a member of the National Guard of the state of North Dakota; (3) that said court-martial had jurisdiction over the person of Thomas H. Poole; (4) that said court-martial had jurisdiction over the subject-matter; (5) that said court-martial, acting within its jurisdiction, rendered judgment finding the defendant guilty as charged in the specifications; (6) that his excellency, the Governor, as Commander in Chief of the National Guard, approved said judgment; and (7) that this court is without jurisdiction to inquire into, review, or question the proceedings of said court-martial, or the orders of the Governor and Commander in Chief in relation thereto.

It is therefore clearly apparent from the above that no question as to the correctness of the remedy invoked was made in the court below, as each ground of the motion went to the merits, and consequently appellant is not in a position to raise such question for the first time in this court. But if we could brush aside these well-settled rules of practice, we would nevertheless be obliged to overrule appellant's contention, for it is entirely clear that certiorari is an appropriate writ to review the proceedings of such court-martial for the purpose of determining whether it exceeded its jurisdiction. While it is no doubt true that it was not a "court" within the meaning of §§ 85 and 86 of our state Constitution, nor within the meaning of § 7810, Rev. Codes, it was a "tribunal" within the meaning of the statute aforesaid, and its acts may be inquired into through the use of such writ, not for the purpose of correcting any mere errors which may have been committed by it, but solely for the purpose of determining whether such tribunal exceeded its jurisdiction. It would be strange, indeed, if this could not be done, for otherwise great injustice might be inflicted on a person by such tribunal while acting wholly without jurisdiction, and yet such aggrieved person might have absolutely no redress. Our attention has been called by counsel to no authority sustaining appellant's contention. The case of State ex rel. Poole v. Nuchols, 18 N. D. 237, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 413, 119 N. W. 632, cited by appellant, is not in point. In that case we held, it is true, that a court-martial is not an inferior court within the meaning of § 86 of the Constitution, as it belongs to the executive, and not to the judicial, department of the state; but we also there said: "Of course, if it exceeds its jurisdiction or acts without jurisdiction, its judgments are a nullity and any person aggrieved thereby may seek proper redress in the civil courts having jurisdiction, and such courts will furnish appropriate relief." See, in this connection, the valuable note to said case as reported in 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 413, wherein the authorities are reviewed at length, and they will be found to support our views as above expressed. One of the leading cases is that of People ex rel. Smith v. Hoffman, 166 N. Y. 462, 54 L.R.A. 597, 60 N. E. 187, wherein that great court, speaking through 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Judge Vann, most thoroughly considered this point, which was the sole question before it, and reached the conclusion that certiorari will lie. The appellant's contention in the case at bar is there most effectually answered, and the reasoning and conclusion of the court meet with our full approval.

This brings us to the merits, which involve the question whether the general court-martial had any jurisdiction to try the relator for the alleged offenses charged against him, and render its judgment and sentence dismissing him from the National Guard. If this question must be answered in the negative, it, of course, necessarily follows that such judgment, as well as the order made March 1, 1909, by the Governor as Commander in Chief, approving the findings and judgment of such general court-martial, and purporting to dismiss relator as an officer in the National Guard, are nullities, and he would still retain his rank in the Guard as before.

We will now notice some of the principal contentions of the respective parties. They are widely and radically at variance and involve numerous propositions of law; but we shall consider only those which we deem controlling and decisive of the appeal. Relator's chief contention is that he was not amenable to a court-martial at all, because he was not a militiaman in active service, and there was no war or public danger. In other words, he plants himself squarely on the constitutional guaranty found in § 8 of the state Constitution, and also in the 5th Amendment to Federal Constitution. Section 8 reads: "Until otherwise provided by law, no person shall, for a felony, be proceeded against criminally, otherwise than by indictment, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger. . . ." He asserts that said sections clearly forbid prosecutions of militiamen for felonies by court-martial, except when such militiamen are in actual service in time of war or public danger; and that the charges on which he was thus convicted are felonies; also, that at the time of such trial and conviction there was no law in this state authorizing a court-martial for the trial of a person charged with any crime; that the Articles of War do not govern the militiamen except while in actual service.

It is needless to detail appellant's contentions. They are squarely opposed to those of the relator. We are compelled to uphold relator's contentions, and will proceed to point out what we deem to be the basic fallacy in appellant's argument. His counsel apparently wholly ignore the radical and fundamental distinction between the militia of the state and the regular Army and Navy of the United States, and the laws governing each. Such distinction is perfectly clear and is recognized in both the Federal and state Constitutions as well as in the statutes. Neither of such Constitutions forbids prosecutions for felonies otherwise than by presentment or indictment in cases arising in the land and naval forces (Army and Navy) even in times of peace; but they each clearly forbid such prosecutions in cases arising in the militia, except when such militia is in actual service, in time of war or public danger. The regular Army is at all times governed by the Articles of War, and its officers and soldiers are amenable to courts-martial for any violations thereof, as well in times of peace as in times of war. Not so, however, with the state militia. The latter is governed thereby only while in actual service in time of war or public danger, or when expressly so provided by local state law. A moment's reflection will serve to demonstrate the wisdom of such distinction. As said by Judge Vann, in People ex rel. Smith v. Hoffman, supra: "There is a wide distinction between the regular Army of the nation and the militia of a state when not in the service of the nation, for discipline which is ample for the latter will not answer for the former. A member of the state militia belongs to civil life, has a civil avocation, and only occasionally engages in the exercise of arms. A member of the United States Army, on the other hand, has no employment except that of a soldier, and arms constitute the business of his life. Hence more rigid rules and a higher state of discipline are required in the one case than in the other. Moreover, the state militia is organized by statutes of the state, and the legislature, under the limitations of the Constitution, has power to regulate the entire subject, to invest boards of examination with such authority and to give the civil courts such power to reiew as it sees fit."

As we understand the position of appellant's counsel, it is that the Articles of War govern and control our state militia in times of peace the same as they govern and control the regular Army. The charges against the relator on which he was convicted by the court-martial are based on alleged violations of the Articles of War. It is perfectly manifest to our minds that such proceedings were a nullity for the obvious reason that our legislature had not, in its wisdom, seen fit to thus ordain. The Military Code in force in this state at the time relator was tried and convicted, being chapter 21, Political Code 1905, expressly provided that "the militia while in active service shall be governed by the military law 40 L.R.A.(N.S.)

of the state, and the rules and Articles of War of the United States" (§ 1717); but such Code will be searched in vain for any provision adopting the Articles of War for its government when not in active service, or, in other words, in time of peace, and such statute nowhere defines any military offenses punishable by court-martial or otherwise in time of peace. But appellant's counsel quote § 1752 of the Code, which pertains to the drill, discipline, and uniform of the National Guard, and say: "By what Military Code are the powers and duties to be measured of an officer in the National Guard of this state? The respondent concedes that there are no military regulations of the state. The legislature having adopted the rules and articles that govern the Armies of the United States have therefore said in the most solemn manner that the National Guard of this state shall be governed by the same rules and regulations. Therefore, if the commanding officer of the company, whether in command or not, should commit a misdemeanor or a felony, he certainly could be tried by general court-martial under the laws of this state." Right here is, in our opinion, the basic fallacy in appellant's contention. Counsel wholly misinterpret said statute. It deals merely with matters relating to drill, discipline, and uniforms, and it merely adopts the regulations of the army, Articles of War, and acts of Congress as authority and to govern in such matters in cases not provided by the laws of the state, etc. The word "discipline," as there used, means "system of drill;" "systematic training;" "training to act in accordance with established rules; accustoming to systematic and regular action." See Webster's New International Dictionary, and also 27 Cyc. 496. This is apparent, for if § 1752 be given the broad meaning contended for by appellant, it would conflict with, or at least render superfluous, § 1717, which provides that the militia while in active service shall be governed by the rules and Articles of War of the United States. Furthermore, to attribute to the legislature such an intent would be absurd. No state in the Union has ever enacted such a law to our knowledge, nor could it be done in this state as to felonies without an amendment to the state Constitution, and we apprehend that the suggestion of such a thing as subjecting members of our state militia to trial by court-martial for felonies in time of peace would shock citizens.

But counsel for appellant earnestly argue that, if this court should hold that it cannot be done, "the National Guard ought to disband and pile their uniforms and equipment in the public streets and set fire to them, because there would be no power whatsoever to control either officers or men; and there would be greater danger from men who could not be controlled in time of peace than there would be from men in time of war." We fear counsel are unduly alarmed. This is, so far as we are aware, the first and only time in the entire history of this state that a resort to a court-martial was deemed necessary or advisable. Furthermore, the remedy, if one is needed, lies with the legislature, and no doubt will be furnished if applied for. In 1909 the legislature of this state enacted a new and very comprehensive Military Code (chapter 165, Laws 1909); but it did not see fit, in its wisdom, to confer on a court-martial the power to try a militiaman for a felony in time of peace. It is, however, provided by such Military Code that certain by-laws, rules, and regulations may be adopted by associations therein authorized to be formed, also rules may be adopted by the Governor as Commander in Chief, and that for violations thereof enlisted men may be tried by court-martial and also expelled from the organization. Section 12 of such new Code expressly provides when the Articles of War shall be in force as governing the militia, and it is a significant fact that such new statute limits the times in which they shall apply to the occasions when such militia is on duty pursuant to the orders of the Governor, or when ordered to assemble for duty in time of war, insurrection, invasion, public danger, or to aid the civil authorities.

In many of the states the legislatures have seen fit to provide for the enforcement of discipline in the organized militia by fine and imprisonment imposed by courts-martial for infractions of rules and regulations, even in times of peace. The right so to do is undoubted, but it was not exercised in this state until the new Military Code of 1909 was adopted. See, in this connection, 27 Cyc. 496, from which we quote: "The laws of nearly all the states have been revised with a view of conforming the organization and discipline of the organized militia to that of the regular Army, and violations of military laws or regulations are now generally dealt with by military courts within the scope of their jurisdiction as defined by the state laws,"—citing State ex rel. Madigan v. Wagoner, 74 Minn. 518, 42 L.R.A. 749, 73 Am. St. Rep. 369, 77 N. W. 424. The case of State ex rel. Madigan v. Wagoner, supra, seems to be a leading authority, and we commend the opinion of Judge Mitchell, as a clear and sound statement of the law. The opinion recognizes the right of the state legislature, within constitutional restrictions, to provide certain rules and regulations for the government of the organized militia, and, as disciplinary measures, to authorize courts-martial to impose fines and imprisonment for violations thereof, and it is therein stated that in many, if not most, of the states, this has been done.

It goes without saying that courts-martial are courts of special and limited jurisdiction, and that they possess no powers not expressly conferred on them. 27 Cyc. 498; 22 Ops. Atty. Gen. 137; Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How. 65, 15 L. ed. 838; Deming v. McClaughry, 51 C. C. A. 349, 113 Fed. 639.

That the terms "actual service" and "active service," as used in the Constitution and Military Code, mean service in time of war or public danger, etc., is clear. It is likewise clear that the words "when in actual service in time of war or public danger," in § 8 of our Constitution, apply to the militia only. Johnson v. Sayre, 158 U. S. 109, 39 L. ed. 914, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 773. That the words "actual service" and "active service" are used in such restrictive sense in our Military Code is entirely clear from a reading of §§ 1716, 1761, 1762, 1774. See also State v. Josephson, 120 La. 433, 45 So. 381, and Bryant v. Brown, 98 Ky. 211, 32 S. W. 741. It must necessarily follow, therefore, that, being in time of peace, the Articles of War in no manner governed the militiamen, and consequently Brigadier General Poole (retired) could not be tried for alleged violations thereof.

Entertaining the above views, it becomes unnecessary to notice the other points in controversy.

We conclude, therefore, that the judgment appealed from, in so far as it adjudges that the orders therein enumerated, as well as the acts and judgment of such court-martial, are null and void, must be affirmed.

Spalding, Ch. J.:

I concur fully in the opinion of my associate covered by paragraph 1 of the syllabus; and while I concur in the opinion that the court-martial in question was without jurisdiction, I reach my conclusion by a method differing from that pursued by my associates, and cannot concur in all that is said in the majority opinion. I prefer to confine my conclusions as to the jurisdiction of the court-martial to the case before us, viz., its jurisdiction over a retired officer not on duty of any kind. The relator had been retired by operation of law, under provisions of the Code of this state. A retired officer of our militia bears a relation to the organized militia differing materially from that borne by a retired Army officer to the regular Army. The latter is made, by statute, subject to trial by court-martial. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1256, U. S. Comp. State 1901, p. 888. A retired militiaman is not made subject to trial by such court, and the character of his position as fixed by the Code renders it inappropriate that he should be subject to court-martial, at least, when not on detail by order of the Governor. Relator was not on any kind of duty, and the decision need go no farther than to cover the case of such an officer. I rest my concurrence on the ground that an officer retired by operation of law is not subject to be tried by court-martial when not on duty under detail by order of the Governor. I express no opinion farther than this.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Flisk, J., on March 23, 1912, handed down the following response:

We have carefully considered the petition for a rehearing filed by appellant, and find nothing therein to cause us to change our views as above expressed.

In denying such petition we deem it advisable to briefly notice some of the principal contentions made in such petition. It is manifest that appellant's counsel are laboring under a misapprehension regarding the court's holding, for they start the petition with the following assertion: "The decision of the court proceeds upon the theory that the militia of a state can only be subject to trial by court-martial when they are in the actual service of state or nation." This is very far from the fact, for the exact contrary is true. We held that the Articles of War do not govern the state militia in times of peace, for the legislature has not thus ordained, and consequently the officers and members of such militia are not subject to court-martial in time of peace for alleged violations of such Articles of War. But we distinctly said that the power of the legislature to provide for the enforcement of discipline in the organized militia by fine and imprisonment imposed by courts-martial for infractions of rules and regulations, even in times of peace, is undoubted.

Counsel in their petition again call our attention to §§ 188 to 193 of our state Constitution and insist that we have overlooked the same. In this they are again mistaken. There is no room for doubt that "all able-bodied male persons residing in the state between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years," with certain exceptions, constitute the militia of the state, nor is there any room for doubt that the organized militia or National Guard constitutes the "active militia." But the terms "active militia" and "the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger" are entirely distinct and of different meaning, and the basic fallacy in counsel's contention apparently is their failure to distinguish the difference between these terms. Section 8 of our Constitution, which provides that no person shall for a felony be proceeded against criminally otherwise than by indictment, does not except from its provisions the active militia in time of peace, but it excepts "the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger." No doubt the framers of the Constitution contemplated that the legislature would prescribe rules and regulations for the government of the organized or active militia in time of peace as well as when called into active service for the state in time of public danger, etc., for § 192 clearly contemplates that there may be trials by courts-martial; but it is perfectly manifest that until such time as the legislature has made provision therefor no such trials could be had. Our attention is called to § 1753, Rev. Codes, which makes certain acts a misdemeanor, and concludes with the statement, "and upon conviction shall be fined in a sum not less than $50 nor more than $100, or may be cashiered." This section is somewhat vague; but, conceding all that is claimed for it by appellant's counsel, the most that can be said is that in cases falling within the provisions of said section, members of the militia may be court-martialed, but this does not aid appellant in this case, for respondent is not charged with a violation of said section, but is, as we have seen, charged with a violation of the twenty-first and sixty-first Articles of War.

Our attention is called in the petition to the fact that in three instances during statehood prosecutions by court-martial have taken place in this state; but this fact is in no manner controlling, nor does it operate in the least to change our views of the law as above expressed.

Counsel evidently do not understand the decision in State ex rel. Poole v. Nuchols, for they criticize the special concurring opinion of the chief justice in the case at bar, and assert that it is contrary to the holding in that case. In this, counsel are grievously in error. We did not hold in the Nuchols Case that the court-martial had jurisdiction, but we held merely that no power has been conferred by the Constitution on the supreme court to issue the writ of prohibition in a case like that, and the relators therein should seek relief, if at all, in the proper court. See opinion in 18 N. D. 233, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 413, 119 N. W. 632.

The petition is denied.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

HENRY H. FLANDERMEYER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
LILLIAN M. COOPER.

(85 Ohio St. 327, 98 N. E. 102.)

Husband and wife — loss of consortium — liability for causing.

1. Husband and wife are entitled to the affection, society, co-operation, and aid of each other in every conjugal relation, and either may maintain an action for damages against anyone who wrongfully and maliciously interferes with the marital relationship, and thereby deprives one of the society, affection, and consortium of the other.

Same — sale of morphine to husband — liability to wife.

2. One who with knowledge that a husband, by the constant and continued use of morphine, has become so weakened in body and mind that he is unable to resist his cravings for the drug, and who after the repeated protests of the wife, continues to sell morphine to the husband until by the use thereof his mind becomes so impaired and destroyed that it is necessary to confine him in an insane asylum, is liable to the wife for damages for her loss of consortium.

Definition — implied malice.

3. Hatred, ill-will, or actual malice towards the injured party is not a necessary ingredient of legal malice as applied to torts; nor is it necessary that the act com-

Headnotes by the COURT.

Note. — Wife's right of action at common law against one selling drugs or liquor to husband.

So far as the illegal sale of liquor is concerned, the above question has already been discussed in the note in 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1036. On the remaining aspects of this question, namely injuries from the sale of drugs or from liquor lawfully sold, practically no authorities have been found in addition to Hoard v. Peck, 56 Barb. 202, and Holleman v. Harward, 119 N. C. 150, 34 L.R.A. 803, 56 Am. St. Rep. 672, 25 S. E. 972, which are sufficiently set out in FLANDERMEYER v. COOPER.

No further reference to the matter has been found beyond a declaration in Cruse v. Aden, 127 Ill. 231, 3 L.R.A. 327, 20 N. E. 73, that the sale of intoxicating liquor was not at common law such a tort as would support an action by a wife for the consequent injury to her support.

Of course, no light is thrown on the present question by cases like Schlosser v. State, 55 Ind. 82, holding that a wife may maintain an action upon a liquor dealer's bond conditioned that the obligors therein shall pay all damages which shall be suffered either in person or property or means of 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

plained of proceed from a spiteful, malignant, or revengeful disposition. If it be wrongful, unlawful, and intentional, and the natural and probable result of the act is to accomplish the injury complained of, "malice" is implied.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cuyahoga County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for plaintiff's loss of consortium. Affirmed.

Statement by Donahue, J.:

On the 12th day of October, 1907, Lillian M. Cooper filed her amended petition in the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county against Henry H. Flandermeyer, averring, in substance, that she was the wife of Charles A. Cooper, living and consorting with him as her husband, as the defendant well knew, until the peace and welfare of her home was destroyed by the unlawful, wilful, negligent, malicious, and wrongful acts of the defendant, in this: That about the month of June, 1905, the defendant was a pharmacist, the proprietor of and conducting a drug store in the city of Cleveland; that, with the full knowledge of the poisonous effects of morphine to create a growing desire and craving for additional quantities thereof, and without complying with the statutes of the state of Ohio, and without due inquiry as to whether support by reason of any sale of liquor. And no attempt has been made to get the cases on the liability of a druggist for negligence in filling a prescription. In some of the cases dealing with civil damage acts, it is stated that the act created a new right of action which did not exist at common law. And it is that fact that would seem to have created the occasion for such acts. The question of the right of a wife to sue for personal injuries to the husband is reserved for future annotation, to be published in connection with the case of Brown v. Kistelman, ante, 236.

As to right of the husband or wife at common law to recover for loss of services or consortium, against a person negligently causing the death of the other, see the notes in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 633, and 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024.

As to the right of the husband to recover for loss of consortium through personal injury to the wife, see the note in 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1042.

As to right of the husband at common law to recover for loss of time and funeral expenses necessitated by the negligent killing of his wife, see the note in 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1193.

the said Charles A. Cooper was aware of the insidious and dangerous character of said morphine, or whether said Cooper was then in fact practically ignorant of the effect of morphine, well knowing that this plaintiff was his wife, and that she was using every available means to cure and counteract her husband's act of using morphine, did knowingly, wrongfully, and unlawfully sell and administer morphine to the said Charles A. Cooper, although she frequently protested to the defendant against his further selling and administering such morphine, and expressly warned and prohibited said defendant from continuing said sales or administrations of morphine to her husband, well knowing that the constant use of this drug had created an irresistible appetite on the part of Cooper, well knowing that said drug was not being used for medicinal purposes, but through and on account of the craving that had fastened itself upon him by long use thereof, whereby he was becoming, and had become, a morphine fiend, and was thereby wrecking his mind and body; that said defendant, notwithstanding the protests and warning of plaintiff, continued to sell and administer quantities of morphine to Charles A. Cooper, said sales becoming more frequent until they occurred almost every day, and being in bulk quantities less than the minimum original package of $\frac{1}{2}$ ounce, as provided by law, so that said Cooper became a slave to the morphine habit, and that he was thereby deprived of moral sensibility, and was unfitted and incapable to give the affection, society, companionship, and consortium which he had formerly given, and which were due to plaintiff as his wife, and thereby knowingly, wilfully, and wrongfully depriving plaintiff of the affection, society, companionship, and consortium of her husband; and that finally, in consequence of defendant's unlawful and wilful act, the said Charles A. Cooper, on the 16th day of June, 1906, was committed to an asylum and there detained for about one year; and alleged that she had been damaged by reason of the defendant's unlawful and wilful act in the sum of \$2,000, for which she prayed damages. To this amended petition the defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled by the court and exceptions noted.

The defendant in his amended answer filed April 13, 1909, admitted that the plaintiff was the wife of Charles A. Cooper, and was his wife in June, 1905, and prior thereto. He admits that he was a pharmacist, duly registered, that he was the proprietor of and conducted a drug store in Cleveland, Ohio, and denied every other allegation, averment, and statement in the amended petition. For a second defense he averred that Charles A. Cooper presented himself at the defendant's pharmacy and represented that he had theretofore become addicted to the habitual use of morphine; that he was suffering from the toxic effect of the same to such an extent that he was unable to work and support his family, and otherwise perform his marital obligations to his wife and family, and asked to purchase morphine for the relief of his immediate sufferings, and for relief of the necessities of his family; that the defendant always warned him against the dangers attendant upon the use of morphine, and, believing and relying upon his representations as true, and believing that the same was to be used medicinally for the relief of the suffering of Cooper, and to enable him to support his wife and family, and in a desire to befriend him, and for no other cause, reason, or purpose, did sell Cooper some morphine, but never unlawfully. He further avers that he is informed and believes that said morphine so purchased by him was taken by Cooper, used medicinally, and was beneficial to him. It is further averred that the plaintiff knew of said sales and acquiesced in the beneficent acts of this defendant in making them, and accepted the good results flowing therefrom; that said sales were made in the usual course of trade and exercise of due care. He denied all malice, negligence, and all unlawful and wrongful intention on defendant's part, and denied that he ever administered any morphine to Cooper, and prays that the action may be dismissed.

The plaintiff, by way of reply to this answer, denied that Cooper represented he was suffering from toxic effects of morphine to such an extent that he was unable to work or support his family, or otherwise perform his marital obligations to his family; denies that he asked to purchase morphine for the relief of the necessities of his family; denies that the defendant warned him of the dangers attendant upon the use of morphine; denies that the defendant believes that the morphine so sold was to be used medicinally for the relief of the sufferings of Cooper, or was sold with intent to befriend his family, or that said morphine was used medicinally and was beneficial to Cooper; denies that she acquiesced in the act of defendant in the sale of morphine to Cooper, and that said sales were made in the usual course of trade and in the exercise of due care.

Trial was had upon the issues so joined, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $500. With its general verdict the jury, at the request of the defendant, returned the following answers to interrogatories: "(1) At the time of the sales of morphine to Charles A. Cooper by the defendant from June, 1905, to June, 1906, was said defendant, Henry H. Flantermeyer, actuated by any feeling of hatred or actual malice toward the plaintiffs in this case, Lillie M. Cooper? No. (2) Was there a real or apparent need for morphine medicinally on the part of Charles A. Cooper, at the various times at which the defendant and his clerks sold him morphine? No. (3) Was Charles A. Cooper addicted to the habitual use of morphine prior to 1905? Yes. (4) Was Charles A. Cooper addicted to the use of morphine habitually prior to any purchases from defendant, and while living with his wife, the plaintiff? Yes. (5) Was Charles A. Cooper cured of the morphine habit at the end of the Dr. Peck treatment, in 1905? Yes. (6) Was the mere sale of morphine to Charles A. Cooper by the defendant, without the additional act of the said Charles A. Cooper after he had become possessed by said morphine, in introducing it into his system, the cause of any injury to the plaintiff, Lillie M. Cooper? No. (7) Did the defendant or any of his clerks sell any morphine to the plaintiff's husband, Charles A. Cooper, after plaintiff had notified them not to do so? If so, when were said sales made? Yes. Between June, 1905, and June, 1906. (8) Was the act of Charles A. Cooper in introducing the morphine sold to him by the defendant into his system the independent act of said Charles A. Cooper alone? Yes. (9) Did the defendant or any of his clerks ever administer any morphine to said Charles A. Cooper? No." A motion for judgment for defendant on the special findings was overruled, as was also a motion for a new trial, and judgment entered upon the verdict. Error was prosecuted to the circuit court of Cuyahoga county, and that court affirmed the judgment of the common pleas court. This proceeding in error is brought in this court to reverse the judgment of both the lower courts.

Mr. Alexander H. Martin, for plaintiff in error:

The acts of defendant were malicious.

Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 621, 32 Am. Rep. 397; Brown v. Brown, 124 N. C. 19, 70 Am. St. Rep. 574, 32 S. E. 320.

Donahue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The primary and most important question presented by this record is whether a wife has a common-law right of action against one who wrongfully and maliciously interferes with the marital relationship, and deprives her of the society, companionship, and consortium of her husband. In the absence of a statute authorizing such recovery, her right to maintain this action rests wholly on the common law, and if the common law does not afford her a right of action, then she cannot maintain this suit, and the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained.

It is very clear that originally the common law recognized no such right in the wife. By the primitive law, the only member of the family deemed to be harmed by an unjustifiable disturbance of the family relation was the head of the family. Blackstone, in his Commentaries (vol. 3, pp. 142, 143), says that these torts directed against the peace and tranquillity of domestic relations are actionable only when committed against the husband. In the case of Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577, 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 382, Lord Wensleydale held that no recovery could be had without joining the husband in the suit, who himself must receive the money, which would not advance the wife's remedy, and to allow her to recover in such an action would involve the absurdity that the husband might also sue for such a cause.

It must be remembered, however, that this interpretation of the common law with reference to the wife's right to maintain an action of this character obtained upon the theory that the wife's personality merged in that of her husband's, and that she was not then entitled to hold property separate and apart from her husband, and not authorized to bring suit in her own name. Now the legal status of the wife has been changed by legislation. Her legal personality is no longer merged in that of her husband. By force of the several statutes in this state in reference thereto, a husband has no longer any dominion over the separate property of his wife, and she may maintain an action in her own name, without joining her husband in the suit. The right of action growing out of an injury to her personal rights is her separate property, for which she may maintain an action in her own name. The right of the wife to the consortium of the husband is one of her personal rights. It therefore follows that the principle of the common law which allowed a right of action to the husband for the invasion of this right, now, under the changed condition of affairs, and in view of the present legal status of the wife, applies to her equally with the husband.

It is said by Burdick, in his Law of Torts, at page 276, that "with this change in her legal status came naturally a change in the judicial conception of her marital wrongs. As she could maintain an action in her own name, and damages recovered would be her sole and separate property, one of the chief objections urged by Lord Wensleydale disappeared. As the law now recognized her legal equality with her husband, Blackstone's reasoning, based upon the superiority of one party, and the inferiority of the other party, to the marital relation, had no longer the foundation of even a fiction."

A statutory right cannot change except by action of the lawmaking power of a state. But it is the boast of the common law that "its flexibility permits its ready adaptability to the changing nature of human affairs." So that whenever, either by the growth or development of society, or by the statutory change of the legal status of any individual, he is brought within the principles of the common law, then it will afford to him the same relief that it has theretofore afforded to others coming within the reason of its rules. If the wrongs of the wife are the same in principle as the wrongs of the husband, there is now no reason why the common law should withhold from her the remedies it affords to the husband.

Hale on Torts, on page 278, says: "In natural justice, no reason exists why the the right of the wife to maintain an action against the seducer of her husband should not be coextensive with his right of action against her seducer. The weight of authorities and the tendency of the legislation strongly incline to the latter opinion."

1 Cooley on Torts, 3d ed. p. 477, says: "Upon principle this right in the wife is equally valuable to her as property, as is that of the husband to him. Her right being the same as his in kind, degree, and value, there would seem to be no valid reason why the law should deny to her the redress which it affords to him. . . . The gist of the action is the loss of consortium, which includes the husband's society, affection, and aid. The wife may have the action though she continues to live with her husband, and it is held that she may maintain it after a divorce from him."

This question, however, is fully settled in this state in the case of Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 621, 32 Am. Rep. 397. The first paragraph of the syllabus is as follows: "A wife may maintain an action for the loss of the society and companionship of her husband, against one who wrongfully induces and procures her husband to abandon or send her away." In the opinion, on page 627 of 34 Ohio St. Gilmore, Ch. J., says: "If, in this state, the common-law dominion of the husband over the property and personal rights of the wife has been taken away from him and conferred upon her, and remedies in accordance with the spirit of the civil law have been expressly given to the wife for the redress of injuries to her person, property, and personal rights, all of which I hope to show has been done, then it must follow that she may maintain an action in her own name for the loss of the consortium of her husband against one who wrongfully deprives her of it, unless the consortium of her husband is not one of her personal rights. . . . Under our legislation, the benefit which the wife has in the consortium of the husband is equal to that which the husband has in the consortium of the wife. If, at common law, the husband could maintain an action for the loss of the consortium of the wife, I can see no reason why, under our law, the wife cannot maintain an action for the loss of the consortium of the husband. . . . Each acquires a personal as well as legal right to the conjugal society of the other, for the loss of which either may sue separately."

There can be no reasonable contention but that the wife suffers the same injury from the loss of consortium as the husband suffers from that cause. His right is not greater than hers. Each is entitled to the society and affection of the other. The rights of both spring from the marriage contract, and in the very nature of things must be mutual, and while this was always true of the marriage relation, yet there was a time in the history of our jurisprudence when the legal status of the wife was such that she could not, at common law, maintain an action of this character. Now her legal status is the same as that of her husband. She has the same right to the control of her separate property, the same right to sue in her own name, and, in a word, is in the full enjoyment of every right that her husband enjoys, so that she comes clearly within the principles of the common law that allow a right of action by the husband for damages for the loss of the consortium of his wife. Either we must hold that the common law is fixed, unchangeable, and immutable, that it possesses no such flexibility as will permit its ready adaptability to changing conditions of human affairs, or that, when every reason and every theory for denying the wife the same rights as the husband have entirely disappeared from our jurisprudence, that she is now equally entitled with her husband to every remedy that the common law affords, and we have no hesitation in adopting the latter view.

It is insisted, however, that neither husband nor wife would have a right of action under the facts and circumstances of this case, and our attention is called to the fact that an enabling statute was necessary in order to permit a wife to recover damages to means of support by reason of intoxication caused by sales of liquor to the husband. This, however, is not a similar case. This is not an action for damages for loss of support, or loss of the earning capacity of the husband, but is wholly an action for damages for loss of consortium. Consortium is defined to be the conjugal fellowship of husband and wife, and the right of each to the company, co-operation, and aid of the other in every conjugal relation. Bigaouette v. Paulet, 134 Mass. 123, 45 Am. Rep. 307. This right is invaded whenever a third person, through machination, enticement, seduction, or other wrongful, intentional, and malicious interference with the marriage relation, deprives the husband or wife of the consortium of the other. The remedy for an invasion of these rights is not in the nature of the action for damages to means of support, provided by the statutes relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors. It is said by Tiffany on Persons and Domestic Relations, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

2d ed. page 80: "Whatever may have been the principle, originally, upon which this class of actions was maintained, it is certain that the weight of modern authority bases the action on the loss of the consortium. . . . The suit is not regarded in the nature of an action by a master for the loss of the services of his servant, and it is not necessary that there should be any pecuniary loss whatever." No enabling statute was necessary to authorize a husband to maintain an action for the loss of consortium, and if we are right in our conclusion that the wife is now equally entitled to maintain this action, this contention of the plaintiff in error is completely answered.

The further claim is made by counsel for plaintiff in error that, to sustain an action for injury to one's consortium, the alleged injury must be the result of a force exerted directly upon the marriage relation for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff's consortium, and the act of the consort responding to that force must not be voluntary, citing Holtz v. Dick, 42 Ohio St. 23, 51 Am. Rep. 791. In that case this court declared that, "where damages are asked for the alienation of affection, each case must stand on its own facts." If the proposition that "the act of the consort responding to that force must not be voluntary" were to be adopted as an arbitrary rule of law in this state controlling each and every case, then few or no such actions as this could be maintained. In the case of Bigaouette v. Paulet, supra, the court held that "a husband may maintain an action for the loss of the consortium with his wife against a person who has criminal conversation with her, whether such conversation is with or without her consent, and although the act caused no actual loss of her service to him."

The case of Hart v. Knapp, 76 Conn. 135, 100 Am. St. Rep. 989, 55 Atl. 1021, was a suit by the wife against another woman for the alienating of her husband's affection by acts of illicit intercourse. In that case the claim was made by the defendant that the wrong was not her wrong, but that of the husband; that her misconduct was induced by the persuasion of plaintiff's husband; but the court disposes of this contention in this language: "In what she did with the husband, she did with full knowledge that it was wrongful and that it would, as the plaintiff claims it did, result in harm to the plaintiff. The gist of the defense set up in the requests is that the defendant did a great wrong by the persuasion of the husband. We know of no rule of law, civil or criminal, that absolves her from liability for such wrong because of such persuasion."

It is claimed that the selling of this drug to Cooper was not the proximate cause of the damages to plaintiff, but that the independent act of Cooper in injecting this morphine into his system was the proximate cause producing the injury complained of. The jury, in its answer to the interrogatories, found that neither the defendant nor any of his clerks administered any morphine to Cooper, and that the morphine sold by defendant to Cooper was introduced into Cooper's system by the independent act of Charles A. Cooper alone. These are, undoubtedly, the physical facts; but they are not all the facts upon which the defendant's liability to the wife depends.

The record discloses that, notwithstanding Cooper had been a victim of the morphine habit for many years, in the year 1905 he was completely cured of this habit, and the jury so finds in its answer to the interrogatories propounded. The wife, however, realizing that because of his former experiences with this drug he would be weaker than the ordinary man who had never been enslaved by its use, called personally at defendant's place of business, explained to him the fact, requested him not to sell any morphine to her husband, and, according to her testimony, defendant told her that she could not prevent him making such sales if her husband desired to purchase the same. The jury found in its answer to the interrogatories that the defendant continued to sell morphine to Charles A. Cooper after the plaintiff had notified him not to do so. It is true that the sale of morphine is lawful in this state, but it does not necessarily follow that every sale of morphine may be a legal one. The general assembly of this state has by statute provided certain restrictions, and imposed upon the seller certain duties, in reference to this and kindred poisons, and while the right of the wife to maintain this action does not rest upon these statutes, yet if, by reason thereof, the sale to her husband was unlawful and resulted in depriving her of the consortium of her husband, the case would present every element necessary to a recovery; but plaintiff's rights under the facts and circumstances of this case rest upon a broader foundation than the violation of these statutes, for if, in the making of these sales, these statutes had been observed to the very letter, the sale might nevertheless be wrongful, and the defendant responsible to the plaintiff for the injuries complained of in her petition.

If it be conceded that after Cooper became cured of the habit of using morphine, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

he possessed sufficient intelligence and discretion to control his own actions and safeguard his own welfare, and that under these conditions the defendant had a legal right to disregard the appeal of the wife and to sell morphine to the husband, upon the theory that the independent act of the husband of injecting it into his veins was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, yet the evidence is very clear that there came a time in the history of these sales when Cooper was no longer a free agent capable of controlling his own conduct, and capable of exercising an independent judgment in reference to the use of this drug, but, on the contrary, his intellect had become so weakened and infirm that his power of resisting his craving therefor was entirely destroyed, and he became merely the instrument or the conduit through which this treacherous poison was transferred from the druggist's hands into his own system. We are not concerned with the moral wrong of one who turns a deaf ear to the appeals of a wife trying to save her husband from destruction, and for greed of gain sells to that husband a drug that is sure to spell his mental and physical ruin; rather are we concerned with the legal aspect of the claim that it is the right of an individual to control his personal affairs regardless of consequences to others. The underlying purpose of our whole social compact is to prevent that very thing, and the principle is as old as the law itself that every person must control his own conduct and his own property so as to do as little injury as possible to his fellow. From the facts found by the jury, the defendant must have known the growing imbecility of Cooper and the gradual impairment of his power of resistance to the use of this drug. He must have known that Cooper had reached that stage in his course of mental and physical destruction that, just so sure as he sold him the poison, Cooper would inject it into his veins. In view of this condition of affairs, any warning to Cooper of the dangerous qualities of the drug would be but an absurd attempt to evade responsibility for his own wrongful act. As well might he intentionally detach a heavy weight from its support on high, that in falling would necessarily strike and injure another, and then say it was not my act in detaching this weight, but it was the force of gravity that caused it to fall to earth, and its falling was the proximate cause of the injury. Individuals must be held to have contemplated the natural and probable result of their own acts purposely and intentionally committed, and it would be just as reasonable to say that due regard for the rights of others would not require the individual in the ordering of his own affairs, to take into account the force of gravity, as to say that one who sells morphine to a person known by the seller to be a helpless victim of this drug is not required to contemplate the natural and probable result of the use, the unfortunate purchaser is sure to make of it.

In the case of Wells v. Cook, 16 Ohio St. 74, 88 Am. Dec. 436, this court declared that "the influences of human conduct, good or bad, are far-reaching, and are often seen and felt in consequences exceedingly remote, but uncertain and complicated. It is simply impossible that municipal law should take cognizance of all these consequences." But in this case the consequences are not exceedingly remote. They are the natural and necessary consequences that follow from the defendant's total disregard not only of his moral but his legal duty to his fellow man.

In the case of Holleman v. Harward, 119 N. C. 150, 34 L.R.A. 803, 56 Am. St. Rep. 672, 25 S. E. 972, it was held that "the sale of laudanum as a beverage to a married woman, knowing that it is destroying her mind and body and causing loss to her husband, when continued after his repeated warnings and protest, renders the seller liable to him for the damages which he sustains on account of the loss of her services." In that case it was argued on behalf of the defendant that there was no legal obligation resting upon him not to sell the drug, nor upon the wife not to use it; that the husband could not prevent his wife from buying and using it; that the duty of the wife to give to her husband her love and companionship was a moral duty, but that this moral duty could not be enforced by any power of the law. The court answered this contention in the following language: "Notwithstanding the claim of the defendants, we think this action rests upon a principle, a principle not new, but one sound and consistent. The principle is this: 'Whoever does an injury to another is liable in damages to the extent of that injury. It matters not whether the injury is to the property or the person or the rights, or the reputation of another.' . . . The defendants owed the plaintiff the legal duty not to sell to his wife opium in the form of large quantities of laudanum as a beverage, knowing that she was, by using them, destroying her mind and body, and thereby causing loss to the husband."

In the case of Hoard v. Peck, 56 Barb. 202, it was held that the husband could maintain a right of action for damages against a druggist for selling laudanum to his wife to be used by her as a beverage, in consequence of which use by the wife she became sick and emaciated, and her mind was affected so that she was unable to perform her duties as a wife, and her affection became alienated from the husband, and he lost her society and was compelled to expend money in medical and other attendance upon her. In that case the claim was made by the defendant that the selling of laudanum is a legal business, and that the husband could have no right of action for damages for such sale; but the court held that, although there was no statute in the state of New York prohibiting the selling of laudanum, either as a beverage or for any other purpose, it did not necessarily follow that every sale of it in all cases is legal, but, on the contrary, that its lawfulness or unlawfulness depends on the circumstances of the sale, and the use and purposes to which it is applied. It was further held in that case that it was no defense to the action "that it was her hand that held the potion to her lips; [that] the druggist, by the act of handing it to her for that purpose, is as much responsible for the consequences as though he assisted her directly in pouring it down her throat. . . . If one furnishes the means, with the knowledge that it is to be unlawfully used, assenting to such use, he is answerable for the consequences, if the design is carried out."

The jury, in its answer to interrogatories propounded by the defendant, found that the defendant was not actuated by any feeling of hatred or actual malice towards the plaintiff. That might be true in every action for damages for loss of consortium, and is probably true in every case where loss of consortium is accomplished by seduction or alienation of affection, but hatred and ill-will of the injured person is not necessarily an ingredient of legal malice. If the conduct of the defendant was intentional and wrongful and without any just cause or excuse, malice would be implied. "The term malice, as applied to torts, does not necessarily mean that which must proceed from a spiteful, malignant, or revengeful disposition, but a conduct injurious to another, though proceeding from an ill-regulated mind, not sufficiently cautious before it occasions an injury to another. Weckerly v. Geyer, 11 Serg. & R. 39, 40." This definition fully comprises all the elements of malice as applied to torts, and was adopted by this court in the case of Westlake v. Westlake, supra.

The jury, upon the issues joined by the pleadings, returned a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff. There is nothing in the special findings of the jury that conflicts with this general verdict. Therefore the motion of the defendant for judgment upon the special findings was properly overruled.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

SNARE & TRIEST COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
FANNY FRIEDMAN.

(84 C. C. A. 369, 169 Fed. 1.)

Trial — amendment.

1. The Federal court may, after the conclusion of the evidence, permit the amendment of a declaration in an action to recover damages for negligent injuries, so as to charge negligent maintenance of a dangerous condition as shown by the evidence, rather than dangerous creation of it.

Appeal — striking plea — error.

2. It is not reversible error to strike out a plea of the statute of limitations sought to be made available before trial, where all facts bearing upon the availability of the pleading are stated in the declaration, and the determination of the court upon the question is reviewable at whatever stage of the trial it is made.

Limitation of actions — infancy — institution of proceedings — effect.

3. The institution by an infant of an action for personal injuries does not set in motion the statute of limitations so that, in case it is discontinued, another action cannot be begun after the expiration of the statutory period, where the statute provides that if any person entitled to an action is at the time it accrues within the age of twenty-one years, such person shall be at liberty to institute the same within the time limited after his coming of full age.

Negligence — material in street — duty to children.

4. One piling building material in the street owes a duty to children of such tender years as to be incapable of contributory negligence or trespass, who to his knowledge are accustomed to play in the vicinity, to use ordinary care to prevent the piles from being in such unstable condition as would be likely to cause injury to such of the children as might come in contact with them.

Courts — Federal — state decisions — effect.

5. The Federal courts, in exercising their jurisdiction founded on diverse citizenship, in cases involving the administration of the common law, do not hold themselves bound by the decisions of the courts of the state in which they are sitting, unless such decisions have so clearly established a settled rule in the premises as to make it a part of the peculiarly local law of the state, but will resort to the same sources of information as to what such law is as are open to the state courts.

Res judicata — discontinuance of former suit.

6. The right to bring an action in a Federal court is not barred by the fact that plaintiff recovered a judgment upon the same cause of action in the state court, and subsequently discontinued his action upon the court's granting a new trial.

Courts — state decision — Federal court.

7. A single decision of the highest court of a state which follows no line of precedents in that jurisdiction, that one piling building material in a street owes no duty to pile them so as to avoid injury to children of tender years accustomed to play in the vicinity, is not binding on a Federal court sitting in the same state, in which an action involving such question, and growing out of the same accident as that involved in the case in which such decision was made, is brought on the ground of diverse citizenship, after discontinuance in the state court because of such ruling.

(February 15, 1909.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Gray and Buffington, circuit judges, and Archbald, District Judge.

Mr. H. M. Hitchings for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Gilbert Collins for defendant in error.

Gray, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The case brought before us by this writ of error is as follows:

Suit was brought in the court below by the defendant in error (hereinafter called the plaintiff), against the plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant), to recover for personal injuries received through the alleged negligence of the said defendant. At the time of the occurrences in question, certain persons, trading under the firm name of Colgate & Company, were the owners of lands, and the buildings thereon erected, in the city of Jersey City, in the state of New Jersey, bordering on a public street or highway of said city. The lands and buildings were located on the south side of the street, and were used and occupied by the firm for manufacturing purposes. At the time of the acts complained of, the firm was engaged in constructing an addition to its buildings, and for that purpose had contracts with the defendant, by which the defendant, among other things, was to furnish and set in place the iron and steel work for the foundation of certain tanks, including cast-iron columns and girders. The defendant, in the course of its performance of this contract, and in the furnishing, delivery, and setting in place of the cast-iron columns and girders, caused to be piled and placed certain iron girders, or I-beams, upon the sidewalk in front of the premises of the said Colgate & Company, for use, from time to time, in the prosecution of its said work. These beams were 22 feet long, 15 inches high, with flanges 4 inches wide, and weighed about 1,000 pounds each. They were, before and at the time of the accident, stored in two piles, one next to the building line and the other next to the curb line of the street, and parallel therewith, leaving a passageway on the sidewalk between the two piles. It was shown in the evidence that they could be piled so as to be measurably secure, by placing a row of three beams upon their sides, and superimposing two others so as to lock with those under them, with their flanges, and one on top locking with the two underneath; or, by placing four or five in the bottom row, and building up in the same manner. The sidewalk in front of these premises was asphalted. There was no curbing, but the asphalt pavement sloped into the street, forming a concave gutter, so that teams could drive from the street across the sidewalk into the premises in question.

There was some testimony in the court below, touching an alleged transfer of the original contract by the defendant to another construction company, and some controversy consequent thereupon, as to whether this company was responsible for the piling of these beams upon the sidewalk. The court below, however, correctly construed the written agreement in question as not in terms transferring the contract, and properly left to the jury the question whether such other company was in charge of the work, or was merely in what it did the agent of the defendant. As to this, the jury has found in favor of the plaintiff, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) and the point may therefore be dismissed from further consideration. For the purposes of the case before us, therefore, the defendant is to be considered as an independent contractor, subject to whatever responsibilities attach to it, as such, in the prosecution of its work.

There was evidence tending to show that, at the time of the accident in question, an I-beam on the pile next to the street had become dislocated from its parallel position with the other beams, and was in a position diagonally along the side of the pile, edgewise or nearly edgewise, instead of flat, with the upper end on a piece of plank or joist, and the lower end near the bottom of the pile. It was, at all events, in a state of unstable equilibrium. Several little girls were playing about the pile, some skating on the asphalt pavement and two or more were on the pile, when the plaintiff, Fannie Friedman, four and one half years old, ran across the street to where the other girls, including her two older sisters, were playing. The testimony tends to show that she sat down on the lower end of the beam just described, and that another girl just then jumped across the upper end of the beam onto the plank on which that end was resting, causing the beam to fall over, crushing the foot of the plaintiff beneath it.

The testimony was somewhat confusing as to the exact position of the I-beam, and as to just how the accident occurred, but there can be no doubt that the beam was in a position dangerous to all who came near it, and especially to those who came in contact with it. There was evidence tending to show that this beam was in this situation, or something like it, for two or more days prior to the accident; that it was noticed by, or should have been noticed by, defendant's servants, and that it had remained in this dangerous position long enough to affect defendant with notice. There was no testimony that directly accounted for this dislocation of the beam in question. There was testimony tending to show that these piles had been in place for several weeks, and that a short time before the accident, the number of beams on the pile was less than formerly. How this particular beam came into its dangerous position was a matter, therefore, of conjecture. Whether it had been dislocated from its original position by taking other beams from the pile, for use in the structure under erection, or had been partly moved for the purpose of such use, and then temporarily abandoned, it is not necessary here to determine, even if it were capable of being determined. The evidence as to its dangerous situation, and its existence in that situation for two or more days before the accident, was properly submitted to the jury, and there can be no objection to the charge of the court in that regard.

The charge of negligence principally insisted upon at the trial was, not for the original careless piling of the beams, as was charged in the declaration, but for the maintaining of the pile in the dangerous condition testified to after notice of such condition, or after a long enough time had elapsed for notice to be presumed. After the conclusion of the evidence, the learned judge of the court below permitted an amendment to the plaintiff's declaration, charging the defendant with negligence in the latter respect. The defendant excepted to this action of the court and assigned the same as error. We may dispose of it in passing, however, by saying that the action of the court appears to us to have been the exercise of a sound discretion, and not to have transcended the liberal rules in regard to amendments to pleadings which obtain in the practical administration of justice. There was also testimony admitted over the objection of the defendant, tending to show that the asphalt pavement on the north side of the street, near the Colgate factory and these piles, was much resorted to by children of the neighborhood for roller skating and other plays, and that these piles were attractive to such children, as evidenced by the fact that they constantly played thereon, to the knowledge of the defendant. Under the laws of New Jersey, Colgate & Company, were the owners of the fee of the street to its center, subject to the public easement for purposes of travel, and it is not disputed that either by state law or municipal ordinance, they, or their subcontractor by their permission, had the right to a reasonable use of the sidewalk, temporarily, for the storing of material to be used in building, or repair of buildings, on their adjoining property.

The learned judge of the court below instructed the jury, in effect, that not only was the defendant bound to exercise ordinary care in originally piling these girders upon the street, but also in maintaining the piles so that they might not endanger the safety of those lawfully using the sidewalk, and that, if from the weight of the evidence the jury found that the girders so piled on the sidewalk were, at the time of the accident, calculated to tempt and attract little children accustomed to play on the street, to use them for play or rest, and that this was known to the defendant, then, if one of the beams, though originally secure in the pile, became dislocated, and was allowed to remain in the dangerous position described in the testimony for a time long enough to presume notice to the defendant, it became responsible for the damage caused to the plaintiff, who was without fault. A verdict was found for the plaintiff, and upon the judgment entered thereon, this writ of error was sued out.

The assignments of error are very numerous, but they are for the most part covered by the few principal contentions urged at the bar, upon the determination of which the case must turn. The first contention to be noticed is that the court erred in striking out before the trial, and against the objection of the defendant, the plea of the statute of limitations, and in holding that it was not available to the plaintiff in error. Brief notice only is required of defendant's point that it had an absolute right to interpose said plea, and have it disposed of when it was sought to be availed of during the trial, and that the action of the court in striking it out before trial was contrary to the rules of practice and procedure in New Jersey. We think, however, that the granting of the motion to strike out was a matter within the discretion of the court below. All the facts bearing upon the availability of the pleading were stated in the plaintiff's declaration. Even if the granting of the motion to strike out was at variance with practice and procedure in such cases, no possible harm could come to the defendant by reason of such premature striking out, as by the law of the state the action of the court in the premises was reviewable at whatever state of the trial it was had.

This brings us to the substantial question raised by this assignment of error, whether the action brought by the plaintiff was, under the facts set forth in the pleadings, barred by the statute of limitations of the state of New Jersey. The relevant portions of that statute are as follows: "All actions hereafter accruing for injuries to persons caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person or persons, firm or firms, individual or individuals, corporation or corporations within this state, shall be commenced and instituted within two years next after the cause of such action shall have accrued, and not after." 2 Gen. Stat. (N. J.) 1895, p. 1975 § 3, as amended by Laws 1896, p. 119.

Section 4 (same statute and page) reads: "That if any person or persons who is, are, or shall be entitled, to any of the actions specified in the three preceding sections of this act, is, are, or shall be at the time of any such cause of action accruing within the age of twenty-one years, or insane, that then such person or persons shall be at liberty to bring the said action so as he, she, or they institute or take the same within such time as is before limited, after his, her, or their coming to or being of full age or of sane memory, as by other person or persons having no such impediment might be done."

It appears from the pleadings that the plaintiff, Fannie Friedman, then being between the ages of four and five years, brought an action in the state court of New Jersey, in 1903, shortly after the accident, which, after a verdict in her favor and pending a motion for a new trial, was, for reasons that will hereafter appear, discontinued, and that the present action was begun in January, 1906, two years and six months after the former action, and when the plaintiff was something over six years of age. The contention of defendant's counsel is: "That an infant may remain quiescent after the cause of action accrues, until majority, and may then bring and maintain the action within two years thereafter, or he may bring his action as an infant, issue a summons in the infant's name, and apply thereafter for the appointment of a next friend to prosecute the action so brought, but, in this case, immediately upon the commencement of his action, he sets the statute running and assumes the same legal position as one of full age."

We cannot agree with this construction of these sections of the New Jersey statute. The learned judge of the court below was of opinion that "a proper construction of these sections of the New Jersey statute allows the infant all the time intervening between the accrual of the cause of action and its majority, plus a period thereafter equal to the prescribed limitations of the statute."

In the case of Smith v. Felter, 61 N. J. L. 104, 38 Atl. 746, Mr. Justice Gummere, of the supreme court of New Jersey, in discussing § 4 of the statute, as above quoted, says: "It seems to me clear that the effect of this provision is to stay the running of the statute while the disabilities mentioned therein continue to exist, and that a party suffering from any of such disabilities may maintain an action at any time during their continuance, or within the six years afterward."

This is practically the opinion of the learned judge of the court below. There can be no doubt that one who was under no disability could bring such an action as we have here, at any time within the limitation of two years prescribed by the statute, discontinue it, and bring another action, provided it also be within the period of limitation. We can see no reason why an infant under twenty-one years of age, against whom the statute is not running at all, should not be able to do the same thing, that is, bring an action, discontinue the same, and bring another or successive actions during his minority. We can find nothing in the express words of the statute, or in any reasonable interpretation thereof, that justifies the contention of the defendant as above stated, and no case in the state of New Jersey or elsewhere has been called to our attention which supports the same.

This brings us to the important question in the case, viz., whether defendant owed any duty to the plaintiff for neglect for which it should be held responsible to her in this action. In its consideration, we assume (1) that the defendant, as an independent contractor with the owner of the premises, might lawfully use such portions of the sidewalk of the public street as it actually did use, for the temporary storage of the I-beams in question, or other material to be used in the structures it had contracted to erect; (2) that defendant, being responsible for placing the I-beams on the street and maintaining them there, owed a duty to the public, including the plaintiff, to place and maintain them with reasonable care, so that those lawfully on the street, and without fault on their part, might not be injured thereby.

Conceding all this for the sake of argument, defendant denies liability, by reason of the premises, contending that plaintiff was at fault (1) in that she was an active trespasser upon the girders at the time she received her injury, the trespass contributing thereto; (2) in that she was playing upon the girders at the time of the injury, and not using the sidewalk for purposes of travel, and that such playing contributed to the injury complained of; (3) in that the use which she was making of the girders at the time the injury occurred was unlawful, and therefore defendant owed no duty to her.

The foregoing, of course, are different forms of the same contention. It may be admitted that if one sui juris had, in using this sidewalk, without reasonable excuse, stepped upon the pile of beams while in this condition, and had been injured by the falling of the displaced beam in the manner described, defendant would not have been liable therefor, on the ground of such person's contributory negligence, or possibly on the ground that defendant owed no duty to one who might be considered a trespasser, to see that the pile of beams was properly constructed. The defendant, however, ignore the distinction which we think is inherent in this case, between those who are and those who are not sui juris, or rather between those who have and those who have not arrived at years of discretion. In the case before us, it is not necessary to consider at what age an infant may be of such discretion as to be responsible in a case like the present for contributory negligence, or for conduct which, in case of sufficient discretion, would make him or her a trespasser. Fannie Friedman, the plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was only four and one half years old, and there can be no question that, in the eyes of the law, by reason of her age, she lacked that discretion which would make her responsible for her conduct. She was legally incapable of contributory negligence, or of being a trespasser. The question then arises, whether defendant owed to such a child, under the circumstances disclosed by this record, any duty other than that owed to those who were sui juris, or who at least had arrived at years where discretion may be presumed. We think there was a peculiar duty of this kind incumbent upon the defendant in relation to this plaintiff, under the circumstances of this case. Why should not one who has a dangerous structure or appliance, whether on his own land or lawfully on a public highway, use ordinary care to protect not only those who are able to protect themselves by the use of their faculties, and who are bound to make such use of them as the ordinary experience of mankind justifies us to expect, but also those of such tender years as may, without fault on their part, come within the danger to which the owner of such appliance or structure has exposed them? We think, in reason and in consonance with the legal principles by which the duty of individuals to protect others from the dangers that may result from the use of their own property is determined, and by which they are held responsible for their negligent acts in that regard, this defendant owed a duty to the children of tender years who, to its knowledge, were accustomed to play on the public street in the vicinity of these piles of beams, and also to play and sit thereon, to use due care under the circumstances to prevent the piles from being in such an unstable condition as would be likely to cause injury to such of these children as might come in contact therewith. Peirce v. Lyden, 85 C. C. A. 312, 157 Fed. 552.

In charging the jury upon this branch of the case, the learned judge of the court below said: "I shall adopt the language of the late Judge Dixon, who charged the jury in a suit between those same parties when it was on trial in the supreme court of this state [New Jersey]. Speaking of the public, he said: 'The public consists of two classes for the present purpose of this suit: People grown up, adults, people come to years of discretion, and the little children, who have not yet come to years of discretion, who have not yet the ability to take care of themselves as older people do; and the law regards their rights and privileges in the streets as well as those of older persons, and when you are dealing with the safety of things left in the streets, you have to regard children as well as older people. The propensity of little children to play upon the street, and to rest from their play in the public streets, is one with which we are all more or less familiar, and that is also to be taken into consideration (and I may say by way of parenthesis that upon this trial there is evidence tending to show that little children were accustomed to play in the street in the vicinity of where the girders were placed both before and after they were placed), and if things are left in the street in such condition that they will tempt children to make use of them, either for play or for rest, and will be dangerous to little children if they do so make use of them, those things are not in proper condition.'"

This statement of the legal duty resting upon those in the situation of the defendant, we think is as sound as it is humane, and it is supported by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as by numerous decisions of the state courts. These decisions are controlling in the present case. The leading case of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, was a case in which the plaintiff, a child of tender years, was injured while playing with other children on a railroad turntable. This turntable was ordinarily held secure from movement by a heavy cast-iron latch. This latch had been for some time broken, so that the table could be easily turned on its pivot by the children who played on and near it. The turntable was on the uninclosed land of the railroad company. There was evidence tending to show that small children were in the habit of playing around and upon this turntable, to the knowledge of defendant's servants. Dillon, Circuit Judge, in the court below, had, in charging the jury on the question whether there was negligence on the part of the railroad company in allowing the turntable to remain in the condition in which it was said "that to maintain the action it must appear by the evidence that the turntable in the condition, situation, and place where it then was, was a dangerous machine, one which, if unguarded or unlocked, would be likely to cause injury to children; that if, in its construction and the manner in which it was left, it was not dangerous in its nature, the defendants were not liable for negligence; that they were further to consider whether, situated as it was on the defendants' property in a small town, somewhat remote from habitations, there was negligence in not anticipating that injury might occur if it was left unlocked or unguarded; that if they did not have reason to anticipate that children would be likely to resort to it, or that they would be likely to be injured if they did resort to it, then there was no negligence."

The Supreme Court approved of this statement of the law, and decided that the case had been properly submitted to the jury. The principle of this case has been adhered to by the Supreme Court in subsequent cases, as also by many cases in the highest courts of the states, and though there is some conflict in the decisions of the state courts, the decided weight of their authority is on the side of what has come to be called the "Doctrine of the Turntable Cases."

In Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619, the railway company operated a coal mine, and was in the habit of depositing the slack on an open lot belonging to it, between the mine and the station, in such quantities that the slack was in a permanent state of combustion, a fact known to the servants of the company. The lot was open and unguarded. A lad of twelve years of age, in running across this lot, fell onto the slack and was badly burned. It was held that the lad was not a trespasser, under the circumstances, and had not been guilty of contributory negligence, and he was allowed to recover. Mr. Justice Harlan, in delivering the elaborate opinion of the court in this case, approves of the judgment in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, and quotes with approval the following from Judge Dillon's charge to the jury in that case: "The machine in question is part of the defendant's road and was lawfully constructed where it was. If the railroad company did not know, and had no good reason to suppose, that children would resort to the turntable to play, or did not know, or had no good reason to suppose, that if they resorted there they would be likely to get injured thereby, then you cannot find a verdict against them. But if the defendants did know, or had good reason to believe, under the circumstances of the case, that the children of the place would resort to the turntable to play, and that if they did they would or might be injured, then, if they took no means to keep the children away, and no means to prevent accidents, they would be guilty of negligence, and would be answerable for damages caused to children by such negligence."

Mr. Justice Harlan then proceeds, as follows: "That charge was held by this court to be an impartial and intelligent one. And after observing that the jury were at liberty to find for the plaintiff if, from the evidence, it could justly be inferred that the railroad company, in the construction, location, management, or condition of the turntable, had omitted that care and attention to prevent the occurrence of accidents which prudent and careful men ordinarily bestow, Mr. Justice Hunt, delivering the unanimous judgment of this court, said: 'That the turntable was a dangerous machine which would be likely to cause injury to children who resorted to it might fairly be inferred from the injury which actually occurred to the plaintiff. There was the same liability to injure him, and no greater, that existed with reference to all children. When the jury learned from the evidence that he had suffered a serious injury by his foot being caught between the fixed rail of the roadbed and the turning rail of the table, they were justified in believing that there was a probability of the occurrence of such accidents.'"

That this is recognized as the common law by the English courts is shown by Mr. Justice Harlan's discussion of the cases of Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, 36, 4 Perry & D. 672, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 73, 5 Jur. 797; Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239, 35 L. J. Exch. N. S. 161, 14 L. T. N. S. 411, 14 Week. Rep. 771, 4 Hurlst. & C. 388; and Clark v. Chambers, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 327, 47 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 427, 38 L. T. N. S. 454, 26 Week. Rep. 613, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 28. See Pollock, Torts, 382. 383. The doctrine of those cases, which relate to structures dangerous, as well as attractive, to children, maintained on defendant's own land, is a fortiori applicable to cases like the present, where the defendant has maintained the dangerous thing, structure, or condition upon a public street or highway.

The defendant, however, earnestly contends that the decision of the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey, in Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. 71 N. J. L. 605, 70 L.R.A. 147, 108 Am. St. Rep. 764, 61 Atl. 401, 2 Ann. Cas. 497, is binding upon the court below and this court, and settles the law for this case. This contention involves the important question of how far decisions of a state court are conclusive upon the circuit courts of the United States in the exercise of their concurrent jurisdiction with state courts. This question has received the consideration from the Supreme Court which its importance demanded. It is unnecessary to cite all the decisions in which that court has enunciated the principles by which determination of this question must be guided. These decisions have been founded upon the broad meaning and intent of article 3 of the Constitution, and of the legislation of Congress in pursuance thereof, conferring upon the circuit courts of the United States "original cognizance concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, . . . in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states," and have been made in conformity to that spirit of comity and practical good sense by which, in the administration of this concurrent jurisdiction, "unseemly conflicts" with the state courts have been avoided. These principles, for our present purpose, may be summarized as follows:

There is no common law of the United States, and the 34th section of the judiciary act (Act Sept. 24, 1789, chap. 20, 1 Stat. at L. (92), as embodied in § 721 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 581), provides: "That the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

So that, in any trial common law, a circuit court of the United States, where its jurisdiction is founded on diverse citizenship, has to inquire what the law of the state in which its jurisdiction is exercised may be, and it is the law of that state, whether statute or common law, that it is called upon to administer. So far as the constitutional or statute law of a state is concerned, the Constitution and statutes speak for themselves, and it is a rule well settled that where a question arises upon the construction of a state Constitution or statute, the courts of the United States will feel themselves bound by the construction given to them by the supreme court of the state. So, also, as to what may be the common law of the state, as applicable to a case before a Federal court, the ordinary evidence is to be found in the decisions of the state's tribunal of last resort.

The question in the class of cases we are now considering, being what the law of the state is which is to be administered by the court, if there can be found in the decisions of the highest court of that state, intrusted with the construction of its statutes and the interpretation and application of its common law, a well-settled rule, that generally will be deemed the law of that state. Especially is this true whenever the decisions of the state courts relate to some law of a local character which may have become established by those courts as part of the law of the state. And generally, where in an ordinary trial, in an action at common law in a United States court, we speak of the common law, we refer to the common law of the state as it has been adopted by statute or recognized by the courts, as the foundation of legal rights, so that, though a United States circuit court having jurisdiction in a given state is an independent forum, and distinct from that of the state, it administers no new or different law from that administered in the state court. But the jurisdiction exercised by those Federal courts in such cases is concurrent, and not subordinate, and they are called upon to exercise, and do exercise, an independent judgment as to what the law of the state may be.

As to the constitutional and statute law of a state, and the construction given thereof by the highest state tribunals, there is little or no difficulty. And as to what the common law of a state may be, the best evidence is generally found in the settled line of decisions of the state court, so accepted and recognized as to constitute a general rule of property or conduct. More latitude, however, is practised in questions that depend upon a common law, not merely part of the local and customary law of the state, but common to all states and countries where what is known as the "common law" prevails. On these questions, the courts of the United States do not hold themselves bound by the decisions of the courts of the state, unless, perchance, such decisions have so clearly established a settled rule in the premises as to make it part of the peculiar and local law of that state. In deciding what the common law of a state may be, they will resort to the same sources of information as are open to the state courts, and find the evidence of the law where the state courts must seek it, in that general jurisprudence of which we have spoken. State courts are accustomed, in discussing such questions, to refer not only to decisions of their own states, but to those of other states in this country, as well as to decisions in that country from which we originally derived the common law. The circuit courts of the United States may therefore, in forming their independent judgment in questions where the common law of the state is derived from the principles of general jurisprudence common to all the states, at times feel compelled to differ from the conclusions arrived at by the state court. In other words, they may differ from a state court in determining what the common law of the state thus derived, and applicable to the given case, may be. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, 8, 10 L. ed. 865, 867.

It is to be remembered, however, that this diversity of opinion will not be indulged in by the courts of the United States where, as we have just said, in the ordinary administration of the law by the state courts, and by the settled course of their decisions, certain rules are established which have become rules of property and conduct in the state, and have all the effect of law, which it would be wrong to disturb. Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 37, 27 L. ed. 359, 366, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10; Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974; Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 267, 275, 35 L. ed. 173, 175, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 563.

This contention makes it necessary to refer to the somewhat peculiar history of the litigation between the parties to this suit, as disclosed in the record. From the facts stated in the fifth plea filed by the defendant, and afterwards stricken out by the court upon motion of the plaintiff, it appears that the defendant in error, Fannie Friedman, and her father, Samuel Friedman, on July 20th, 1903, brought two separate actions against the present plaintiff in error, in the supreme court of New Jersey, to recover damages for the same injury and upon the same state of facts for which the present action was brought in the court below. The two actions came on for trial, and, by stipulation and consent, were tried as one before a justice of the supreme court and a jury. A verdict was rendered in favor of Fannie Friedman for $7,000, and for Samuel Friedman, who sued per quod servitium amisit, for $800. On the judgment in the case of Samuel Friedman, a writ of error was sued out by the defendant company, from the court of errors and appeals of the state of New Jersey, and in Fannie Friedman's case a judgment nisi being entered, a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside was granted, returnable before the New Jersey supreme court. The Samuel Friedman Case was duly argued before the said court of errors and appeals, and the judgment appealed from was finally reversed. The ground of this reversal, as stated in the opinion of the court, was that the defendant company owed no duty to the children of tender years to whom, to its knowledge, these piles of beams might be attractive for playing upon or resting upon, to keep them in a reasonably safe condition, other than it owed to those who were sui juris. It was held that Fannie Friedman was a trespasser upon these materials of the defendant, and that for the injury suffered by her, as such, no cause of action or recovery could accrue to her father.

After this judgment of the court of appeals in the case of Samuel Friedman, as was inevitable, the rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted in the case of the infant plaintiff against the same defendant was made absolute by the trial court, and the suit was thereafter discontinued by plaintiff, and a new action was brought in the court below, the judgment and record in which, by writ of error, are now before this court for review. The objection made by plaintiff in error, that the suit in the state court barred the right of action in the second suit in the United States court, does not seem to have been seriously pressed, and requires but a word in passing. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Broughton, 109 U. S. 121, 27 L. ed. 878, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 99, was a case where a nonsuit in the state court had been granted on defendant's motion, and a new action was subsequently instituted in the circuit court of the United States, where it was contended that the former judgment was a bar, and a request made to direct a verdict for defendant. The court denied the request and overruled the objection. Upon error to the Supreme Court, these rulings were held to be correct, and that "a trial upon which nothing was determined cannot support a plea of res judicata or have any weight as evidence at another trial." And in Gardner v. Michigan C. R. Co. 150 U. S. 349, 37 L. ed. 1107, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140, the plaintiff sued defendant in the state court of Michigan, and a verdict and judgment were in plaintiff's favor. This judgment was reversed by the supreme court of the state, and a new trial ordered. When the case was remanded, plaintiff voluntarily withdrew his action, and then commenced suit in the circuit court of the United States on the same cause of action. The defendant contended that the plaintiff was precluded from bringing this action by the judgment in the state court rendered for the same cause of action and on the same state of facts. This contention was overruled by the circuit court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case cited, held that this ruling of the circuit court was correct.

We recur, therefore, to the contention that the decision of the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey in Friedman v. Snare & T. Co. is binding on this court, and settles the law for this case. We have al-
